This was a motion on the behalf of the defendant to suppress the deposition of a witness named Pugh, who had been examined under a commission on the behalf of the plaintiff, for irregularity. The commission was issued in pursuance of an order made in Jan. 1841, for the examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, but the defendant did not join in such commission. Cymric Lloyd, one of the commissioners named by the plaintiff, was his nephew and agent; though the nature of his agency did not appear. The defendant did not become aware of the relationship and connection between Lloyd and the plaintiff until some time after publication had passed. The commission was executed on the 5th of March, 1841, at Caen, by Lloyd and another commissioner, when Pugh was examined. The depositions were delivered out in December, 1841. In January, 1842, the defendant made an objection to the evidence of Pugh, on account of his interest. During the progress of the cause in the Master's office the name of Cymric Lloyd was observed by the defendant's solicitor on the 15th December, 1842, when an inquiry was made, and his relationship to, and connection with, the plaintiff ascertained. Notice of motion at the Rolls was then given. The Master of the Rolls directed the depositions to be suppressed, and the plaintiff appealed to the Lord Chancellor.

The following cases were referred to on the argument: Cooke v. Wilson (4 Mad. [illegible]); Practical Register, 121; Hinde, 304; Gordon v. Gordon (1 Swanst. 166; 1 Wils. C. C. 155); Fortescue v. Cooke (Godb.

193); Fricker v. Moore (Bunb. 289); Selwyn's case (2 Dick. 563); Newton v. Foot (2 Rep. in Cha. 393; 2 Dick, 793); Chameau v. Riley (Rolls, 9 Dec. 1840).

JUDGMENT.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It appears that Cymric Lloyd, one of the commissioners for the examination of witnesses on behalf of the plaintiff, was the nephew of the plaintiff, and was also engaged in some way for him as his agent. This is sworn to on the part of the defendant, by Groom, and is not in any way contradicted by the plaintiff, nor is any explanation given of the nature of the agency. It is clearly shewn that the father of Cymric Lloyd was the agent of the plaintiff, and it must upon the evidence, be taken as proved that Cymric Lloyd was himself also an agent. Such an appointment of a commissioner was highly irregular and most improper, and it is most important to enforce strict regularity in the appointment of commissioners, not merely to insure impartiality, but secrecy as well; and it was the more important in this case, as the proceeding was ex parte, the defendant not having joined in the commission. Unless, therefore, there is some objection as to the time when the defendant took the objection, the depositions must be suppressed. On the 15th of Dec. 1841, there was an appointment before the Master to settle his report; and the depositions were then first read in the presence of the solicitors of the parties. The defendant's solicitor had that morning met Cymric Lloyd with respect to a bill transaction with the Hon. Mr. Mostyn, and on hearing the name of Cymric Lloyd read as a commissioner, it attracted his attention. He immediately inquired, and found that he was the nephew and agent of the plaintiff. There was no delay on his part. At that meeting, on the 15th December, he stated that the deposition was irregular, and he served notice of the motion to suppress the depositions on the 24th of December. Here there is no ground for imputing delay. Some reliance was placed by the plaintiff's counsel on the fact that in December 1839, Cymric Lloyd had been introduced to Mr. Burdekin, one of the defendants, as the near relation of Lord Mostyn. But there is no reason to suppose that Mr. Burdekin recollected the circumstance, or identified Cymric Lloyd, the commissioner, as the person who had been introduced to him as the plaintiff's relation more than a year previously. The plaintiff also contends that the objection came too late after the depositions had been used. I conclude, from what fell from Lord Eldon in Boughton v. Pierrepoint (3 Swanst. 550), that that circumstance will not prevent the suppression of depositions irregularly taken. I am of opinion this objection cannot be sustained. I agree in the regret expressed by the Master of the Rolls that, by the death of Pugh, the plaintiff has lost evidence which may have been most important to his case; but the fault rests with his own agents, and it is most important that the evidence taken in this court should be free from such irregularities. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that the depositions must be suppressed. Appeal motion refused with costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Tuesday, Nov. 5.

GARCIAS v. RICARDO.

Practice—Plea of foreign judgment.

A plea of foreign judgment may operate as a bar to a suit in this court. But where the representations made by the plea are of that general nature as to leave the Court in doubt as to what were the matters in issue in the foreign court between the parties, equity will not refuse the plaintiff his right to file his bill in this court for an account of the transactions between him and the defendant.

This case, upon which a preliminary question arose some time in Trinity Term last respecting a point of practice before filing the bill (vide ante, vol. iii. p. 338), now came before the Court for argument upon a plea of foreign judgment. It appears, from the statements in the bill, that in the year 1834 the London firm of Ricardo and Co. through the agency of M. Aguado, the bankers in Paris, contracted for a loan of 4,000,000*l.* to the Spanish Government. The first advance was made to the amount of 500,000*l.* by certain bills accepted by Messrs. Ricardo and Co. After this the plaintiff Lorenzo Garcias, at the instance of the defendant, joined him in the undertaking, and became a participator therein to the amount of 25,000*l.*; but having, after a time, entertained a suspicion that he had not received from Ricardo and Co. what his share in the enterprise entitled him to, instituted a suit for an account of the transactions between them in the Cour du Commerce, whereupon the defendant Ricardo demurred to the jurisdiction of that Court. Upon an appeal, however, to the Cour Royale, he was ordered to put in his answer to the plaintiff's suit. The cause being heard on the merits, the decision of both Courts was in favour of the defendant Ricardo. This adjudication took place in 1837, and Garcias now instituted proceedings in this court for an account of what was due to him from Ricardo, alleging that he had only received 7,000*l.* from Garcias, that sum being about one-third of the amount to which he alleged he was entitled.

Stewart and Heathfield, in support of the plea, contended that the matter might already be considered as res judicata, the suit having been instituted by a domiciled Frenchman, in a court of competent jurisdiction, in the kingdom of France, where a definitive sentence had been pronounced upon the same subject of dispute, and between the same parties. That the principal points to be considered were—1. Whether a foreign judgment was a good defence. 2. If a good defence, whether advantage of it might be taken by way of plea. 3. Whether the matters in the suit were the same as those that were comprised in the foreign judgment. That all the authorities and text-books, both domestic and foreign, went to shew that such a judgment was a decided cause of objection to any suit in this country like the present, and ought to be considered as a fit subject of a plea.

Works and cases cited: Story's Conf. of Laws, c. 15; 3 Burge Tre. on Col. Law, 1050—1058; Lord Redesdale's Plead.; Burroughs v. Jamineau (Mose. Re. 1); Martin v. Nichols (3 Sim. 458).

Bethel and Lewis, in support of the bill.—The question is whether a party, be he a foreigner or not, is entitled to justice. We do not dispute that the judgment of a foreign court may be a good plea, but the fault of the plea is that it is void both in form and in substance. The questions are so indistinctly raised by the plea, that it is impossible to understand whether the relief sought by the present bill had been afforded or not by the French tribunal. The bill charges that the defendant pretends that the plaintiff instituted proceedings in a foreign court. The plaintiff admits certain proceedings in that court, but in respect of different matters. If, therefore, the facts stated in the bill be true, it obviates the effect of the foreign judgment. Lord Redesdale says, that when facts are stated to get rid of a judgment, and not denied, the plaintiff prevails. The plea does not state whether the matters are the same, or whether the issue joined between the parties be the same; but it is essential, according to the rules of equity, for the purpose of supporting a plea to the jurisdiction of this court, that not only should the subject-matter of the suit, and the parties to the suit, be identical, but that the issue should also be the same. In our case, there are several allegations of new matters introduced in the bill, which are amply sufficient to sustain the plaintiff's complaint in this court.

Case cited: Child v. Gibson (2 Atk. 602).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I cannot say that I am quite satisfied with the plea. The representations are so general that I am prevented from forming an accurate notion of the matters upon which the parties are taking issue in the French courts. These ought to have been distinctly stated in the plea, since it is quite possible that there might have been all these decrees and orders made by the courts in France, as represented by the plea to have issued, without the question now raised by the plea having been once decided, namely whether there existed a valid contract between the parties which ought to have been performed. It appears to me, as the affair is represented, that the judgments of the foreign courts might be quite in accordance with the laws of that country, and capable of being sustained by jurisdiction of its courts, without in the least degree affecting the question raised by the bill. I am of opinion that this Court will be incurring great danger of denying the plaintiff's right to justice if I were to terminate this suit by allowing the plea, and therefore it strikes me that the most advisable course will be to give the defendant leave to amend his plea, and at the same time allow the plaintiff to amend his bill; but the consideration of costs must be reserved.

PHILLIPS v. BARLOW.

Nov. 4 and 9.

The right of a tenant for life without impeachment of waste in respect to his claim to the money raised by the sale of timber felled on the estate as against the remainder-man in fee.

Where timber had been felled by order of the Court for the improvement of the growth of the younger trees during the lifetime of a tenant for life impeachable for waste: Held, that the produce of timber so cut down belonged to the next tenant for life without impeachment of waste.

Sir William Owen, being tenant for life without impeachment of waste of certain estates situate at Laurenny, in the county of Pembroke, under the will of Hugh Barlow, claimed to be entitled to a sum of money amounting to about 7,000*l.* the produce of the sale of certain timber which had been cut down upon the estate many years since. This had been done by an order of the Court during the life of the late tenant for life, Mrs. Barlow, who was a tenant impeachable for waste. The object of felling the timber had been to improve the growth of the younger trees upon the estate. The life estate of Sir W. Owen having now fallen into possession, he claimed the 7,000*l.* in question, as being tenant of the first estate of freehold unimpeachable for waste, and presented his petition to the Court, praying that he might be declared entitled to the fund accordingly.

Wilson appeared in support of the petition, and relied upon the case of Waldo v. Waldo (12 Sim. 107.(a))

Bethel and Glass, for those entitled to the inheritance in remainder, contended that the money for which the timber had been sold must be regarded as the corpus of the estate, and therefore that the case of Waldo v. Waldo was not applicable, but that the fund belonged to the inheritance.

Stuart, Stinton, and Tillotson appeared for the other parties claiming an interest.

His honour the VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that the present case was in no respect distinguishable from the case of Waldo v. Waldo, and therefore held that Sir W. Owen was entitled to the fund in question.

ROLLS COURT.

Re THOMAS.

Under an agreement by lessee to pay the expense of lease and counterpart of a house and fixtures thereby demised, a schedule of fixtures, &c. made out by the desire of the lessee, and referred to in the lease, but not inserted therein, nor paid for to the Stamp-office, is an item of which the expense is to be allowed on taxation.

This was a petition praying for a reference to the taxing-master to review his report.

It appeared that George Mew agreed to let the house and premises No. 301, High Holborn, to William Ablett, who agreed also to purchase the fixtures, &c. at 100*l.* The agreement also contained a clause stipulating that Ablett, the lessee, should pay for the agreement, and for the lease, and counterpart thereof. A lease was, by the lessor's solicitor, Mr. Thomas, prepared accordingly, but neither a schedule of the fixtures nor a counterpart of the lease, in order to save expense to the lessee. The lease was sent to the lessee's solicitor, Mr. Naylor, who insisted upon a schedule being prepared, and, after the description of the premises in the lease, inserted the words "herein more particularly referred to in, &c." The schedule was not added to the lease, nor was stamp-duty paid for it, nor was it even signed till a month after the execution of the lease. After the business was concluded, Mr. Thomas sent in his bill of costs to Mr. Naylor, amounting to 13*l.* 9s. 8d. One of the items was a charge of less than 3*l.* for the schedule. This the taxing-master disallowed; and the costs of taxation being 10*l.* 13s. 6d. exceeded the amount of the bill so taxed. The question was whether the schedule was part of the agreement or not.

Turner, for the petitioner.

Kindersley and Sandys, for the respondent.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS.—I regret that a petition should be presented for a thing of so small value, the expense of which will exceed over and over again the amount of the bill of costs. The simple question is, whether on the agreement the schedule is to be taken to be included. It does not appear whether Mr. Naylor thought the schedule necessary, but he was not satisfied that it was not prepared, and had a clause inserted in the lease referring to it; and it was made out at his instance. Considering that there is an express reference to the agreement, I think it cannot be expounded without importing the schedule into it. I therefore disagree with the Master, and think the expense of it must be allowed. There must be a reference to the Master to tax the proper sum to be allowed, if the parties cannot agree. There can no costs be given.

Re WHITCOMBE.

The solicitor of a person who compromises his claims for a given sum, receives that sum, and pays a part of it to him, and gives him a receipt in full for all demands, for costs, &c., and a memorandum thereof is signed by the person: this constitutes a sufficient agreement between the parties, so long as it is not set aside by bill, to preclude taxation under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

(a) The case above alluded to was briefly this: a testatrix devised to S. N. Meredith and his heirs certain estates upon trust to settle them upon Jane Waldo for life, with remainder to the use of E. W. M. Waldo, the plaintiff, for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to his first and other sons in tail. Shortly after the testatrix's death, the trustee, Meredith, with the consent of Jane Waldo and the plaintiff, cut and sold some timber on the estate, which was going to decay, and invested the proceeds in the Three per Cent. Consols. A suit having been instituted by E. W. M. Waldo against the trustee, Meredith, Jane Waldo, and the infant eldest son of the plaintiff, the stock in question was ordered to be brought into court, and the Court being satisfied of the circumstances under which the timber had been cut, ordered the dividends of the stock to be paid to Jane Waldo for life, and upon her decease the capital to be transferred to the plaintiff; his honour the Vice-Chancellor laying it down, that "where the estate of the tenant for life has ceased, the Court has only to consider the estate of the person next in succession; and if he is unimpeachable of waste, and asks for the corpus of the fund, he asks only for that which he would have been entitled to if he had exercised that power which the law gives him a right to exercise when he comes into possession."

This was a petition by five of the six co-heirs (viz. Elizabeth, the wife of William Thomson, and four others) of the late James Wood, of Gloucester, and it prayed that the bills of costs of their solicitors, Messrs. Whitcombe, Helps, and Wemyss, incurred in supporting their claims, should be delivered and taxed. Proposals for a compromise with the petitioners were made and rejected, but afterwards, and before the trial of ejectment came on, at Gloucester, it was arranged that the petitioners should receive from the devisees of Mr. Wood's real estate the sum of 10,000*l.* and should execute to them a release of all demands. It was understood also that they were each to have 1,000*l.*, and the remaining 4,000*l.* Mr. Helps consented to accept in full for all demands for law charges, &c. The devisees accordingly paid the money, and got the release from all; but Greig, the husband of one of the co-heirs, though he had suggested the arrangement, refused to be bound by the arrangement as between them and the solicitors, and insisted on having his share in full. Accordingly he received 1,666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* and gave back 300*l.* The other five, knowing this, received each 1,000*l.* only, and a receipt in full for all demands as to law charges, &c. from Mr. Helps, and a memorandum of the particulars was also delivered. No bill of costs was made out to any of them, but the 666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* was in lieu of all demands. The petitioners, being dissatisfied, now sought to have the bills delivered and taxed. The question was, whether this was not an agreement that there should be no bill of costs delivered, and whether, therefore, taxation was not precluded.

Kindersley and Glasse, for the petitioners.

Turner, for the respondents.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The question is, whether there is such evidence here of an agreement as precludes taxation. I say nothing of the contract itself, whether it is proper or otherwise, or whether by bill it ought to be set aside or not; but sitting here adjudicating on the petition before me, the question is, whether it is supported by the evidence. [His lordship stated the facts.] The devisees agreed to pay, and did pay, the 10,000*l.* So far that part of the arrangement was carried out, and Helps supposed he had sufficient influence with his clients to make them agree to the whole arrangement; but they were not bound. Accordingly, Greig refuses, and is paid in full. The other parties, however, accepted each 1,000*l.*; and gave a receipt in full of all demands for law charges, &c. and a memorandum was also delivered. This, I think, is binding upon them. The petition must be dismissed, but without costs; the parties have mistaken their course. The agreement, though suspicious, because one party had full knowledge, and the other not, is not open in a jurisdiction not enabling the Court to set it aside.

Re BUSH.

A signed letter sent by a solicitor, along with unsigned bills of costs, and expressly referring to them, is a sufficient signing of the bills to satisfy the 6 & 7 Vict. c.73, s. 37; and delivering them to the solicitor of the party to be charged by them at the request of the party is a sufficient delivery.

Quære, whether the delivery of them to the town-agent of the solicitor of the party would be sufficient?

Robert Sayer, of Sibton-park, Suffolk, employed as his solicitors, Bush and Master, and after the dissolution of their partnership, Bush alone, and subsequently Bush and Mullins. General business, both in and out of court, was done for him by the two firms of Bush and Master and Bush and Mullins, but no court business was done by Bush while acting alone. Bush having received rents, &c. application was made by Sayer for cash accounts and for bills. A cash account was accordingly made out and delivered, which contained an item on the debit side: "Bill of costs, 17*l.* 10*s.* 8*d*;" but no bill was then delivered. On the 11th Oct. 1842, the petitioner wrote a letter to Bush requesting him to send his bill, accounts, and bill of costs to Mr. William Hugh Dennett, of Worthing, as he (the petitioner) was unable, from the state of his health, to attend to business. Subsequently, and before May, 1843, several letters passed between Dennett and Bush, the former desiring Bush to send to his (Dennett's) agents in town, Messrs. Hodgson and Concannon. Accordingly, on the 24th May, 1843, Bush did send four bills, unsigned; three for the sums respectively of 13*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, 24*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, and 2*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and a fourth for the sum of 17*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.* to Messrs. Hodgson and Concannon, and along with them a signed letter referring to them, and also to the delivery of the fourth in 1841. In May 1844, the petitioner sent them back to be signed and delivered, for the purpose of having them taxed under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, which Mr. Bush refused to do; and on the 21st of June, 1844, this petition was presented for delivery and taxation. After the bills had come into the hands of the petitioner, application was made to Coleridge, J. to tax them, and he refused, because they did not contain any taxable items in a court of law.

Roupell and Cole, for the petitioner, insisted that the requirements of the Act had not been complied with.

Kindersley and Prior, contrà, cited Vincent v. Slaymaker (12 East, 372); Warren v. Cunningham (Gow, 71); 2 Geo. 2, c. 23, as to what constituted a delivery.

Roupell, in reply, cited Hill v. Humphreys (3 Esp. 254); Brooks v. Mason (1 H. Bl. 209).

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I am of opinion that these bills have been delivered within the true intent and meaning of the statute. Mr. Sayer expressly desired Mr. Bush to send them to Mr. Dennett, of Worthing, and he had no doubt a right to appoint a person to receive them. Dennett desires Hodgson and Concannon to receive them. It is not necessary to consider the question of the delegation of the power, for the bills did come to Dennett. It is clear, on the petitioner's own shewing, that the bills sent on the 24th May, and distinctly referred to in the letter signed by Bush, were received by Messrs. H. and C., and through them by Dennett. When they came to the petitioner's hands does not appear, but that they did come is quite clear. Long after the delivery the application was made to the Court of common law. Was there any question then about it? No; the ground for refusing the application was merely that there were non-taxable items. The petitioner afterwards, indeed, demanded the delivery; but how could he then repudiate what was assumed before Coleridge, J. No part of the prayer can be granted, neither delivery nor taxation. No special circumstances have been shewn; I therefore dismiss the petition with costs.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

Monday, Nov. 18.

NEALE v. DELL.

Practice—Costs—Appearance on petition.

This suit was instituted for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of certain infants and other persons to a fund left by will. After a reference to the Master, it was decreed that two infants were entitled to a certain sum equally, and the sum was accordingly directed to be carried over to a separate account in their names, and their mother was empowered to receive the dividends until they attained the age of 21 years. One of these infants, having attained his majority, now petitioned for the payment of his proportion of the sum out of Court.

Gruble, for the petition.

Wood appeared for the mother, and Hall for the defendants in the suit, and they asked for their costs of appearing, to be paid out of the petitioner's share.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that as there appeared to be no other fund upon which these costs could be fixed, he feared that he must order them to be paid out of the petitioner's share.

Re BENJAMIN ESTON.

Practice—1 Wm. 4, c. 60—Infant trustee.

Upon one petition, a reference to the Master was made to inquire, whether an infant was a trustee within the meaning of the Act, and if so, to approve of a proper person to be appointed a trustee in his place.

Metcalfe appeared upon this petition, which was presented under the 1st Wm. 4, c. 60, and prayed a reference to the Master to inquire whether Eston, the infant, was a trustee within the meaning of the Act; and also that if the Master should find that he was such trustee, then that he might approve of a fit and proper person to be appointed as a trustee in Eston's place. These two references were sought by the same petition, in order to save expense.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he did not know of any case where this had been done, but he thought it was advisable, and would, therefore, make the order.

TREDWELL v. HARVEY.

Injunction—Action in Canada.

By an award made under an order of this Court, a defendant was ordered to pay a sum of money, and, he being in Canada, on his way to England, the person to whom the money was to be paid commenced an action against him in Canada for the amount, and arrested him there. The Court directed the proceedings in the action to be stayed until the costs directed by the award to be taxed had been taxed, and that the defendant's motion for an injunction should in other respects stand over.

Russell and Billon, on behalf of the defendant in this suit, applied for an injunction under the following circumstances:—

This suit was instituted for the recovery of a sum of 1,200*l.* and upwards against Mr. Harvey, who is the commander of a trading vessel. A reference was made to the Master as to some points in dispute in the cause, but, subsequently, by an order made with the consent of both parties, the name of Mr. Courtney was substituted for that of the Master, and he was empowered to make an award upon the matters in dispute, and liberty was given to either of the parties to make the award an order of court. In April 1844 the award was made, whereby the defendant was directed to pay a sum of 522*l.* The defendant was then out of the country, but, upon his touching at Quebec on his way to England, he was arrested at the suit of the plaintiff for this sum. No costs had yet been taxed according to the order of reference. An injunction was now sought to restrain the plaintiff from proceeding in his action against the defendant in Canada.

Rogers, for the plaintiff, opposed the application, and

The VICE-CHANCELLOR made the following order: Stay all proceedings in the action in Canada on each side until the final hearing of this motion or further order; the parties not to take any advantage of such suspension of proceedings, and to cause the action, with all proceedings therein, to remain in the same state as they now are until further order—this order to be without prejudice to any question. Stay all proceedings in this cause until further hearing, except as to this order. Refer it to the Master to tax the defendant's costs of this suit, as if the bill had been dismissed with costs on this day, and tax the costs for the taxation of which a direction is contained in the award, including the costs of this motion. Reserve the costs of this motion, and let the motion, in all respects, stand over, with liberty to apply.

CHILLINGWORTH v. CHILLINGWORTH.

Exception in grant—Repugnancy.

Where a grant was made of certain shares in real property, which was described, and after the general words "all the estate," &c. an exception of part of the property already described was inserted, but the exception was not mentioned in any other part of the deed—Quære, whether the exception was repugnant, and therefore void?

In the course of hearing this case, Simpkinson and Messiter raised the following question upon a deed. By the deed, an appointment in pursuance of a power was made of certain shares in property which was fully described. The same shares in the property were then granted and released, and after the general words, "all the estate," &c. was inserted an exception of the "King's Head Tavern," and two houses in Water-lane, Fleet-street. As these formed parts of the property before described, and were, in the former part of the deed, mentioned by name as included in the appointment and grant and release, it was argued that the exception was repugnant to the grant, and therefore void. The exception was not repeated in the habendum, and the recital of the agreement for the conveyance contained no notice of the exception. (Shepp. Touchstone, 78; Co. Lit. 47 a; Horneby v. Clyton, Dyer, 264 b; Acton's case, Dyer, 288 b; Dorrell v. Collins, 4 Scott, 444; and Jarman's Conveyancing, last ed. vol. 4, p. 316, were cited.)

Wigram and Malins contended that this Court would put a construction upon the deed not in the strict legal sense, but according to the intention of the parties.

Simpkinson, in reply, urged that the intention of the parties was in favour of his construction, as from the recital it appeared that the agreement had been for the whole to be conveyed.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR thought it not necessary to give any opinion upon the mere point of law, for, assuming the mere point of law to be in Mr. Simpkinson's favour, it was quite enough, in this case, to shew reasonable probability that there had been a mistake as to the expression of the intention of the parties. Reserving the legal question, then, his Honour said, that he should send it to the Master to inquire whether it was the intention of the parties that the "King's Head" and the two houses in Water-lane should be affected by the exception in the deed, and whether, if it should appear that the property was affected by the exception, it had been by mistake, or by any other means contrary to the intention of the parties.

BRACEGIRDLE v. PEACOCK.

Abatement of nuisance by parish officer—New assignment—Plea true in part only.

Platt, Q.C. obtained a rule nisi on Nov. 7, to enter verdict for defendant on the last issue in this action for a new trial. The Court now gave judgment.

This was an action of trespass for cutting down pales. The defendant was a parish officer, in virtue of whose office the trespass had been committed, and he pleaded—1st, Not guilty; 2nd, That the act had been done in virtue of an Act of Parliament; 3rd, That the pales were standing on a public highway across a footpath; and, 4th, That as parish officer, the defendant had power to abate nuisances, and that the plaintiff had notice. These pleas were traversed by the plaintiff. The jury found that part only of the rails were upon the highway. The learned judge at the trial thought this sufficient under the terms of the plea—" Nor were the said rails and pales standing upon the said highway." It was also contended at the trial that, under the circumstances, there should have been a new assignment; and the learned judge so held. Platt contended that " new assignment was not necessary."

DOE dem. JACOBS v. PHILLIPS.

Custody of deeds.

Wordsworth moved for a new trial.

This was an action to recover gavelkind lands on which, a certain mortgage being made, one Pitcher had assigned a term to attend the inheritance. It being necessary that the possession should be recovered, ejectment was brought on the title of the administrator of the trustee of the term, who was the lessor of the plaintiff in this action. Letters reciting these deeds were put in evidence, and the deeds themselves were tendered. It was then contended that evidence ought to have been given to shew the custody whence the deeds were produced. It was shewn that an attorney, who had them in his possession, desired his clerk to take them out of his strong box. He acted for Mrs. Brand, in whom the beneficial interest vested. (Bishop of Meath v. Marquis of Westminster, 3 Bing. N. C. 183.)

COLERIDGE, J.—But in that case there was no public residence of the bishop in that diocese, and the deeds here might have been in proper custody.

Platt contended that it was not necessary that they should be in the next custody, as long as they were in custody which might reasonably be accounted for. (Doe dem. Neale v. Samples, 8 Ad. & Ell. 154; Bertie v. Beaumont, 2 Price, 307.) Rule nisi.

REG. v. BLOXHAM.

It is a fatal defect in the jurat of an affidavit to omit the words " sworn before me," and cannot be amended.

On appeal against an order of removal, the order was quashed, and a writ of certiorari had been obtained to bring up the order of sessions. On Tuesday last, Pigott obtained a rule to shew cause why the certiorari should not be set aside, on the ground that the affidavit of service of notice of certiorari, under 13 Geo. 2, c. 18, s. 5, was defective and informal, inasmuch as the jurat did not contain the words " sworn before me."

Keating now shewed cause. The omission in the jurat is cured by the words in the notice, which notice is referred to in the affidavit: " This is the notice referred to in the annexed affidavit sworn before me." It is not essential that the jurat should expressly state the swearing to have been before the exact person who took it; so long as, by taking all the documents together, it appears to have been so made. (Reg. v. Silkstone, 2 Gale & Dav. 396; Symmers v. Wason, 1 Bos. & Pul. 105.) Here the same commissioner signed, and the dates of both notice and jurat were the same, the one referring to the other.

Pashley, on the same side, argued that the application was too late. The order of sessions was made in October 1848; and only on the eve of the case being heard on the merits this rule is moved for to set the writ aside. They should either have come to the Court with this application earlier, or have accounted for the delay. (Davies v. Watkins, 2 Dowl. N.S. 930.) They have done neither; they relied for their rule on Reg. v. Cartworth (: . & Dav. 162), which was decided only on the ground that the notices were not served. Here they were served. Another ground was perjury could not be assigned on this jurat. Rex v. Emden (9 East, 436) is an authority to shew that the jurat is not conclusive evidence of the place where sworn.

The COURT called on

G. Pigott in support of the rule.—It is quite consistent with this jurat that it was sworn before me (Pigott) or any one else. It does not appear that it was sworn before the same person who is named in the notice; all that is stated is, that it was " sworn at Banbury." Perjury could not be assigned upon this affidavit at all. The case of Reg. v. Silkstone was merely one of ambiguity, this is one of fatal defectiveness. It is not to be allowed that laxity should creep into the execution of jurats. (Rex v. West Riding, 3 M. & Scl. 493.) The defect in the jurat cannot be helped by another document. It must be perfect in itself, or at last it would suffice to pin one document on another. It must of itself shew the jurisdiction of the justice or person taking it. (Reg. v. Shipston-upon-Stour, 1 Bit. & Sym. M. C. 41; Osborn v. Tatum, 1 Bos. & Pul. 271; Wood v. Stevens, 3 Moore; Howard v. Brown, 4 Bing. 393.)

Pashley, in reply.—There is no stringent rule calling on the Court to quash this certiorari. The presumption is omnia esse ritè acta, and the commissioner who took the affidavit must be presumed to have taken it properly. (R. v. Whiston, 4 Ad. & Ell. 607; Doe dem. Nanney v. Gore, 2 M. & W. 320.) The Court may amend, and insert the words " sworn before me" in the affidavit. (Ex parte Hall, L. J. 1839; Ex parte Smith, 2 Dowl. 607.)

DENMAN, C.J.—Our first impression was to get over the formal objection, and enter upon the merits of the question; but we must adhere to the established rules which govern jurats. It is a wholesome and proper provision that jurats should, in express terms, shew the jurisdiction and authority by which they are taken. There is no difficulty or hardship in requiring this to be done. Not a single case on the other side applies here. We must not strain points of form, neither must we encourage irregularity. In Ex parte Hall I took part, and gave an indulgence which ought not to have been given. We cannot amend serious defects in jurats; we should thereby encourage and invite a pernicious laxity. By quashing this writ we shall induce more care and caution in the wording of these instruments.

WILLIAMS, J.—We wish to sustain the strictness of the rule as to jurats. It would be a most unsafe and unsound mode of proceeding to countenance these defects. The words here are open to doubt and uncertainty, and we require that jurats should be perfect.

COLERIDGE, J.—If this is a mere irregularity, it is one which can neither be waived nor amended. If we encouraged these defects, we should probably never see jurats with the words " sworn before me" in them again. I wish that this irregularity had not barred the merits of the case. But we must stop where we are.

WIGHTMAN, J. concurred. Rule absolute.

REG. v. WOOLDALE.

A misnomer does not constitute a fatal error or ambiguity in an indenture of apprenticeship.

Pickering shewed cause why an order of sessions should not be quashed, on the ground of invalidity in the terms of an indenture of apprenticeship.

It appeared, that in the premises of the deed the right name of Joseph Beaumont, one of the parties to it, was mentioned; in the body a wrong Christian name, " John"; it was executed in the right name. The question was, whether the deed was a nullity or not. Even where the signature was in the wrong name, it has been held that the deed was good. Evidence of some facts may be given to support a deed, and the evidence given here was, that no such person as John Beaumont ever was bound, for that his son Joseph was bound, executed the deed, and served under it. (2 Phil. on Evidence; Wigram's Extrin. Evi. 54; Doe v. Leeds, 2 M. & W. 129; Lord Saye and Sele, 10 Mod. 46; Dorset v. Sweet, 1 Amb. 174; Miller v. Francis, 8 Bing. 244, Co. Hel and Pashley, contrà.—There is a patent ambiguity on the face of the deed, both as to the name of the party bound and the term for which he was to serve. This cannot be helped by averment.

Cases cited: Clark v. Highstead (1 Lutw. 894); Phil. Cri. 311; Pres. Shep. Touch. 233, Dyer, 279; Com. Dig. tit. " Grant" A, 2; and " Foil" E, 3, 2 Roll. Ab. tit. By the COURT.—The sessions have done right. As to the first point, we think there is no ambiguity, as the description of the apprentice in the deed shews that it could only be Joseph who was bound. The difficulty, if any, seems to be rather one of construction than ambiguity. The parol evidence only shews that something was done in pursuance of the deed, and that it was executed by Joseph, and that he served under it. Doubtless, if bad English would spoil a deed, this could not stand. Then as to the point as to the term for which the apprentice was to serve, it is clear it was for more than forty days, as there is a covenant to pay wages to the apprentice yearly and every year during the term of his apprenticeship, and we think it was to be until he attained the age of twenty-one years. Rule discharged.

WALKER v. DE RICHEMONT.

In order to complete a final judgment within the meaning of the Rule 1 Hilary Term, 2 Wm. 4, s. 85, it is not necessary that the costs should be taxed.

In this case Hindmarsh had obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the defendant should not be discharged from being charged in execution on a judgment obtained by the plaintiff in this cause.

The action was in debt, and judgment was signed in March last for want of a plea. The defendant was in custody under a writ of capias, and as the plaintiff did not proceed to tax his costs and charge the defendant in execution within two terms after the judgment was signed, as prescribed by Rule 2 Hil. Term, 2 Wm. 4, s. 85, the above rule was moved for.

Lush now shewed cause, and contended that the judgment was not complete until the costs were taxed, and that as the rule of Hilary gave the plaintiff three terms, within which he must proceed to final judgment, he contended that in this case the plaintiff had still all the present term in which to complete his judgment, and two terms more within which he might charge the defendant in execution.

Cases cited: Colborn v. Hall (5 Dowl. 534); Butler v. Bulkeley (1 Bing. 233); Salter v. Slade (3 Nev. & Man. 717); Pearse v. Diney (3 G. & D. 477); Brown v. M'Millan (8 Dowl. 852); Ireland v. Berry (1 Dowl. & Lowndes, 866); Reg. v. The Sheriff of Montgomeryshire (1 Dowl. N. S. 388).

Hindmarsh, contrà, was stopped by the Court.

By the COURT.—We think this is a final judgment within the meaning of the rule. It is such a judgment as prevents the defendant from pleading; and as to the cases cited, we do not think they apply. Rule absolute.

HOPKINS v. RICHARDSON.

New trial—Special contract, recision of.

In this case the action was brought by the plaintiff for work and labour done to the defendant's house. At the trial, the plaintiff proved a primâ facie case, by shewing that the work was done, and that the defendant was frequently present giving orders during the progress of the work. For the defendant, it was proposed to give in evidence that the work was done under a special contract, by parol, and that the plaintiff was to do the work in consideration of a lease of the premises, which was to be granted to him. This was objected to on behalf of the plaintiff. The evidence, however, was received; and it appeared that the plaintiff had asked for the lease, which had been refused him unless he finished the work; this he refused to do, unless the lease was given him. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, for the amount claimed; and at the same time found that the work had been done under a special parol contract, which had been broken by the defendant. A rule nisi for a new trial having been obtained, Humfrey and Gunning now shewed cause, and contended, that as the work had been done under a void contract, the law would presume a good consideration, and remit the parties to that. Further, that the evidence of the parol contract was not admissible, as it could not be enforced by either party.

Cases cited: Phillips v. Jones (1 A. & E. 333); Maror v. Pine (3 Bing. 285).

Platt, Q. C. contrà, contended that there had been no recision of the special contract; it was not sufficiently shewn that the defendant had refused to grant the lease, but only that he had refused to grant it until the work was done; further, that the plaintiff had had possession of and enjoyed the premises, therefore the parties could not be placed in statu quo; that it was clear that the work was done under a special contract which was not the one declared on.

By the COURT.—We think there has been no recision of the contract, in fact, and that the plaintiff was in a great hurry to bring his action. Rule absolute.

CROWN PAPER.

REG. v. HONLEY.

Order of removal—Sufficiency of examination—Derivative settlement—Occupancy.

This was an appeal against an order of removal. The sessions confirmed the order subject to a case for the opinion of this Court. The settlement relied on by the appellant was a derivative one from the pauper's father, whose examination was in these words: —" When I was about thirty years of age, I went to live in the township of Honley. In the year 1821, and whilst I still resided in the same place, I rented and occupied between three and four acres of land, at Scoll Gate Head, in Honley aforesaid, of John Todd, of Honley-moor, clothier, of the annual value of 7*l.* and for which I paid 7*l.* rent for many years. In the year 1821, and at the same time that I so occupied the land of John Todd, I also rented and occupied three acres of land at Scoll Gate Head aforesaid, of one John Bottomley, of Midthorn, sizer-boiler, of the annual value of 7*l.*, at 7*l.* rent, which I occupied for one year, and then gave it up in the year 1822." The grounds of appeal stated, amongst other things, " that the said examination shewed no occupation or holding by the said Martin Wimpony (the pauper's father), of any tenement of the yearly value of 10*l.* for forty days during 1821, or any such occupation or holding of any such tenement of the yearly value of 10*l*. for forty days during any other year or years."

Hall now shewed cause, and contended that the examination of the pauper's father sufficiently shewed a joint occupation by him for a year of the two tenements at the same time, which together were of the value of 10*l*.; and that if it did not, the objection was not taken in the grounds of appeal, which only raised a question as to the value of the tenement.

Pickering, same side.

Pashley and Ostrend appeared to support the case, but were not called on by the Court.

By the COURT.—We think the grounds of appeal sufficiently raise the question, and that the examination is insufficient. Rule absolute.

REG. v. LATCHWORTH.

Order of removal—Examinations—Effect of as admissions—Derivative settlement—Apprenticeship—Effect of discharging rule simply—Costs.

This was an appeal against an order of removal. The sessions confirmed the order subject to the opinion of this Court.

It appeared that the examination disclosed a birth settlement in the appellant parish, and further, that the pauper had been apprenticed by deed, and had served under his apprenticeship. It further appeared that during such service he had resided for more than forty days both in the appellant and respondent parishes, but it was now admitted that the last day of such residence was in the respondent parish. The examination also set out the indenture of apprenticeship. No notice to produce this deed was given to the respondents. The grounds of appeal merely traversed the settlement in the appellant parish. The respondents relied upon the birth-settlement, and the question for the Court was whether, upon these examinations, it was competent for them to do so. The appellants called no evidence.

Crompton, in support of the order, contended that the sessions had done right in confirming the order. The respondents had relied on their primâ facie case, and it was for the appellants to set up the settlement by apprenticeship. The respondents were not bound by the admissions of the pauper in his examination. The Act required that the whole of the examinations should be sent to the appellant parish, but they were not bound to admit all the statements made in them. The justices who made the order probably did not believe the evidence of the pauper as to the apprenticeship, or thought that there was no sufficient legal evidence of any subsequent settlement gained by it.

Cases cited: R. v. Outwell (9 A. & E.); Cunliff v. Sefton (2 East, 187); Cole v. Dunning (4 East, 53), Slatterie v. Pooly (6 M. & W. 664).

Pashley, contrà, contended that the respondents could not rely on a birth settlement, as the examinations disclosed a settlement by apprenticeship, which acted as a merger of the birth-settlement. He further contended that it was not necessary for the appellants to prove the indenture of apprenticeship, as the respondents were bound by the examinations of the pauper. (Slatterie v. Pooly, 6 M. & W. 664; R. v. St. John's, Margate, 1 Q. B. 252; R. v. St. Mary's, Beverley, 1 B. & Ad. 201.)

By the COURT.—The respondents cannot be bound by the examinations as to all the facts stated in them. The magistrates are bound to send the whole of them to the appellant parish, but they are not admissions in the case. The respondents may rely on any settlement set out therein, and if the appellants mean to rely on any other settlement, they are bound to prove it in the regular way.

Pashley then prayed that in this case the rule might be discharged, and not the order of sessions confirmed. This was a case, he submitted, in which the Court would not award costs against the appellants, as they had been misled, and the effect of confirming the order would be to give costs to the respondents.

DENMAN, C. J.—Our course is simply to discharge the rule, the result of which will be to confirm the order and render the appellants liable for costs. It should be understood that if parties bring up special cases upon orders of removal to this court and fail, they must pay the costs. Rule discharged.

REG. v. LAURENCE HUNTER.

Appeal against conviction—Practice where case is insufficiently stated.

This was an appeal against a conviction for a nuisance. The defendant had been convicted by the Recorder of Wigan upon an information charging him with a public nuisance in placing his cart empty on the public highway. It appeared that the defendant and others claimed an immemorial right to leave their carts on the place in question on market days. The Recorder convicted the defendant, but granted a case for the opinion of the Court. Crompton appeared to support the conviction; Cowling, contrà; but it appearing that the case did not sufficiently raise the question of an immemorial custom, the Court suggested that the case be sent back to the Recorder, in order that he might alter the statement of the case in this particular if he thought fit, or else the rule for quashing the conviction to be absolute.

Case sent back accordingly.

REG. v. ST. SEPULCHRE, NORTHAMPTON.

Order of removal—Sufficiency of examinations in—Settlement by renting a tenement—Contract—Occupancy.

This was an appeal against an order of removal. The sessions confirmed the order, subject to a special case for the opinion of this Court. The settlement relied upon was the renting a tenement of the value of 10*l*. a year. There were two objections taken to the examinations; first, that it did not sufficiently appear that the hiring was a yearly one; and, secondly, that there was no sufficient evidence on the face of them of an occupation for a year under the hiring. The examination of the landlady was as follows: "I let a house to John Adams at a rent of 10*l*. a year in July 1839. The said John Adams occupied the house, and paid the whole of the rent during that time." The pauper, who was the wife of John Adams, stated that "in July 1839 my husband hired a house of Mrs. Brown (the landlady): we resided in that house until March 1842."

Macauley, in support of the order of sessions, contended that there was sufficient evidence on which the sessions were justified in finding a yearly hiring, and an occupancy for a year under it. That here there was a general taking at a yearly rent, which constituted a yearly tenancy, and that it was not necessary for a witness to state the legal effect of facts, but only the facts themselves; that the occupancy sufficiently appeared by the examination of the landlady, who stated that "the said John Adams occupied the house, and paid the whole of the rent during that time," which could only mean from 1839 to 1842. He further contended, that R. v. Pomfret (2 Q. B. 548) was distinguishable, and if not, submitted that the Court might reconsider the judgment there given.

Mills, same side.

Cases cited: Doe dem. Martin v. Watson (7 T. R. 83); R. v. Pilkington (2 G. & D. 319).

Miller, contrà, contended that the occupancy must be strictly set out on the face of the examinations. Reg. v. Pomfret was in point. Nothing must be left to surmise. It might be that the pauper occupied and paid rent for a year, but non constat that it was under a yearly hiring; for all the facts were consistent with a tenancy at will.

Barlow, same side.

Cases cited: R. v. Leeds (13 L. J. M. C. 30); R. v. Herstmanceaux (7 B. & C. 551); R. v. Banbury (1 A. & E. 136); R. v. Stonehenge (2 Q. B. 530).

DENMAN, C. J.—I think we are bound to adhere to our former decisions, and hope that it will induce parties to use more care. I think nothing should be left to inference. Reg. v. Pomfret is in point, and must govern this case, as there are no words that sufficiently shew a holding under a contract for a year, or an occupancy under such hiring.

WILLIAMS, J. was of the same opinion.

COLERIDGE, J.—I am not satisfied with the decision of my learned brothers in this case. I do not think that it is governed by Reg. v. Pomfret, as it appears to me that every thing is here stated that is necessary. The examinations state a letting by the landlady on the 29th of July, 1839, and that the pauper occupied the house, and paid the whole of the rent, until March, 1842, which I think is sufficient.

WIGHTMAN, J.—I agree with the majority of the Court in thinking that the statement of occupancy is insufficient; but I am not prepared to say that it is insufficient as to the letting and hiring.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Friday, Nov. 15.

MARRIAGE v. MARRIAGE.

The defendant being indebted to the plaintiff, executed a bond conditioned for the payment of interest on the debt during the life of plaintiff and his wife and the survivor, which the plaintiff agreed to accept in lieu of the original debt, but, in case of default in payment of the interest within twenty-eight days after demand, the original debt was to become due and payable:—Held, on special demurrer, that a plea to an action on the bond, of payment generally was bad for not shewing whether the defendant had paid the original debt or the interest according to the condition. Quære, whether such a bond is within 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 12? Semble—The bond is not a deed requiring enrolment under the Annuity Act, 53 Geo. 3, c. 141.

Debt on bond in the penal sum of 4,000*l*.

The condition (set out by the defendant on oyer) recited that the defendant, being indebted to the plaintiff in 2,000*l*. it had been agreed that the plaintiff should accept the payment of interest on the debt at 5 per cent. per annum, during the life of himself and his wife, and the life of the survivor, instead of payment of the debt of 2,000*l*. The interest was agreed to be paid half-yearly, and on the due payment thereof the bond was to be null and void, but in case of failure of payment of all or any part of the interest in twenty-eight days after demand thereof in writing, the bond was not to be in discharge of the 2,000*l*. debt, but the same was then to become due and payable. The defendant pleaded—1st, Non est factum; 2nd, That the bond was made after the passing of the Annuity Act, 53 Geo. 3, c. 141; that the annuity was granted to the plaintiff for a pecuniary consideration, and that no memorial thereof was enrolled within thirty days pursuant to the Act; 3rd, Payment before action of all sums due on the bond. Special demurrer to 2nd and 3rd pleas.

Manning, Serjt. in support of the demurrer.—First, as to the third plea. The statute 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 12, provides only for a plea of payment to an action on a bond conditioned for the payment of a lesser sum, where the principal and interest due by the condition have been paid, which shews that the present is not a bond within that statute. The condition besides, being in the alternative, the defendant should have shewn which he had performed. On this point the Court stopped him. As to the third plea, he submitted that this was not a deed which required enrolment under 53 Geo. 3, c. 141, and cited, in support of this, Frost v. Frost (3 B. & Ad. 612, note a); Cumberland v. Kelley (3 B. & Ad. 602); and Blake v. Attersoll (2 B. & C. 875).

The COURT said the present seemed very closely to resemble Frost v. Frost, and called on Byles, Serjt. in support of the pleas.—The plea of payment, though bad at common law, is good by virtue of the statute 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 12. (Hodgkinson v. Wyatt, 13 Law J. N. S. Q. B. 73.) There Patteson, J. says, "Any payment which, if made at the very day, would be pleadable as a defence at common law, may if made after the very day, and before action, be pleaded under that statute." That case was where the interest, by way of annuity, was payable for a certain number of years; the question here will be, whether an annuity bond for lives is not equally within that statute.

TINDAL, C. J.—The objection to this plea is, that you have put both the sums together; you do not say whether you have paid the annual sum of 100*l*. or the 2,000*l*. debt. The interest is payable at particular days, but the original debt is only on a contingency; the plea leaves it uncertain which has been paid.

The rest of the COURT concurring,

Byles, Serjt. asked for, and obtained, leave to amend, on payment of costs, and production within a week of an affidavit, that all interest had been paid before action brought;—otherwise,

Judgment for the plaintiff.

RANNIE v. IRWIN.

An agreement in the sale of the goodwill of a trade that the vendor shall not supply any of the customers then dealing at the shop without the consent of the purchaser, is not such a restriction of trade as to make the contract void.

The words "term" and "time" in an agreement are convertible terms, and the former will be construed to mean the latter when the manifest intention of the parties is to use it in that sense.

The declaration in this case, after alleging the defendant to have been possessed of a shop and premises, No. 36, Berners-street, for the residue of a term of years, which expired on 29th September, 1842, stated, that by an agreement made on 1st July, 1842, between the plaintiff of the one part, and the defendant of the other part, the defendant, in consideration of the sum of 250*l.* agreed to assign to the plaintiff the remainder of the then unexpired term in the said shop and premises, and to procure from the landlord a lease of the premises for fourteen years from the expiration of the then term, and to assign to the plaintiff the same, and also the goodwill of the defendant in his business of a baker. And further, the defendant agreed not to set up or carry on, directly or indirectly, during the remainder of the then term, and the whole of the intended term, the business of a baker, within the space of one mile from 35, Berners-street, and also that he, the defendant, would not, during the remainder of the then term, and the whole of the intended term, solicit the custom of, or knowingly supply bread or flour to, any of the customers then dealing at the shop at 35, Berners-street, without first obtaining the consent of the plaintiff in writing:

The declaration having set forth the agreement, averred mutual promises, payment of the consideration-money according to the terms of the agreement, and that the defendant procured from the landlord a lease for the term of fifteen years and one quarter from 24th June, 1842, and assigned such lease to the plaintiff, who then accepted the same in lieu of the assignment of the new lease mentioned in the agreement.

Breach—That after the agreement and after the assignment of the last-mentioned term, and during the continuance thereof, to wit, on, &c. the defendant did, without first obtaining the consent of the plaintiff in writing, knowingly supply bread to R. Thompson and Henry Joseph Brock, customers dealing at 35, Berners-street, at the time of making the agreement, contrary to the agreement.

To this declaration the defendant demurred specially.

Byles, Serjt. in support of the demurrer, relied on two objections. 1st. That the latter part of the restraint in the way of trade imposed on the defendant, viz. the not supplying bread to the customers, was unreasonable. 2nd. That the breach assigned was not a breach which occurred during the continuance of the then term, and the whole of the intended term within the meaning of the agreement. In support of the first objection, he contended that no case had gone further than to decide that a restriction limited in point of space was not bad, and submitted that a restriction as to dealing with customers generally was unreasonable, when the customers were not scheduled or otherwise specified by name in the agreement. He referred to Hunlocke v. Blacklowe (2 Wm.'s Saund. 156), and to note(1) to the same case, where Mr. Serjt. Williams says: "For the same reason it seems that a bond, covenant, or promise not to use a trade with particular customers, by name, if founded on a good consideration, is also valid." Ward v. Byrne (5 M. & W. 557) was also referred to. As to the second objection, he submitted that as the breach was alleged after the assignment of the last-mentioned term, and during the continuance thereof, it was, therefore, during the substituted term, and not the term mentioned in the agreement.

Tindal, C. J.—What was the meaning of the parties as to the word term? It was not used with reference to the premises, but only to the time.

Byles, Serjt.—As here pleaded, the word "term" means estate.

Tindal, C. J.—At all events the words "term" and "time" are convertible terms, and I can't help seeing that the parties meant that the agreement should continue until the substituted term had expired.

Channell, Serjt. contrà, was directed to confine himself to the first objection; as to which he cited Hitchcock v. Coker (6 A. & E. 438); Mallan v. May (11 M. & W. 653); Gale v. Reed (8 East, 80).

Byles, Serjt. replied.

Tindal, C. J.—Upon the best construction which I can put on this argument, it does not appear that there is such a restriction of trade as to make it void. The first part of the agreement, by which the defendant agreed not to carry on the business of a baker within one mile from the premises, was admitted to be valid, but it was submitted that where the defendant contracts that he would not during the remainder of the term supply bread or flour to the customers who dealt at the shop at the time of making the agreement, was unreasonable, and rendered the contract void. Now, the first observation to be made on this is, that it is not a general restriction from dealing with anybody, but only with a limited number well known at the time of the contract, and to none better than the defendant himself. If, therefore, the parties remained as they were, this would not carry it further than the first part of the contract; but it was suggested that if the parties wandered from the premises, the restriction would prevent the defendant from supplying his former customers wherever he might carry on his trade. I do not see why, if the contract is reasonable at the time it is made, we are bound to see any extravagant supposition or contingency which may possibly arise, but must be very rare, in order to render the contract void. The present case seems not to extend further than that of Hunlocke v. Blacklowe. There, it is true, the point was not actually decided, but probably it was because it was thought that the restriction was not unreasonable. Here, though the customers were not named in the schedule as in Hunlocke v. Blacklowe, they were in the books of the shop, and were well known to the defendant, and were therefore virtually limited.

Coltman, J.—I agree to the principle that a restriction of trade ought not to extend beyond what is reasonable for the protection of the vendee. The present seems to be only reasonable for this. The case of Hunlocke v. Blacklowe was nearly the same as this, and the counsel in it did not consider it an objection.

Maule, J.—The general rule that contracts in restraint of trade are void is not so much for the sake of the traders, but for the public at large. The exception to the rule is founded on the principle of the rule itself, and is in effect to impose such restraint as may be convenient in order to effect a sale of the goodwill. The objection here is, that the restraint imposed is beyond that limitation; now the restraint is, that the defendant would not knowingly supply bread to any of the customers, &c. This probably would exclude the case of a vendor and customer residing in a distant land; but if not, I don't think a case of such extraordinary occurrence makes the restriction void.

Erle, J. It appears to me to be reasonable that in every assignment of the goodwill of a trade there should be a restriction against the seller getting back the customers of the trade, and I cannot suppose that by such a restriction the public can be in anywise prejudiced. In Hunlocke v. Blacklowe, the attention of the Court was not directed to this point, but the judgment given was, that the plaintiff should recover on a covenant such as the present. In Ward v. Byrne there was restriction as to place. It is remarkable that in that case the judgment of the Court is founded on the covenant being absolutely restricted in place, and not one of the judges adverts to the restraint against dealing with customers.

Byles, Serjt. obtained leave to amend within a week on payment of costs, and undertaking to plead issuably, and not to bring a writ of error, otherwise,

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Beckett v. Bradley.

Declaration in covenant stated that plaintiff was possessed of certain shares in a railway company, and that, by deed between the plaintiff and defendant, the former demised to the latter the dividends on the shares at a certain rent, which the defendant covenanted to pay. Breach—Non-payment. The defendant craved oyer of the deed, and the plaintiff set it out for him. The deed contained a recital that the plaintiff was so possessed of the shares. Held, that the defendant was estopped from traversing the allegation in the declaration that the plaintiff was possessed of the shares.

Also that the plaintiff might take advantage of this estoppel on demurrer, and need not reply it.

The declaration in this action, which was on covenant, commenced with stating that theretofore, and at the time of making the deed thereinafter mentioned, the plaintiff was a member of the North Midland Railway Company, and as such was possessed of or entitled to certain shares therein, (to wit) equivalent to twenty shares of 100*l.* in amount, with the dividends payable thereupon half-yearly or otherwise, when and as the same should be thereafter declared and made by the said company; and the declaration then set out a deed made the 20th November, 1841, between the plaintiff and the defendant, by which the plaintiff demised to the defendant, for the term of ten years from 1st July, 1841, the dividends as should thereafter during such term be made upon or in respect of twenty shares of 100*l* each in amount in the said undertaking of the North Midland Railway Company, at the yearly rent of 100*l.* payable half-yearly, with a covenant on the part of the defendant to pay such yearly rent to the plaintiff at the times appointed for payment. Breaches—for non-payment of several half-years' rent.

The defendant craved oyer of the deed mentioned in the declaration, and the plaintiff afterwards set the same out in the pleadings, the defendant omitting to do so. In this deed so set out there appeared the following recital—"Whereas the said Eleanor Beckett is a member of the North Midland Railway Company, and as such is possessed of or entitled to certain shares therein equivalent to twenty shares of 100*l.* each in amount, with the dividends payable thereupon, half-yearly or otherwise, when and as the same shall be hereafter declared and made by the said company."

The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff, at the time of making the deed, was not possessed of or entitled to shares in the North Midland Railway Company equivalent to twenty shares of 100*l.* in amount, with the dividends payable thereupon in manner and form, &c.

To this plea the plaintiff demurred specially; assigning, amongst other causes, that the defendant was estopped by his deed from pleading the plea.

Channell, Serjt. in support of the demurrer.—There was no necessity to allege that the plaintiff was possessed of any shares; it is the same as in the case of an ordinary lease; and there the declaration at once begins with the deed. In Coke Litt. L. 2, c. 7, s. 58, 48 b. it is said, "it is a good plea for the lessee to say that the lessor had nothing in the tenements at the time of the lease, except the lease be made by deed indented, in which case such plea lieth not for the lessee to plead." Bowma v. Taylor (2 A. & E. 278) shews that there may be an estoppel by matter of recital. Where the matter arises on the pleadings, the estoppel may be taken advantage of on demurrer; as to which, Lawson v. Trimmer (1 A. & E. 792) and Ghanter v. Leese (4 M. & W. 295) were referred to. He then argued that the traverse was improper in being confined to the time of making the deed; but this is here omitted, as the opinion of the Court was expressed only on the first point."

Byles, Serjt. contrà, admitted that the defendant would have been estopped if the plaintiff had contented himself in setting out in the declaration the deed and recital; but that having thought proper to allege a substantive allegation by way of inducement, the defendant was entitled to traverse it. "Palmer v. Ekins (2 Ld Raym. 1551): "If the defendant plead nil habuit in tenementis, and the plaintiff replies habuit, &c. the jury may find the truth, notwithstanding the indenture."

Tindal, C J.—The plaintiff may, if he thinks proper, waive the estoppel and go to trial. Suppose the plaintiff had replied to the indenture and relied on the estoppel, would not the defendant have been estopped? If so, may he not bring it before the Court by demurrer?

Byles, Serjt.—The defendant is thereby deprived of rejoining fraud. If he had not traversed this allegation, he would have gone to trial with it admitted.

Tindal, C.J.—The action is on the covenant; if defendant entered into it, what does it signify whether such allegation is admitted or not? Palmer v. Ekins shews that, if the estoppel appears on the record, it need not be replied.

Byles, Serjt.—There is no identity between the shares in the introductory part of the declaration and the shares mentioned in the deed.

Maule, J.—If the shares are different, then no estoppel will arise. Judgment for the plaintiff.

Doe dem. Morgan v. Powell and Another.

"I agree to let and grant a lease" are not terms of actual demise, but an agreement merely.

Talfourd, Serjt. shewed cause. The first question was whether the document, which bore date the 2nd February, 1838, was an actual demise of certain coal-mines, or only an agreement for a lease. There was no evidence to raise the implication of a tenancy. The agreement stated that the proprietor of the coal-mines agreed for his executors, &c. "to let and grant a lease" to the plaintiff of all his coal-mines in the parish of Aberdare, at 9d. per ton, customary weight for shipping purposes in the county of Monmouth. This was not a lease giving a present interest, but only an agreement to execute a lease in futuro. Something uncertain was to be ascertained. It was a mere incipient note of that which might be enforced in equity, but has no force in law.

Cases cited: Perring v. Brook (1 M. & Rob. 510); Morgan v. Bissell (3 Taunt. 65).

Byles, Serjt. in support.—There is no case in which an agreement for a lease has been held applicable to mining property. Here no surface-land was granted, and the agreement could only operate as a license.

Case cited. Jones v. Reynolds (1 Q. B. 506).

Sir T. Wilde, Serjt. contrà.—This is a lease. The term is to commence from the date of the agreement, beginning on the 2nd Feb. and to continue for seventy years. The grantee is to begin to work before the 24th of June, and is also empowered to put an end to the term on giving six months' notice: that shews that he had a present interest. The rent is to commence at a certain time, the period at which the lease is to be granted, which is to be as soon as it can be prepared. It was intended that the parties should take a present interest and occupy under the agreement, which would consequently have the operation of a lease.

Cases cited: Poole v. Bentley (12 East, 168); Doe v. Groves (15 East, 245); Doe v. Benjamin (9 A. & E. 644); Doe dem. Pearson v. Rees (1 Moo. & Scott, 259; 8 Bingham, 178); Doe dem. Jackson v. Ashburner (5 T. R. 163); Doe dem. Boscawen v. Bliss (4 Taunt. 735); Jones v. Reynolds (1 Q. B. 506); Goodtitle v. —— (1 T. R.)

Tindal, C. J. delivering judgment.—On the best construction which I can give to this instrument, I think it amounted to an agreement only. The first question is, are these words of actual demise? and next, was it intended that immediate possession should be taken of the premises? "I agree to let and grant a lease," is an expression which throws at least some doubt upon the point whether there was an intention of present demise. The plaintiff also agreed to accept a formal lease as soon as it could be prepared. This seems to me to throw as much doubt upon the intention of the party to act upon a mere instrument like the present, that I should rather say, if I had to determine the question upon this point only, that the words of the instrument amounted to granting a future lease. But then comes the next question, whether there was any immediate possession intended to be taken? I think not, and that the nonsuit was right.

The other judges concurred. Rule discharged.

BUSH and ANOTHER v. SAYER.

The mere fact of an attorney of the court bringing an action for the amount of his bill, which bill is for business, the items of which are not taxable by the Court, but which under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, are to be taxed by another court, will not give the Court jurisdiction, on the ground of the attorney being one of its officers, to tax his bill.

Talfourd, Serjt. shewed cause against a rule nisi to rescind an order made by Coltman, J. by which certain bills of costs of the plaintiffs had been directed to be taxed. The order had been made under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37. The bills had been delivered more than twelve months, not signed, but were accompanied by a letter referring to them. The delivery was in March 1843, and in May 1844, Coleridge, J. had refused an application to tax one of the bills, on the ground of not having jurisdiction. The plaintiffs subsequently brought an action in this court, to recover the amount of their bill, which was not taxable before the late Act, and the action being so brought in this court, the learned judge (Coltman) conceived that he had jurisdiction to make the order. A petition had been dismissed by the Master of the Rolls, praying for an order to have the bills re-delivered and signed; but that decision had proceeded upon the principle that the delivery was sufficient, in consequence of the bills being accompanied by the letter referring to them. When the order was made by the learned judge, he was of opinion that there were special circumstances under which, by the authority of the statute, he might make the order. It was a matter of surprise this order should be opposed; as, if the cause went to trial, the Court and the jury would, in effect, tax the items; or, failing that, it would become the subject of reference. The statute is retrospective, and does not take away the common law right and jurisdiction of the court in which an action is brought by one of its officers, over that officer. The object of the statute was to provide for every species of business where the client desired to have the bill taxed. The Master of the Rolls has jurisdiction now over bills for business done in neither court, such as conveyancing. But there is nothing in the statute to take away the antecedent power and jurisdiction of the Common Law courts. It may be said this bill cannot be referred to be taxed, because delivered twelve months before application made. But if so, that would raise the question whether there were, in this case, special circumstances. [ERLE, J.—You contend that this Court has, under the new statute, jurisdiction when an action is brought. Suppose a bill not taxable but by reason of action brought, has the Court from that fact jurisdiction?] No, my lord, I mean to say, the circumstance of an action being brought, that which was not antecedently taxable, but the subject-matter being made taxable by the statute, gives the learned judge jurisdiction. [MAULE, J.—In this bill, the items are not taxable in this court. It would be a curious thing to say, that by bringing an action this Court could tax items not taxable in this court.] The effect of that would be, the action is to be brought in one court, and the costs to be taxed in another. [MAULE, J.—Bringing an action will not give jurisdiction where there is a proper tribunal for trying the question. The jurisdiction is in the equity judges, unless you can shew we have concurrent jurisdiction.]

Rule absolute.

GOODALL v. POLHILL.

Bill of exchange—Notice—Agency.

Shee, Serjt. moved for a rule nisi why the verdict in this cause, which had been found for the plaintiff, should not be entered for the defendant. The action had been tried by Cresswell, J. during the present Term, and had been brought to recover the amount of a bill of exchange for 120*l.*; the plea being, that no notice of dishonour had been given to the defendant, the drawer. The bill bore several foreign indorsements, and there was a memorandum on the face of the bill to apply to the plaintiff in case of need. The bill was presented on the 2nd Feb. and dishonoured. It was paid by the plaintiff on the 3rd Feb. for the honour of De Koss Rylandt, at Bruges, and on that day was sent by the plaintiff to them by the foreign post; they received the bill in due course, and by the earliest post returned it to the plaintiff, who received it on the 8th Feb. and gave notice on that day. The notice is not sufficient. (Daly v. Slatter, 4 C. & P. 200.) [MAULE, J.—The objection here is, he took an additional day.] This notice was not in time. If the plaintiff was an agent at all, he was an agent for all purposes, not only to pay, but to give notice. But he is not an agent at all. The person who pays a bill for the honour of another is the indorsee of the bill, and it is only in that character he can sue here. (Mertens v. Winnington, 1 Esp. 112; Chitty on Bills of Exchange, 509; Code de Commerce, 159.)

Rule nisi.

ABBOTT v. DOUGLAS.

Byles, Serjt. moved for a rule nisi why the judgment on a warrant of attorney on annuity-deeds should not be set aside, and the annuity-deeds given up, on such terms as should be suggested by the Court. The annuity had been granted on a loan effected in 1828, and for which it was agreed 50*l.* a year should be given; the security to be the assignment of the office and fees of the situation of registrar of the archdeaconry of Norfolk.

The grounds on which the rule was moved for were:—

1st. That the consideration was not properly stated in the memorial.

2nd. The whole transaction was illegal and void, because the payment of the annuity is secured by the illegal assignment of an office and its profits.

3rd. That a portion of the consideration money was illegally retained.

4th. There is a covenant in the deed to allow the grantee to take one shilling in the pound out of the fees of the office.

Ex parte FYNDLATER.

Attorney's bill—Taxation.

Byles, Serjt. moved for a rule nisi, why an attorney's bill should not be taxed. The bill had been delivered and paid within two days of the twelve months, under protest. [MAULE, J.—You surely ought to shew yourself, in your affidavit, that you are within the twelve months.] The application was made on the ground of special circumstances, and the special circumstance here was the protest. Rule refused.

LANGLEY v. FAIRCLOUGH.

Where the plaintiff proceeds to trial, and is nonsuited in consequence of the absence of his attorney and witnesses, the Court will not set the nonsuit aside; the record in such a case should have been withdrawn.

Talfourd, Serjt. shewed cause against the rule for a new trial in this cause, on the ground that the attorney for the plaintiff had been prevented from being present at the trial. The affidavit set forth the facts of the cause of the delay, alleging the misconduct of one of the witnesses.

The question was, whether, under the circumstances, any indulgence ought to be allowed.

Dowling, Serjt. contrà, stopped by the Court.

TINDAL, C.J.—The plaintiff had the power, when the cause was called on, to withdraw the record. He has not chosen to do so, and we do not think it right to take from the defendant that right to the position he has obtained by having a nonsuit.

Rule discharged with costs.

Wednesday, Nov. 20.

BURGESS v. BEAUMONT.

Declaration for breach of an agreement to maintain the plaintiff as a governess to the defendant's children. A plea alleging, as a justification, that the plaintiff was dishonest, immoral, and unfit for the situation, is bad for uncertainty, in not particularizing any act of dishonesty or immorality.

The declaration was for the breach of an agreement by which, in consideration that the plaintiff would act as governess to the defendant's children, and, in the meanwhile, provide herself with masters, and fit herself for the situation, the defendant promised to supply her with certain sums of money for her maintenance.

Plea—That the defendant entered into the agreement on the representation of the plaintiff that she was an honest, moral, and fit person for the situation of governess of defendant' children. The plea then alleged that, before breach, the fact was that the plaintiff was dishonest, immoral, and unfit, and had become a person whom it would have been very improper for the defendant to have employed as governess for his children, and therefore the contract had been rescinded. To this plea there was a special demurrer, on the ground that the plea did not specify any acts of immorality or dishonesty.

Talfourd, Serjt. in support of the demurrer, cited I'Anson v. Stuart (1 T. R. 748); and Jones v. Stevens (11 Price, 235).

Byles, Serjt. contrà, drew a distinction between cases of contract like the present and libel, where the defendant is a wrongdoer; citing Young v. Murphy (3 Bing. N. C. 54).

The COURT, however, said that the plea was too general, as under it the plaintiff would have to be prepared with evidence of her conduct during the whole time since the making of the contract, without knowing on what particular act the defendant intended to rely. Judgment for plaintiff.

GRIFFITHS v. DUNNETT.

Declaration for assault and battery, and forcing and compelling plaintiff, then being weak and sick, to stand on deck for an hour in an upright position.

Plea pleaded to the forcing and compelling, &c. alleging a justification. Held bad, as being pleaded to matter of aggravation only.

Declaration, for assault and battery, and forcing and compelling plaintiff, then being weak and sick, to stand on deck for an hour in an upright position.

Plea pleaded as to the forcing and compelling the plaintiff to stand, &c., that defendant was the master of a vessel in which the plaintiff was a mariner; and then justifying the same on account of mutinous and riotous conduct of the plaintiff. To this plea there was a demurrer.

Channell, Serjt. was called on by the Court to support the plea; he submitted that "forcing and compelling" included an assault.

The COURT said it was only matter of aggravation, and therefore the plea was bad.

Judgment for plaintiff.

EDGELL v. CURLING.

A writ of subpœna ad testificandum is void if tested in vacation instead of Term.

The declaration, after alleging the pending of a cause between the plaintiff and one Spencer, and that such proceedings were had that the cause came on to be tried on the 19th Dec. 1843, stated, that a writ of subpœna duces tecum was sued out before the trial, and served on the defendant, and that the defendant was then paid a reasonable sum for his attendance as a witness. The declaration then alleged that the attendance of the defendant and the production of the documents mentioned in the subpœna were material to the trial of the cause, and that the defendant neglected to attend or produce the documents, and that on account of such neglect the plaintiff was obliged to withdraw the record.

The defendant in his plea set out the writ of subpœna, the teste of which was "at Westminster, the 6th day of December, in the 7th year of our reign;" and then alleged that the writ being tested in vacation instead of term time, was void in law. To this plea the plaintiff demurred.

Channell, Serjt. in support of the demurrer.—Ordinarily writs were only tested in term time, but exceptions had been made as to this, by the 2 Wm. 4, c. 39, s. 12, and the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 67, s. 2, and it would be contended, on the other side, that the present did not come within those exceptions. If not within the letter, it was within the equity of those statutes, and it seemed reasonable that, as the jury process and writs of execution might be tested on the day on which they were issued, the writ of subpœna might be tested so also. At all events, the writ was not absolutely void, but the defective teste was only an irregularity. Shirley v. Wright (2 Salk. 700) will be relied on by the defendant; there Holt, C. J. says, "If a writ of execution bear teste out of Term, the sheriff is justifiable, and yet shall not be liable to an action of escape, for it is a void writ." Hart v. Weston (5 Burr. 2586), which was the case of a latitat, was also referred to.

Sir Thomas Wilde, who appeared for the defendant, was not called on—

The COURT saying that a subpœna was as much a process as a latitat, and must equally be sued out only when the Court is sitting.

Judgment for the defendant.

REGISTRATION APPEALS.

BOROUGH OF WESTMINSTER.

PITTS, Appellant, v. SMELEY, Respondent.

By the COURT.—The case seems to state only evidence, and no facts. The case must be sent back to the revising barrister for correction.

BOROUGH OF TEWKESBURY.

WHITHORN, Appellant, v. THOMAS, Respondent.

Decisions of Election Committees of the House of Commons are not authorities in appeals heard in this court.

The residence of a claimant to vote in a borough must be bonâ fide; paying a weekly sum for the use of a bed-room, the party's residence being in another town, and the payment being made merely for the purpose of acquiring a vote, is not sufficient, the Court holding such a residence to be merely colourable.

The appellant claimed to have his name inserted in the list of freemen for the borough of Tewkesbury. The claimant and his family resided in Gloucester, which is more than seven miles from Tewkesbury. With the object of obtaining a vote in the latter borough, he paid to a Mr. Sproule, who was the agent for one of the sitting members of the borough, the sum of 9d. a week for the use of a furnished bed-room, with a closet six feet by three feet, of which he kept the key. Between January and July, 1844, he kept some wine samples in it. He had slept, during that period, in the bed-room, and, during the year 1844, sixteen times, on the occasion of his coming to Tewkesbury on business. He had never taken any meals there, and Mr. Sproule never let lodgings to any other person, and the arrangement was made for the purpose of qualifying the appellant as a voter for the borough. The barrister decided that the vote was bad. If the Court should be of a contrary opinion, the voter's name to be placed on the list of freemen of the borough.

Byles, Serjt. for the appellants.—The purpose of this residence being merely to gain a vote will not disqualify. It is immaterial what the motive of the tenant was, the meaning of the term residence is defined in Rex v. Sargent (5 T. R. 466); Col. Chaquers (1 Peck Elec. Ca. 64 and 389), which is a decision of the House of Commons. [TINDAL, C. J.—As far as the reasoning goes you may use it, but as an authority it will not be received here.] With respect to residence, it would be no objection that a gentleman residing in London should take a house in Brighton, and sleep there occasionally; that would be a residence sufficient to qualify. The nature of the residence in this case was quite sufficient; the party had slept in Tewkesbury twelve times during the half-year in which residence is required by the Act of Parliament. This is within the old cases where inhabitancy is required under the 13 and 14 Car. 1, c. 12, the question turning upon where the parties sleep, Rex v. Castleton (Burr. Set. Ca. 569); Rex v. The Inhabitants of Brighton (5 T. R. 188). Here the claimant slept the four nights immediately in the beginning of the half-year. [MAULE, J.—He may have slept the first four nights, but there was nothing to shew the animus revertendi.] There was always the intention to occupy when the claimant came to Tewkesbury on business. Fraud is never presumed unless found by the revising barrister. Here a portion of the house is actually hired. The claimant might bring an action of trespass. Here no abuse could follow from allowing this vote, because municipal rights cannot be acquired, except by parties having an immediate connection in the borough.

Cockburn, Q.C. for the respondent.—The argument that no abuse could take place by admitting this vote is unfounded. It was one of the objects of the Reform Act to destroy the votes of non-resident freemen. If the Court hold this to be a sufficient residence, all the evils which the 2 Wm. 4, c. 45, was intended to cure would be renewed. Rex v. Richmond (6 T. R. 560) was a much stronger case than the present, for here the party was never any thing more than a guest. The definition of the word reside is laid down in Rex v. The Inhabitants of North Curry (4 B. & C. 959). The fact of Mr. Sproule being an agent of one of the sitting members shews that the claim is not bonâ fide. The residence here is not for the purpose of residence, but merely colourable for the purpose of obtaining a vote, and therefore not such a residence as that contemplated by the legislature.

Byles, Serjt. in reply.

TINDAL, C. J. delivered judgment.—This question arose on the 27th section of the 2 Wm. 4, c. 45. By the proviso at the end of the section it was enacted, that in order to qualify the elector to vote, he must have resided six calendar months next previous to the 31st of July within such city, borough, &c. Now the question is, whether upon the facts stated in the case there is enough to say that the revising barrister has done wrong, and I hold it not to be so. In point of law, did this amount to a residence? It appears to me no such conclusion can be drawn from the facts. I do not mean to say that the object and motive of a man's residing in a borough can be supposed for a moment to detract from the legal right to be placed on the register. The question will always be, whether there has been a sufficient bonâ fide residence. On the present occasion, certain facts were stated, and from them the revising barrister formed his conclusion. It must be assumed that none more favourable for the appellant existed than were found in the case. What then were the facts on which the Court is called upon to say that in point of law the appellant resided in Tewkesbury. That he had a residence in Gloucester was beyond all doubt. It was there where his wife and family lived. All that is stated as to the borough of Tewkesbury is, that Mr. Sproule, an agent of one of the sitting members of the borough, agreed to let the appellant have the use of a furnished bed-room at the rate of 9d. a week, together with a dark closet, six feet by three. First of all, the mere payment of this equivalent, or satisfaction, that would not make such a residence as that required by the Legislature. Next, the mere occupation of a dark closet, keeping the key, that would not constitute a residence. Residence is something more than that; it must mean an actual occupation by being there some time by himself or by his family. There must be an animus residendi. Here the claimant has slept in the bed-room sixteen times during the last twelve months. It is not at all stated when he slept the first four nights, and as to the other twelve, they took place within the last half-year terminating in the month of July. It might have been on the last twelve days. Is there to be no distinction exercised in adjudicating upon facts? I think the revising barrister was a judge upon the occasion, and had a right to have laid before him the various facts, and it was for him to say whether there was an animus residendi. I think the revising barrister, finding no other facts but those before him, has drawn the right conclusion, and that his decision must be affirmed.

The other judges delivered similar judgments.

Decision affirmed, with costs.

SOUTH LANCASHIRE.

GADSBY, Appellant; WARBURTON, Respondent.

Stating the name of the place of abode of the objector as such place of abode is described in the list of voters is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Act.

In this case the respondent's name was on the list of voters for the southern division of the county. A notice of objection to his vote had been sent by the appellant in the following form: "To Mr. Samuel Warburton, of Newton, near Hyde, Cheshire.—Take notice that I object to your name being retained in the Harpule list of voters for the southern division of the county of Lancaster. Dated, &c. Signed John Gadsby, of Poplar-grove, Didsbury, in the register of voters for the township of Manchester," and his place of abode was there stated to be Poplar-grove, Didsbury. The revising barrister held the notice of objection to be insufficient, conceiving that something more was required to be added to the objector's place of abode, as "Lancashire," or "near Manchester," and he retained the respondent's name on the list without calling upon him to prove his qualification.

Cockburn, Q. C. and Kinglake, Serjt. fo. the appellant.—The first question was, was the description of the objector's place of abode sufficient? Secondly, if not sufficient in itself, was it rendered so in consequence of the description being the same as that contained in the notice of claim? Here the objector has strictly followed the directions of the 6 Vict. c. 18, sch. A, No. 5. The object of the statute was to enable the party objected to to identify the objector. Even if the description were incorrect, still, being exactly the same as that described on the list of voters, he is properly described in the notice of objection.

Cardwell, contrà.—The objector was not sufficiently described. There may be many Didsburys in the same county, as there were many Newtons. It was important the objector should be identified, for the purposes of costs, in cases where they might be given. There is nothing in this case to justify the Court in finding that the revising barrister was concluded in law from finding the notice insufficient. Parties objecting should be held strictly to the letter of the Act, otherwise great abuse of the power of objecting would take place. Here, too, the objector might have changed his place of abode, so that his actual residence, and that described on the register, would be different.

Cockburn, in reply.

TINDAL, C. J. delivering judgment.—The test by which to know whether this notice is good in law, is to place it side by side with the notice in schedule No. 5 of the 6 Vict. c. 18. In this case there is an exact compliance with the form. It is quite sufficient to describe the objector as of the township of Didsbury. It has been objected that there might, by possibility, be two townships called Didsbury, and that, therefore, the objector should have added Lancashire to that contained in his notice. But the object of the Legislature was, that the party's name should appear on the list of the county voters, that being the place where the party would naturally look for it. It seems to me sufficient in this case, inasmuch as the appellant's name and place of abode were upon that list.

The other judges gave judgment to the same effect.

Decision reversed.

GADSBY, Appellant, v. BARROW, Respondent.

A party claiming to vote as a yearly tenant of the value of 50l. must hold the whole of the qualifying premises under one landlord. Having premises under different landlords, the aggregate rent of which amounts to more than 50l. is not sufficient.

The respondent's qualification was described on the list of voters for the county as being "land and building at a rental of 50l. and upwards." The holding was under two different landlords, to one of whom he paid 35l. a year and to the other 20l. a year. It was objected that he did not occupy as tenant under one and the same landlord, and that he could not unite the two occupations so as to qualify him to vote as occupying tenant of land or tenements for which he was bonâ fide liable to a yearly rent of not less than 50l. The revising barrister decided that the respondent was such occupier within the meaning of the Act, and the objection was disallowed.

Cockburn, Q. C. and Kinglake, Serjt. for the appellant.—The question arises on the 2 Wm. 4, c. 45, s. 20, and it is quite clear the Legislature intended that the holding, to qualify, should be under one and the [illegible] "yearly rent" in the [illegible] the importance [illegible] the condition that the [illegible] qualification under one landlord [illegible] Reg. Cases, 27) in [illegible] in favour of this view. The [illegible] are to be read in the [illegible] a combined rent of 35l. and 20l. a year does not constitute a rent of 50l. a year within the meaning of the statute.

Cardwell, contrà.—The words of the 20th section, interpreted by the 27th section, must necessarily mean lands, whether held under the same or different landlords. In this case the party was clearly within the 27th section, and the revising barrister could not have excluded him from the list of voters.

Cockburn, in reply.

TINDAL, C. J. delivering judgment.—The question turns upon the proper construction to be given to the latter part of the 20th section of the 2 Wm. 4, c. 45, that section giving, for the first time, a new right of voting. The words being "who shall occupy, as tenant, &c. for which he shall pay a bonâ fide yearly rent of not less than 50l." and looking at these words, I think the sense of them to be, not only in grammar but in legal construction, that the party must be liable to a single rent of not less than 50l. The other rights of voting conferred by the legislature in the same section are in furtherance of that being the construction. The 27th section does, in fact, support this reading of the 20th. If there had been any intention to alter the character of the qualification, it would have appeared in the 6 Vict. c. 18. On these grounds it appears to me that the party is not entitled to be in the list of voters, and that, therefore, the construction of the section by the revising barrister is wrong.

BOROUGH OF TOTNESS.

CUMMING, Appellant, TOMS, Respondent.

The stamped duplicate of the notice of objection required by the 100th section of the 6 Vict. c. 18, may be sufficient for the purposes of evidence before the revising barrister either by the party posting such notices, or any other person.

The question in this case was, whether, under the 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 100, the duplicate notice of objection, which is required to be stamped by the postmaster, must be produced by the party who posted the notice. The revising barrister had decided that the party posting the notice was the only person who could prove the delivery.

Cockburn, Q. C. for the appellant.—In this case it makes no difference whether the stamped duplicate is proved by one person or another. The section states that the production, &c. shall be evidence of the notice of objection having been duly posted. All that is intended is that a stamped notice shall be produced. [TINDAL, C. J.—Credit is given to the stamp.] The alteration in the practice was made with a view to obviate the difficulty of proving service under the old system, and the statute should receive a liberal construction.

Kinglake, Serjt. contrà.

Cockburn, in reply, stopped by the Court.

TINDAL, C. J.—I can see no reason why a general maxim of law, qui facit per alium facit per se, should not apply here. If you could shew any mischief that could arise by not calling the party, the case might be different. The whole faith and credit is given to the stamp of the postmaster, and the stamp remains the same whether proved by the clerk or the principal.

The other judges gave similar judgments.

Revising barrister's signature—Jurisdiction of the Court.

Kinglake, Serjt. renewed his application to the Court to receive a statement of facts in this case, which it was alleged the revising barrister had received as the facts agreed to by the appellant and respondent, but which the revising barrister had been prevented from signing by his sudden decease.

The COURT held that the case, being unsigned by the revising barrister, it must be considered as a matter in fieri, and that it had no jurisdiction.

NORTHERN DIVISION OF NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.

DAVIS, Appellant; WADDINGTON, Respondent.

Where the freehold claimed for arises out of the foundation of an hospital, the charter of incorporation giving the [illegible] them, the power to [illegible] convenient to them, [illegible] tion have not [illegible] of expulsion, an estate for life.

The appellant claimed to be placed on the list of voters for the county, for a freehold house and garden, as principal of Jesus Hospital and the Burbidge, with twenty-three other persons, claimed for appointments as inmates of the hospital. The estate for founding the hospital had been left to five trustees, who were incorporated by the names of Governors of Jesus College; 85*l.* per annum was paid to the principal, and 6*s.* a week to each of the inmates. The principal has a house and garden within the hospital, and each inmate has a room and a piece of ground of the value of more 40*s.* a year. The charter gave the power to the governors to "elect, nominate, assign, appoint, license, deprive, expel, and amove," the principal and inmates, "so often as it shall seem to be convenient to them, or to the greater number of them." They were also empowered to make by-laws for the order, government, punishment, expulsion, amotion, and direction of the principal and inmates. By-laws to this effect were made, but there was no instance of an expulsion under them. The by-laws are still in operation. The objection taken before the revising barrister was, that the power of amotion by the governors was still in full force, and was not limited by the by-laws; and that the principal and inmates had no freehold estate by virtue of their appointment. The revising barrister decided that the objection was valid.

Maunsell, for the appellant.—In this case the appointment is for life, defeasible only on the infraction of the by-laws. The charter gives the governor and corporation the power to appoint and to remove as it seems convenient to them. The word "convenient" has the same meaning now as then, in the time of Elizabeth, and is not to be construed like the phrase de bene placito. The by-laws must receive a contemporaneous exposition (The Mayor of London v. Long, 1 Camp. 22); and in the Governors of Lucton School v. Scarlett, it was held that, in ascertaining the meaning and effect of a charter, contemporaneous documents, proceedings in causes relating to it, and parol testimony, may be resorted to in order to explain and give to the charter a construction. (Rex v. Varlo, Cowp. 248; Mayor of Hull v. Horner, ib. 102; Rex v. Pasmore, 3 T. R. 288, per Buller, J.)

Byles, Serjt. contrà.—Here there is clearly no estate for life. The legal fee simple is in the corporation; and, not only the legal but the equitable estate also. This is shewn by the words of the charter: The governors shall "elect, nominate, and assign, appoint, license, deprive, expel, and amove, the said principal and the twenty-four infirm men for the time being so often as it shall seem convenient to them or the majority of them." The words are, "toties quoties sibi aut eorum numero majori fore conveniens videtur." It cannot be said these persons have an estate for life under the operation of these words.

Maunsell, in reply, citing Wilkinson v. Malin and Others (Tyrw. 544).

TINDAL, C.J. delivering judgment.—It appears to me, that the parties who claimed to be placed upon the register did not take a freehold estate. The charter gives the governors the power, whenever they think proper, of nominating and electing the principal and inmates, and then gives the power of removing them so often as it shall seem convenient to the greater number—"aut eorum numero majori conveniens videtur." I can scarcely conceive words more expressive of the intention of the framers than are contained in this charter. The governors are empowered also to make by-laws for the regulation of the hospital; which by-laws are made, in which there is the power of amoving for any offence or for any lawful or reasonable cause. I can conceive many cases of removal, without the party removed having committed an offence; as in the case of one of the inmates becoming suddenly rich. It seems, too, both by the terms of incorporation and the terms of the by-laws, the party did not take a freehold estate.

The other judges delivered similar judgments.

NORTHERN DIVISION OF NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.

SIMPSON, Appellant; WILKINSON, Respondent.

Persons occupying rooms in an ancient hospital, there being no documents to shew whether by feoffment or charter of incorporation, will be presumed to hold by feoffment, and will have such a freehold interest as will confer a vote for the county.

Henry Allen, the voter objected to by the appellant, was on the register of voters for the northern division of the county; his place of abode was described to be "Lord Burghley's Hospital, St. Martin's, Stamford Baron," and the qualification "freehold tenement or room." Allen was appointed one of the bedesmen of the hospital by the Marquis of Exeter. The hospital is freehold, and each bedesman has a room, of which he keeps the key. No bedesman has ever been known to be removed; no deed or enrolment under the 39th Eliz. c. 5, or any letters patent, are known to exist; but there are rules which contain very minute and stringent regulations on the government of the hospital. It was objected before the revising barrister, that there was no freehold estate; that if there was a freehold estate, the bedesmen could only have it as a corporation aggregate; and, thirdly, that if they had any freehold, it was an estate of joint tenancy in the hospital, and not a separate estate in the rooms. The revising barrister decided that a legal foundation might be presumed, not necessarily investing the claimants with a corporate character; and that the bedesmen had a separate estate in their rooms.

Byles, Serjt. for the appellant.—The bedesmen in this case have no freehold. Whether they have a freehold estate depends upon 8 Hen. 6, c. 7, and 10 Hen. 6, c. 2. [J. Hildyard.—I shall not contend they have any legal estate.] Then the question is, have they an equitable estate? They cannot sell, mortgage, nor is it extendable under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 11. [ERLE, J.—Suppose they had had twenty years' possession and they were not turned out, could they not maintain ejectment?] No, supposing it turned out the estate was in trustees. [J. Hildyard.—The barrister has found that they have such an estate as does not invest them with a corporate character.] They have no equitable estate, inasmuch as whatever estate they have is not subject to execution, and could not be sold or extended to debts. The rules referred to in the case were made before the passing of the 39 Eliz. c. 5, and no hospital could be erected before that statute passed, except by the Queen's license. Here there was no legal right, but a mere act of kindness on the part of the Exeter family. The bedesmen being in fact men in the receipt of alms, are disqualified by the 36 sec. 2 Wm. 4, c. 45.

J. Hildyard, contrà.—The main point raised by the counsel for the appellant is one which the Court cannot entertain. When the monasteries were put down in the time of Elizabeth, there were two modes for providing for hospitals for the poor—by feoffments and by incorporation. The revising barrister has decided that in this case the provision was made by feoffment, and the late Act, 6 Vict. c. 18, provides against this Court entertaining the effect or admissibility of evidence. Stopped by the Court.

TINDAL, C. J. delivering judgment.—The only question for the opinion of the Court is, whether the revising barrister was wrong in point of law when he decided that the bedesmen took by way of feoffment. He was justified not only in point of law, but by the facts of the case. He was only to suppose that the feoffment had been made before the 2nd statute, and a license granted; and he had a right to assume that it had been granted. Quite clear this was prior to the 2nd statute, and the law presumes, after such a lapse of time, a feoffment.

The other judges delivered judgment to the same effect.

Decision affirmed.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.

NUNN, Appellant; DENTON, Respondent.

A building which contains a room, in which a servant of the owner has slept, and which is afterwards converted into a house during the registration year, may be described as a house.

The respondent claimed in respect of the occupation of a house and land. The lower part of the building consists of a cow-house and stable; in the upper part of a room there was a chamber, with a fire-place and a window. There was a staircase from the stable to the chamber; the only entrance to the building being by folding-doors, opening into the cowhouse. The agent of the respondent put his brother-in-law into the building, when he slept in the chamber above mentioned. In December 1843 part of the stable was made into a room, having a fire-place and a door opening into the pasture. The agent continuing to reside in the building, the revising barrister inserted the name of the respondent in the list for "house and land."

Manning, Serjt. for the appellant.—The question is, 1st, whether this is a "building" or a "house?" but the more important question is, if the Court are of opinion that it was a building within 27th sec. Wm. 4, c. 45, in December 1843, whether it did not cease to be a building and become a house; because, if a house, it must have been occupied twelve months, and the facts shew that has not been the case here. The clause of successive occupation does not apply. There was no occupation, the party not being a domestic servant of the owner. [MAULE, J.—Is it necessary for the occupier to be a domestic servant? Would not a non-domestic servant do?] I submit not. [MAULE, J.—There is no doubt at all in this case.] There is another objection; the place of abode is stated "Rushbrook," and the revising barrister has decided that to be good which is bad on the face of it. Rushbrook may be in Cornwall.

TINDAL, C. J.—I do not think you have a right to make this objection. There might have been evidence at the time to explain this.

Byles, Serjt. contrà, stopped by the Court.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

CITY AND COUNTY OF LICHFIELD.

MOSS, Appellant; OVERSEERS OF ST. MICHAEL, LICHFIELD, Respondents.

Where a party has been omitted from the rates, although he is a joint occupier and partner with another, if it appear that the overseers did not know of his occupancy and did not intend to charge him, it is not a case of omission within the statute, and the 75th sec. of 6 Vict. c. 18, does not apply to such a case.

The appellant occupied a house with his father, jointly, twelve calendar months previously to the 31st of July, 1844. The appellant had been omitted from the last two rates; he had tendered the rates to the overseers, who were not aware the appellant occupied. The revising barrister was of opinion that the omission did not constitute an omission within the meaning of the 75th sec. of the 6 Vict. c. 18, and decided that the claim was not made out.

Byles, Serjt. for the appellant.—The question is, whether the claimant has not been virtually rated on the rates made within the last twelvemonth? The father and the son were joint occupiers. The 75th sec. of the 6 Vict. c. 18, carries the 27th sec. of the Reform Act a little further, by providing for cases of inaccurate and insufficient description. Here the parties were partners, and the name of one of the firm being on the rate, calling on one by the collector would be calling on all. (Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Hulme, 12 L. Jour. Mag. Ca. 100; 3 Wm. 3, c. 11, s. 6.) In the construction of that statute, the total omission of a name, provided the property was charged, was sufficient. [MAULE, J.—Whoever occupies it is charged; in the present case, they charge somebody else.] [ERLE, J.—They charge somebody else, and do not intend to charge him.]

Kinglake, Serjt. contrà, stopped by the Court.

TINDAL, C. J. delivering judgment.—This case does not fall within the 75th section of the 6 Vict. c. 18, which provides for a mistake or misnomer, or insufficient description. Two things must concur to give the right. The party must have been bonâ fide called upon to pay the rate, and must have paid it.

The rest of the Court concurred.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Thursday, Nov. 14.

STOKES v. SABINE and OTHERS.

Re-hearing.

Motion for re-hearing of a case on which the Court had pronounced a verdict as in the place of a jury.

This case had been heard at the sittings after the last Term. It had been brought before the Court by reference to them for their opinion, the Court to draw the same conclusions as a jury.

Jervis, Q.C. now moved for a rule to shew cause why the judgment, i. e. the quasi verdict pronounced by the Court, should not be set aside, and a new trial had, on the ground that the verdict of the Court had proceeded upon a document treated by them as material, but which was not in evidence before them. The case was a tithe commutation case, and had been referred to the Court, with a long list of documents which were to be regarded as in evidence.

It so happened that the document in question had been used in argument by counsel, and had been relied on in the judgment of the Court, but was not in evidence before them.

Jervis, Q. C. said he raised the objection at the time.

PARKE, B. said he had a note that the document had been relied on in the argument, but none of Jervis having objected.

The Court said the case (from the complication of facts) ought, however, to have come before them in the first instance, and intimated that they would not have it referred to them a second time.

The Application was quite novel.

Rule nisi for a re-hearing or new trial.

Norey v. Corbin.

Bill of exchange—Admission of drawing by admission of acceptance.

Gurney moved for a rule to shew cause why a judge's order to admit the drawing of a bill of exchange in this action should not be rescinded, and leave granted to add a plea traversing the indorsement.

The action was indorsee v. acceptor, and an order to admit the acceptance had been served and complied with, but the order was so framed as to admit also that the name of the drawer in the body of the bill was in his handwriting also.

Pollock, C.B., questioned the use of rescinding the order as to this, since the admission of the acceptance would import as much. It seemed that the bill had been accepted in blank; the plaintiff's attorney had refused to let defendant see the indorsement, and the motion as to the handwriting in the body was made with a view to the assistance it would afford to the additional plea. Rule nisi.

Ex parte Blundel.

Deodand—Motion to set aside on divers grounds.

Cowling moved, on behalf of Mr. Blundel, for a rule to shew cause why two deodands of 25*l*. each should not be returned and all proceedings quashed.

It appeared that two men were descending a pit in a basket; the basket was suspended by a rope, which was wound up by a steam-engine. The rope broke, the two men were killed, and the coroner's inquest imposed a deodand of two sums of 25*l*. upon the applicant, the owner of the rope, basket, and engine.

Cowling moved on several grounds:—

1. That the inquest had been taken by a wrong jury. The inquisition shewed that the jury had come from the county, whilst the inquest was held before the coroner for a borough.

2. Deodands are imposed on the rope, basket, and engine, though it does not appear that the engine had any thing at all to do with the deaths. The jury, indeed, find that all three were causes moving to the deaths; but Cowling submits that they do not shew facts to warrant this, and so have gone out of their province by delivering a conclusion as of law. (Reg. v. Brownlow, 11 A. & E. 119.)

3. That deodand is bad, because it is partly on the steam-engine, which is a fixture, whereas the deodand can only be on a chattel.

4. That deodand can only be on that part of a machine which has fallen to pieces, and so done the harm.

6. He submits Mr. Blundel is only liable for one deodand, since it was only one accident. In favour of this point he submitted (see De Officio Coronatoris), that as, anciently, the chattel causing the death used to be forfeited, so when, subsequently, the value of the chattel came to be substituted, only one value could be forfeited; but here the jury had imposed two forfeitures of the value, whilst they had found each forfeiture to be the value. (Reg. v. Eastern Counties Railway, 10 M. & W. 58, contrà.) Rule nisi.

Friday, Nov. 15.

Cook v. Stratford.

A jury is at liberty to make and act upon the same inferences from collateral facts as any reasonable man would make in the conduct of his own affairs. A plea that a bill of exchange was given to secure a sum of money, of which more than 100l. was lost at one sitting at vingt-un, and more than 100l. at one sitting at hazard, is not supported by evidence of hazard only, but such a plea may be amended to suit the facts.

Jervis and J. Henderson shewed cause against a rule obtained by Crowder, Q.C. to enter a verdict for the plaintiff.

The action was upon a bill of exchange for 500*l*. The defendant pleaded, under the statute of Charles, that the bill was given as a security for a sum of money of which more than 100*l*. had been lost at one sitting at vingt-un, and more than 100*l*. at another sitting at hazard. At the trial there was no evidence at all of vingt-un; there was evidence of hazard having been played on several occasions, and also some evidence to connect the bill in question with the sums so lost, but there was no positive evidence of more than 100*l*. having been lost at one sitting, though there were, from the stakes played for, and from the amount lost altogether in a short time, strong probabilities from which that fact might be inferred.

Pollock, C.B. at the trial, told the jury to find for the defendant, and then reserved power for the Court to enter a verdict for the plaintiff upon the plea as it stood, if they should think it wholly unsupported by evidence, and also, if they should think it might properly be amended so as to meet the evidence, to exercise the power of amendment in the same manner as he might have done at the trial.

Jervis, Q.C. and Henderson, for the plaintiff, cited 1 Starkie, 436; 1 Taunton, 146.

Crowder and Udall, contrà, contended that there was no evidence to support the plea under the statute to which it obviously referred, though there might have been under the statute of Anne; that the Court could not amend a plea pleaded under one statute so as to make it fit another; and that in a case of this sort, where a jury would almost of necessity be prejudiced, it would be highly dangerous to leave any thing to mere inference, of which positive evidence might have been given.

They cited Davis v. Pearce (8 Jurist, Q.B. 122; 1 Bing. N.C. 140).

Pollock, C.B.—There are two points to be considered: first, Is the plea proved as framed? If so, we ought not to permit the plaintiff to enter a verdict. Secondly, whether, if not proved, we ought to permit defendant to alter the plea? With respect to the first point, whether the plea was proved as framed, or rather, whether there was evidence to sustain it, that again divides itself into two questions. First, whether there was any evidence to sustain the allegation that more than 100*l*. was lost at one sitting. It has been said there was no evidence to warrant the jury in finding that fact. It appears to me that there was abundant evidence. It is hardly necessary to advert to elementary cases on the subject of evidence, for the purpose of establishing the proposition, that whatever collateral fact established by evidence will enable a person to infer with practical certainty, is a matter upon which a jury may exercise their judgment. For instance, I put the case of finding prisoners guilty of larceny on evidence of recent possession. The jury is told, in such a case, to consider whether they will not infer that the party in possession is the thief. It appears to me, that whenever a person reasonably acting in his own concerns would draw a conclusion, the jury are to draw the same conclusion if they think proper. In this case five bills for 500*l*. each are drawn on the same day. It must now be taken as admitted that these amounts were won at hazard. There is some evidence of one sitting at hazard; there is no evidence of any other time or place at which they played. The question is, whether the jury might reasonably draw the conclusion that more than 100*l*. was won at one sitting. It appears to me, that the probability was very great that all the money was won at one sitting; but, at all events, that more than 100*l*. was so. It is then said, that even if so much of the plea is supported by the evidence, yet, that the substance of it, which states the nature of the contract, is not so supported. I am of opinion that this objection is well founded. If the plea had stated a variety of circumstances, each constituting one defence, proof of any one of them would have supported the plea. But that is not so here. The whole of the circumstances together, only shew one defence,—that the contract was originally void. It becomes, therefore, necessary to ask for an amendment. Is this, then, an amendment which I, as judge at the trial, had power to allow? But for the new rules, the pleas would have been framed with every variety of statement. I think, therefore, it would be a great injustice if we did not give effect to the statute which was passed with the intention of alleviating the stringency of those rules, and I am clearly of opinion that this amendment could not have prejudiced or misled the plaintiff in the conduct of his case, or in the evidence which he would have to produce. As the plaintiff has succeeded in the point relating to the plea, as it stands at present, the rule must be discharged, upon the defendant's paying the costs of the amendment and also of this motion.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Rule discharged.

Clements v. Cullen.

Practice—Non-service of writ of summons is no ground for opposing a rule to compute.

Newton shewed cause against making absolute a rule to compute what was due for principal and interest on the bill of exchange in respect of which this action was brought. He urged that the defendant had not been served with the writ of summons. But the Court said that the irregularity (even admitting its existence) could not be urged in opposition to making the rule absolute. Rule absolute.

Joyner v. Collinson.

Practice—Affidavit to support an application that plaintiff gives security for costs on the ground of his being out of the jurisdiction must state the source of the information on which the application is founded.

Pashley shewed cause against Temple's rule, which called on the plaintiff to shew cause why plaintiff should not give security for defendant's costs herein.

The rule had been obtained on affidavit of the defendant, that the plaintiff, as he was "informed and believed," lived at Glasgow, out of the jurisdiction of the Court.

Temple, in support of his rule, contended that though ordinarily the source of the information should be denoted, yet, in this case, as the matter lay necessarily more within the knowledge of the plaintiff than of the defendant, it was not necessary; but

Parke, B. said:—It is not enough; you should have taken out a summons calling on plaintiff's attorney to state his residence.

Temple then asked for a stay of proceedings; but

The Court said he must go to chambers, and apply for further leave to plead.

Rule discharged, with costs.

Smith v. Monteith.

To a declaration on promises, the consideration of which is that plaintiffs shall procure the discharge of A B, then in custody at their suit, it is a bad plea that no debt was ever due from A B to plaintiffs, that his arrest was merely colourable, and that there was no doubtful question of law or fact between him and the plaintiffs.

This was a demurrer to a plea. The declaration stated, that, in consideration that the plaintiffs would discharge one Dunlop, then in custody of the sheriff at their suit, the defendants promised to pay a certain sum to the plaintiffs. It then alleged the discharge of Dunlop, and the breach of promise by defendants.

Plea—That there never was any debt due from Dunlop to the plaintiffs; that his arrest was merely colourable, and that there was no doubtful question of law or fact intended to be tried in the action.

James v. Jones.

Certificate for costs.

If judge enters in his notes "certificate for costs, if necessary," this, if occasion arises to require that certificate to be granted, is enough to authorize its being given.

This was a case which left room at the trial for the learned judge who tried the case to grant a certificate for costs, and he entered on his notes that certificate was to be granted "if necessary." He had accordingly afterwards granted his certificate, and a rule nisi had been obtained to set aside that certificate.

Gurney, B. now delivered the judgment of the Court, that as the entry had been made at the time of the trial it was to be deemed it had been made with the consent of the parties, and was equivalent to a certificate then actually granted. Rule dischaged.

Parfitt v. Thompson.

Insurance.

Total loss is sufficiently attributed to perils of the sea if it is stated that by perils of the sea the vessel was obliged to abandon her voyage, make for the nearest port, and was there totally lost.

Pollock, C. B. delivered the judgment of the Court in this case. It was that the declaration sufficiently stated the loss to have occurred by perils insured against, since it stated that the vessel was, by stormy winds, &c., obliged to abandon her voyage, and put into Gambia. That it was not necessary in the declaration to shew further that the antecedent perils were the cause why the vessel, when at Gambia, was unfit to proceed on her voyage. If the vessel, when at Gambia, was unfit to proceed, not from the perils it had undergone, but from other causes, this was matter of evidence. The declaration might have averred, in general terms, that the vessel had been obliged to make for Gambia, and was totally lost. Rule discharged.

Ex parte The Great Western Railway Company in the Matter of the Expenses of Mr. Palmer.

The Court of Exchequer has no authority to order taxation of an attorney's bill.

Martin, Q.C. shewed cause against the rule of Jervis, Q.C. which called on Palmer, and Rose, his attorney, to shew cause why Rose's bill of costs—the subject of an action by Rose against the Company—should not be referred to the Master for taxation.

The facts were, that the company had negotiated with Mr. Palmer touching the sale of some land to them, and had agreed to pay the costs of Mr. Palmer's attorney, Mr. Rose, by whose means the contracts were to be effected. Mr. Rose had accordingly effected divers contracts in this way and upon these terms, and had sent in his bill to the company.

The bill charged several heavy amounts in a lump, and did not give the items of each particular charge. The company refused to pay this bill. Mr. Rose, therefore, brought his action against them, and they now sought the taxation of his account.

There were affidavits in the case to shew the fairness of Mr. Rose's charges, but these are not material to the result, for the Court held that they had no authority to make the order. By 5 Vict. c. 5, their equitable jurisdiction was taken away; and under the late Attorneys Act, the application was to be made to the Court of Chancery.

Rule discharged with costs.

BUNN v. LEE.

New trial—Receipt for balance of an account of unspecified amount; should it be stamped?

This case was tried on Wednesday the 13th instant, before Pollock, C. B. Verdict for the defendant.

Knowles, Q. C. now moved, pursuant to leave reserved, to enter verdict for the plaintiff.

The action was for work and labour, the plea payment.

In proof of this plea, the following receipt was offered and received in evidence.

"1843, July 8.

"Received of G. Lee, the sum of 2*l.* 2*s.* 'being the balance of account up to this day for houses in Wellington-road.'"

It was unstamped, Knowles had therefore objected to it, and now the question was, whether it ought not to have been stamped as being a receipt for the balance of an account of unspecified amount. See Schedule to General Stamp Act, 55 Geo. 3, c. 182.

Rule nisi.

NORTON v. EDGELY.

Practice — Commission to examine witnesses — Party ought not to be required to shew his cross interrogatories to his opponent.

Martin, Q. C. shewed cause against Cleasby's rule, which called on the defendant to shew cause why an order made by Gurney, B. on the 9th of July last, should not be varied or rescinded, in respect that it ordered the plaintiff to deliver copies of cross interrogatories to defendant's attorney.

The defendant had prevented the plaintiff from proceeding to trial, by applying for a commission to examine witnesses, and had obtained the order in question. Since then the defendant had taken no step in the business.

The COURT, after having informed themselves that in the Court of Chancery cross interrogatories are not submitted to the inspection of the opponent, conceded so much of the application as requires the learned Judge's order to be varied, and order further, that it be rescinded, unless defendant bring the money into court within a fortnight, or give security to the satisfaction of the Master.

BROWN v. NELSON.

Arbitration — "Costs in the cause," as divided from "costs of reference," are costs up to the time of the reference.

Fish moved for a rule nisi, why the Master should not review his taxation of costs.

The cause had been referred at the trial to an arbitrator, who had power to deal with the costs. The arbitrator had awarded the costs of the cause to the plaintiff, and had divided the costs of the reference. The Master had treated the costs of the cause as including costs up to the time of the reference, and not after, and had treated the costs of the reference as being the costs of what took place before the arbitrator, commencing from that period.

Fish applied, in order that the costs of witnesses might be deemed costs in the cause; but

The COURT held with the Master.

Rule refused.

[Note.—In the above case, Fish tried to distinguish Taylor v. Lady Gordon (9 Bing. 570) from the present case, on the ground that there there were other matters in difference between the parties; but the Court did not concede this distinction. He tried to parallel the case to that of M'Intosh v. Bligh (1 Bing.), but the Court distinguished them on the ground that in that case the arbitrator had merely to grant a certificate, not make an award.]

RANDAL v. WHITE.

New Trial.

Pleading lesser sum in discharge of greater.

This case was tried before the sheriff.

Addison applied for a rule nisi for judgment non obstante veredicto, on the second issue.

The action was in debt; and the second plea was pleaded to the further maintenance of the action, and stated payment and receipt of a lesser sum since action brought in discharge of the whole debt.

Addison cited Cumber v. Warne (Smith's Leading Cases), in support of his motion. Rule nisi.

CAMPBELL v. POWNALL.

Particulars of demand—Application for the costs of delivering better particulars.

Cowling moved for a rule nisi, why the Master should not tax the plaintiff's costs, for better particulars given to the defendant. The usual order had been made for plaintiff to deliver fuller particulars of demand, on payment by defendant of the costs of so doing. The plaintiff in this case had given the particulars, but had not been paid his costs.

The COURT said the plaintiff should not have delivered the particulars, save on defendant's paying the costs; but as where there is an order to pay there is an authority to tax the costs, they would grant the rule. Rule nisi.

ROCKSEDGE v. CHANDLER.

Costs—The costs of obtaining the postea by defendant are costs in the cause.

J. W. Smith shewed cause against Gray's rule, which called on plaintiff to shew cause why plaintiff should not deliver the postea to the defendant.

The plaintiff had recovered on one of the issues, but substantially the cause was in favour of the defendant, and he was entitled to the postea.

J. W. Smith did not dispute the defendant's right to the postea, but asked the Court not to make the costs of the application to this rule costs in the cause. He said the defendant might have obtained the postea by asking it of the plaintiff.

POLLOCK, C. B. said the defendant might have obtained the postea perhaps at less expense, but who was to pay him for that expense? The plaintiff should have acquiesced at once on the rule nisi being obtained. Rule absolute.

M'DOWALL v. HUNTER.

A plea in suspension of a cause of action, that a bill of exchange has been given for and on account of it, must shew that the bill was a negotiable instrument.

Action for goods sold and delivered.

Plea That a bill had been given for and on account of the debt.

Demurrer—Assigning for special cause that the plea did not shew whether the bill was or was not a negotiable instrument.

Crompton, for plaintiff.

Flood, for defendant. Judgment for plaintiff.

DREW and ANOTHER v. AVERY and ANOTHER.

Trespass de bonis asportatis.

Plea—Justifying under a distress for rent due to the landlord.

Demurrer—Assigning for cause that the plea did not shew with certainty either that the term of the tenant was still continuing, or that the time allowed under the statute had not elapsed; and also, that it did not clearly shew the nature of the tenancy in respect of which the rent became due.

Corrie, for plaintiff.

Barstow, for defendant.

POLLOCK, C. B.—We are of opinion that it ought to have been shewn that the tenancy was still existing at the time of the distress. Although some of the allegations in the plea afford ground for inferring that such must have been the fact, the time of the Court is not to be occupied in making out the sense of a plea from all the allegations in it, but the averments ought to be clearly and distinctly made.

PARKE, B.—My present impression is, that you must allege what sort of a term it is; but at all events the allegation in this plea, that the term was still continuing, is only to be made out by inference, and that having been pointed out on special demurrer, I think we ought to hold the plea insufficient.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CLAY.

Chambers moved for a rule to shew cause why the Attorney-General or the Solicitor of the Customs should not furnish one of the defendants with particulars of the claim against him. The application was upon the ground that the defendant, who had formerly carried on business in partnership with his brother, had been entirely out of business since 1840, when the partnership was dissolved. The affidavits also stated that he had destroyed the books previous to the last six years. A number of cases were cited in support of the application, and the practice of the Court of Queen's Bench, and of all criminal courts, was stated to have been of late years in analogy with it. Alderson, B. having expressed some doubt as to what would be the remedy in case the Crown, after the Court had made such an order, refused to comply with it, the COURT granted a rule to shew cause.

Cases cited: Rex v. Hamilton (7 C. & P. 144); Rex v. Hodson (3 C. & P.); Attorney-General v. Weeks (Bunbury, 223); Attorney-General v. Lambert (5 Price, 386). Rule nisi.

HATE v. FLOWER.

Corrie moved to set aside proceedings. The writ of summons was addressed to defendants as executors. The declaration was against them in their personal character. This is irregular, although the converse of it is not. Rule nisi.

MOLD v. GRIFFITH.

Whitehurst, Q. C. shewed cause against a rule obtained for a new trial by Francillon, upon the ground that there was no privity of contract between plaintiff and defendant, and no evidence to go to the jury.

WELLS v. O'CONNOR.

Petersdorff moved to set aside judgment as irregular. The defendant had pleaded in abatement, and the accompanying affidavit was entitled, "Wells v. Alicia O'Connor, sued as Alice O'Connor," such having been the fact.

The plaintiff required judgment, upon the ground that the former name ought only to have been used.

BUSINESS OF THE WEEK.

Thursday.

BROWN and ANOTHER v. FULLARTON.—Quære, amendment of writ of summons by inserting another name as co-plaintiff?—Hugh Hill moved for rule absolute in this case, and Gray shewed cause. After hearing both sides, the Court postponed their judgment till, by consultation with the other judges, a uniform rule might be laid down as to the point mooted—viz. whether, in order to save the Statute of Limitations, the Court might amend a writ of summons by the addition of a party to be co-plaintiff, upon which there had been contradictory decisions in the Exchequer and the Queen's Bench.

Practice.—Defendant has no right to demand particulars of sums for which credit is given.—Cole applied for a rule calling on plaintiff to shew cause why he should not deliver further and better particulars with the dates and items of a sum amounting to 78*l.* already credited. The Court said the application was one that should be made at Chambers, and GURNEY, B. added that he would hardly get any thing by going there. Rule refused.

FRANKLIN v. NEATE.—Pawnbrokers—Right of vendee of pawned chattel to redeem.—This case was an action of trover, and in it the important question of whether the person to whom sale is made of the property which the vendor has pawned with a pawnbroker can maintain an action in his own name against the pawnbroker was argued by Petersdorf for defendant, and Humfrey for plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

DAILEY and ANOTHER v. LOVEDAY.—Bill of exchange—Clerical error in drawing up a rule will be altered according to the fact at the hearing—Indorsees of a bill of exchange are not barred by the release of the indorser, if at the time of the release the indorser was not owner thereof.—Bramwell shewed cause against Humfrey's rule. The rule in terms called on defendant to shew cause why verdict should not be set aside and new trial had, or why there should not be judgment non obstante veredicto. But the rule as obtained was further, why verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff, and the Court ordered it to be altered into this:—The only point of law in the matter was one which arose out of these facts. The action was on a bill of exchange—indorsee v. acceptor. The bill had been deposited with one A B as security by the drawer, who, whilst it remained in the hands of A B, released the bill by deed, with other matters, to the defendant. Subsequently to this the drawer had indorsed it to the plaintiffs. Bramwell urged that, as against a party claiming under the drawer, the release was a good release; but the Court held it was not a release of the bill, except the bill had, at the time of the release, been the property of the drawer, which it was not if any one else had a lien thereon; if any one else, in fact, held it for value. The bill had been deposited as a security, and it was not shewn that the lien had been discharged before the release. The circumstances of the case could not be taken advantage of under a plea of release.

Rule absolute to enter verdict for plaintiff.

CROWN CASES.

Saturday, Nov. 16.
(Before all the Judges.)
REG. v. GRIMWADE.

Threatening letters—Property may be laid in a reversioner—What is a sending within 6 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 3.

This was a case which had been tried at Ipswich by Alderson, B. at the last Suffolk assizes, and referred to the Court on two points reserved, in relation to the construction of 6 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 3. 1st. (On the first count.) Whether a reversioner had such a property as would sustain an indictment for sending a letter threatening to burn property laid as his. 2nd. (On the second count.) Whether a threatening letter could be said to have been "sent" by the prisoner to the party for whom it was intended, when such letter reached its destination only after it had been seen by third parties, who found it, read it, and then, after intermediate inspections, shewed it to him.

To bring the facts of the case more distinctly to notice, they may be recapitulated here. The facts of the case were, that the letter was addressed to Sir Joshua Bailey; the contents were, that unless his tenant, Mr. Brown, paid higher wages, Mr. Brown might depend on it that he would have a blaze. The letter was left by the prisoner near Brown's farm; it was picked up, opened in the steward's room at Sir Joshua's, and had subsequently been seen both by Sir Joshua and Mr. Brown. There was no evidence that Sir Joshua had shewn the letter to Brown. Under these circumstances, the second count laid the letter as having been "sent" to Brown. The learned judge directed the jury to find this, if, in addition to the above facts, they thought that the letter had been intended for Brown. The jury found that there had been such a sending; and thus the question arose, whether this intention, coupled with the other facts of the case, was a sending within the statute.

The COURT, after hearing Gordon for the prisoner, stopped O'Malley for the prosecution, and supported the verdict on the second count.

Note—So the question on the first count is not decided; but the case decides that a threatening letter which reaches its destination is not functus officio by being read by third persons, who forward it; nor need the mode in which it reaches its destination be the exact mode contemplated by the guilty party; but that the circumstances under which the letter in this case was dismissed towards, and reached, its destination, is a "sending" within the Act of Parliament.

Whether the Court, in the above case, intimated an opinion that the statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 54, s. 3, does not exact that the property threatened to be burnt should be the property of the person threatened, but may be the property of any subject of the realm; though, at the trial, the 3rd count, which was framed to meet this view of the case, was held clearly bad.

REG. v. BOWEN.

"Destroying, defacing, and injuring" parish register, are words standing but for one offence.

This case was tried by Tindal, J. at the last assize. The prisoner was indicted for "destroying, defacing, and injuring" the registry of baptism, in the words of the Act of Parliament against that offence. The proof was, that the prisoner had tore out a leaf from the register.

J. W. Smith, for the prisoner, contended, at the trial:—

1st, That there was no defacing;

2nd, That the indictment was bad for vagueness;

3rd, That the indictment was bad, because it did not charge that the prisoner knew it was the parish register.

TINDAL, C. J. ruled against him on all points—the register was at least "injured," if not defaced—and reserved his ruling for the opinion of the judges.

J. W. Smith now argued his second objection. He contended, that an indictment which charged three distinct offences was bad, on account of the perplexity to which it subjected the prisoner: it was so vague that he could not ascertain what he was charged with.

The learned counsel cited divers cases to shew the disposition of the law to enforce singleness in indictments—

But the JUDGES held, that the words of the Act of Parliament had been pursued. No judge would suffer them at the trial to be pointed at more than one offence; and held with the ruling at the trial on all points.

BAIL COURT.

Friday, Nov. 15.
(Before Mr. Justice PATTESON.)
Ex parte RATCLIFFE.

Habeas corpus to bring up two children, in order that they may be delivered into the custody of their father.

Atherton moved for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to Abraham Turner, directing him to bring into this court the bodies of two female children. It appeared that in November 1843, the applicant and his youngest daughter, a girl under two years of age, were on a visit to his father-in-law, Abraham Turner, with whom he remained until March 1844, when he left, leaving his daughter there, at his father-in-law's request. On the 30th of July last the applicant's wife absconded from her husband, taking with her his eldest daughter Fanny, aged four years, and went to the residence of Abraham Turner, her father, and still refuses to return. On the 10th of September, the applicant wrote his wife a letter, desiring to know when she would return with her children. This letter was returned, having been opened, and in the handwriting of Turner. The applicant swore to his having, as he believed, always lived happily with his wife. Writ granted.

REG. v. RANDALL WILBRAHAM, Esq. Ex parte WOOD.

Mandamus to the judge of a local court, commanding him to try a cause.

V. Williams moved for a mandamus to be directed to Randall Wilbraham, esq. High-steward of the Court of Pleas at Congleton, commanding him to try a cause of Wood v. Burgess. It appeared that the Court in question had, by charter, jurisdiction over all causes which arise within the town; and the above cause being ripe for trial, was set down for the 21st of August, and stood No. 2 on that day. On the case being called on, the judge said he understood that the action was brought to recover 7*l.* 10*s.* as a deposit made in respect of a foot-race, and that he should not try any such a frivolous cause, and directed the jury to be discharged; and, on the late case of Running Rein being referred to, he said that, "if the judges chose to try such cases he would not." It was now contended that, notwithstanding certain judges had refused to try certain cases, on account of the immorality involved in them, it had been much doubted whether they possessed that power, and that in the present case there was nothing that was not properly the subject of an action; that the sport of racing was one in which heroes had indulged, which princes had witnessed, and of which poets had sung the praises! Rule nisi.

Saturday, Nov. 16.
STULTZ v. Sir R. WYATT.

Motion to set aside proceedings in outlawry for defects in the body and return of the writ of proclamations.

Sir J. Bayley moved for a rule to set aside the proceedings to outlawry herein with costs, on the ground of defects in the writ of proclamations, and the return thereon. By the 31 Eliz. c. 3, three proclamations were to be made under the writ—one in the County Court, another at the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace, and a third at the door of the church or chapel of the town or parish where the defendant shall be dwelling, &c. and upon Sunday immediately after divine service and sermon, &c. By the 1 Vict. c. 45, so much of the above Act as relates to the third proclamation is repealed, and by the second section it is provided, that the proclamation shall be reduced into writing, and copies thereof shall, previously to the commencement of divine service, be affixed on or near the doors of all the churches and chapels within such parish or place, &c. The writ of proclamations in the present case required the sheriff to proclaim the defendant on the three days according to the 31 Eliz. and the 1 & 2 Vict. It was on this point argued, that the writ was bad, inasmuch as it required the sheriff to proceed under an Act of Parliament which does not exist, there being no Act of 1 & 2 Vict. which applies to proclamations, and that if this could be rejected as surplusage, there would still only be the 31 Eliz. for the sheriff to proceed upon, which is not enough, as that Act requires proclamations to be made, which are now repealed. It was further argued that the return, which stated that proclamation had been made at the church of St. George, Hanover-square, was bad, inasmuch as it should have stated that notice had been affixed to all the churches and chapels within the parish, pursuant to the 1 Vict. c. 45, s. 2, there being an affidavit, upon which the motion was made, that in this parish there is one district church and seven chapels, and, as deponent believed, ten others. Rule nisi.

YOUNG v. CROMPTON.
Judgment.

V. Lee having yesterday shewn cause against this rule (see 4 Law T. 100), when he contended that defendant had not complied with the rule of Court entitling him to have the costs taxed, and his lordship having deferred his judgment, the learned judge now directed the rule to be discharged, on the ground that as it was not clear, by the affidavits, that the error in the amount of the debt was admitted by both parties, and as it did not, therefore, appear that the real debt claimed in the action had been paid, the defendant had not entitled himself to the benefit of the rule enabling him to tax the costs indorsed on the writ. Rule discharged.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF DERBYSHIRE, Ex parte THE OVERSEERS OF THE TOWNSHIP OF CAULDWELL.

Mandamus to justices to enter continuances and hear an appeal.

Wildman moved for a rule nisi for a mandamus to the above justices commanding them to enter continuances and hear an appeal under the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 59. This application was precisely similar to that of Reg. v. The Justices of Derbyshire (4 Law T. 119).

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF MONTGOMERYSHIRE, IN THE MATTER OF THE APPEAL OF THE PARISH OF CARNO, Respondents; and THE PARISH OF LLINECIL, Appellants.

Mandamus to justices to enter continuances and hear an appeal.

Townsend moved for a rule nisi for a mandamus to be directed to the above justices commanding them to enter continuances and hear an appeal against an order of removal. The facts were as follows:—On the 18th December, 1843, an order of removal was made which was served on the 20th following. The appellants having given no notice within the twenty-one days, the removal was made on the 13th January, 1844. At the next sessions, in April, the appellants entered and respited their appeal, and on the 19th of June, being fourteen days before the Midsummer Sessions, they gave notice and grounds of appeal. When the appeal came on for trial, the respondents objected that due notice of trial, as required by an order of sessions, had not been given, such order requiring that twenty eight days' notice should be served; upon this the justices refused to hear the appeal. It was now contended that the justices were wrong, and that if due notice had not been given, they should, under the provisions of the 9 Geo. 1, c. 7, s. 8, have adjourned the appeal until the next sessions. It was further argued that such an order of sessions requiring so long a notice was unreasonable, and would not be upheld by this Court, and an affidavit of an attorney who had practised at the Montgomeryshire sessions for ten years had been made, in which the deponent stated, that during that period he had never known such order acted upon, and that the regular notice as given in actual practice was fourteen days. (Rex v. The Justices of Wilts, 10 East, 404; Rex v. The Justices of Lancashire, 7 B. & C. 91.)

Reg. v. The Justices of Somersetshire.

Ex parte Edward Coles, Clerk of the Peace.

Certiorari to remove an order of sessions into this court with a view to quashing same for illegality.

Crowder, Q. C. moved for a certiorari to remove in this court, with a view to quashing the same, an order made by the above justices, at the last Michaelmas sessions, which directed that no officer of the Court should thereafter take or demand any fee whatever from any defendant in cases of misdemeanor.

It appeared that the table of fees, by virtue of which, fees were at the time of the making of the above order demanded of misdemeanants, was framed under the provisions of the 57 Geo. 3, c. 91, and sanctioned by Gazelee, J. and Burrough, J. the two judges of assize, pursuant to the statute in 1821, and it was now insisted that the only legal mode of getting rid of these fees is by following the course directed by the above Act, namely, by preparing a fresh table, and by submitting it for approval to the judges of assize.

Patteson, J.—It may be very improper that there should be such fees, but it is still more improper to attempt to abolish them, except under the provisions of the Act of Parliament. If the order is illegal, the clerk of the peace may decline to act upon it.

Crowder.—The difficulty in such a case would be, that he might be charged before the Court of Quarter Sessions with extortion, as the order would still exist.

Patteson, J.—You are entitled to your rule

Reg. v. The Justices of Warwickshire, in the matter of the Appeal of the Parish of Colsey, Appellants, and the Parish of Kingsborough, Respondents.

Mandamus to justices to hear an appeal.

Spooner moved for a mandamus commanding the above justices to enter continuances and hear an appeal.

In this case an order of removal had been made, and notice of appeal given; the appellants, however, did not appear at the sessions, whereupon the respondents applied for their costs, which were allowed them at the sum of 20*l.* Shortly after this the paupers were removed, when the appellants gave a fresh notice of appeal, and at the next sessions, in October last, applied to enter and try the appeal, which was refused by the sessions, on the ground of the appeal in the case having already been disposed of. It was now contended that the appellants had a right to have their appeal tried. (Reg. v. The Justices of Middlesex, 9 Dowl.)

Hobbs v. Young.

The rule H. T. 2 Wm. 4, r. 11, requiring the amount of the debt to be indorsed on the writ does not apply to qui tam actions, but to suits only for the recovery of debts subsisting between the parties.

Wordsworth shewed cause against the rule obtained herein, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the copy and service of the writ of summons should not be set aside for irregularity, the amount of the debt and costs not having been indorsed on the writ, pursuant to the R. H. T. 2 Wm. 4, r. 11, which requires that upon every bailable writ and warrant, and upon the copy of any process served for the payment of any debt, the amount of the debt shall be stated and the amount of what the plaintiff's attorney claims for costs, &c.

It appeared this was one of several actions brought against the publishers of newspapers (the present defendant being the publisher of The Sun newspaper) to recover certain penalties under 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 66, "An Act to Prevent the Advertising of Foreign and other Illegal Lotteries," and the writ of summons described the plaintiff as suing "as well for our Sovereign Lady the Queen as for himself." In opposition to the rule, it was contended that the rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4, r. 11, does not apply to qui tam actions, but merely to the cases of debts between party and party, particularly as it could not be known what penalties would be recovered, or how much would be payable to the Queen. (Davis v. Lloyd, 6 Dowl. 173.) It was further argued that the form of the rule was incorrect, as it should have been to have set aside the writ itself, and not the service, which was perfectly regular. (Anonymous, 1 Dowl. 654.)

Atkinson, contrà, contended that as the penalty was a definite one of 50*l.* it became a debt which ought to have been indorsed; that Davis v. Lloyd does not apply, as that was an action brought under the Municipal Corporation Act, which, in addition to a penalty, imposes personal disabilities, so that the object of the action was not alone, in that case, the recovery of a sum of money, and that as to the terms of the motion, the defendant knew nothing of the original writ, and therefore was right in not asking to set it aside.

Patteson, J. was clear that R. H. T. 2 Wm. 4, r. 11, applied merely to debts subsisting between the parties, and not to qui tam actions which any one might bring. Rule discharged, with costs.

Steele v. Potter.

The 19 Geo. 3, c. 70, s. 4, enabling parties to remove records from inferior courts into one of the superior courts at Westminster, applies only to courts of record; and a judgment, therefore, of the County Court cannot be brought up under that Act.

Mazzinghi moved for a certiorari to remove a judgment from the County Court of York into this court, under the 19 Geo. 3, c. 70, s. 4, in order to have execution pursuant to the Act. There was some doubt as to whether the Act applies to judgments in county courts, which are not courts of record. The preamble of the 4th section speaks of "inferior courts" generally, but the enacting part of the clause says, "That in all cases where final judgment shall be obtained in any action or suit in any inferior court of record, it shall and may be lawful," &c.

Patteson, J. I do not think the Act applies to a court not of record. How can I strike out the words "of record?" The Act states that we are "to cause the record of the said judgment to be removed." If there be no record, there is nothing to remove. I think the case is quite clear. Rule refused.

Coombs v. Peace.

Where a party seeks to set aside proceedings for irregularity, he must come promptly to the Court. Where, therefore, execution was levied on the 7th, and the affidavit of the party sworn on the 18th, and the motion to set the execution aside made on the 20th of November: Held, too late.

Hance moved for a rule calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the judgment and all subsequent proceedings should not be set aside for irregularity. In this case the defendant had been served with process on the 16th of October last; he did not enter any appearance, and the next thing he heard of the action was an execution being put in to his house on the 7th of November instant. It was sworn by the defendant that he had received no notice of declaration.

Patteson, J.—Are you not too late with your motion?

Hance.—The affidavit was sworn on the 18th inst. (Fish v. Palmer, 2 Dowl. 460.)

Patteson, J.—The rule is, that a party who complains of an irregularity must come promptly; there is no fixed rule upon the subject; but here eleven days elapse before the affidavit is sworn, and thirteen before the motion is made. I think this is too late, and in a case where a party is served with a writ and does not chose to appear to it, we are not much inclined to serve him. Rule refused.

Reg. v. Lewis and Others.

Certiorari to remove an indictment from the Central Criminal Court.

Humfrey moved for a certiorari to remove into this court an indictment, found against the defendants for a conspiracy to bring an action against the prosecutor. This application was made on the ground that the attorney of the plaintiff in the action (which action had been referred to arbitration, and is not yet decided), who is made one of the defendants is anxious to avail himself of the services of the Queen's counsel, who was engaged at the trial of the action, and that many points of law will arise, and that it is desirable to have a special jury.

Patteson, J. You must undertake to take no objection to the venue.

Humfrey.—The venue shall be altered to meet the necessities of the case. (See Reg. v. Stowell, 12 L. J. M. C. 111.) Certiorari granted.

Sharp v. Cummins.

New trial.

Wallinger, on a former day, shewed cause against the rule obtained herein by Allen to reduce the damages from 5*l.* 15*s.* to 15*s.*

It appeared that the plaintiff and defendant had jointly taken some land of a third party, at a rent of 10*l.* which amount the plaintiff paid when due, and sought in this action to recover of the defendant a moiety which he alleged to be his share. The declaration contained two counts; one for money paid to the defendant's use, and a second for goods sold and delivered; about the latter demand (15*s.*) there was no dispute. The cause was tried before the Undersheriff of Monmouthshire, and a verdict was returned for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed. In support of the verdict it was contended, that as the plaintiff and defendant, though they jointly took the land, had each his own cattle upon it, and derived no joint profit, they were not partners, and that as each was liable for the whole rent, the plaintiff was justified in paying it, and in bringing this action against the defendant for contribution. (Helme v. Smith, 7 Bing. 709; Venning v. Leckie, 13 East, 7; Pitt v. ——, 8 M. & W.)

Allen, contrà, argued that the cases cited were distinguishable from this; that in those cases a sum of money had been paid antecedent to the venture, which was not the case here; that if in this case the parties really were partners, the action could not be sustained unless an account had been stated between them; and that, if they were not partners, the plaintiff could not recover for "money paid," without proving a promise, express or implied, of neither of which was there any evidence (Peacock v. Peacock, 2 Camp. 45); and as the case stood, there was no evidence that the defendant was liable to even a moiety of the rent.

His Lordship now pronounced judgment, and said, that inasmuch as there was an undisputed sum of 15*s.* due to the plaintiff, he could not direct a nonsuit, but that as it did not appear whether or not the defendant, by the terms of the taking, was to be liable to a moiety of the rent, even supposing the parties were not partners, and as the plaintiff would not consent to reduce the damage to 15*s.* there must be a new trial. Rule absolute for new trial.

Scott v. England.

To enable a plaintiff to sue for goods bargained and sold, it is not essential that he should have had possession of the goods at the time of the contract: it is sufficient that the goods are ascertained and the price agreed upon, and that the plaintiff himself could have maintained trover for them at that time.

Lush, on a former day, shewed cause against the rule obtained on the part of the defendant to set aside the verdict, for a nonsuit, or for a new trial.

The action was brought for goods bargained and sold and for money paid, to which the defendant pleaded the general issue. It appeared that the plaintiff, whilst attending a sale, bought a cast-iron plate for 3*l.* 15*s.* and before he had either paid for it or obtained possession, he agreed to sell it for the same price to the defendant. Subsequently, the defendant refused to complete his bargain, when this action was brought, and the jury (at the Secondaries' Court) found a verdict for the plaintiff for 3*l.* 15*s.* the amount claimed. The defence set up was this: that as the plaintiff at the time he sold the plate, was not possessed of it, he had not sufficient property in it to convey it to another. In support of the verdict, it was contended, that the right of property passed by the bargain (Dixon v. Yates, 5 B. & Ad. 340); that here was the right of property in the plaintiff, though not the right of possession, which was dependent upon the price being paid (Hinde v. Whitehouse, 7 East, 571); and that the goods would have remained at the plaintiff's risk.

Udall, contrà, contended that unless the vendee acquired a right to maintain trover against the party possessed of the goods, nothing passed by the contract (Atkinson v. Bell, 8 B. & C. 277; Simmons v. Swift, 5 B. & C. 857); that the vendor had not perfected his right of property, as he had not himself paid for the goods. (Tempest v. Fitzgerald, 3 B. & Ald. 680; Bloxam v. Sanders, 4 B. & C. 941; Craven v. Ryder, 6 Taunt. 434.)

His Lordship now pronounced judgment.—He was (he said) of opinion that the rule should be discharged, as it appeared to him that all which was necessary to maintain the action was that there should be a contract for the sale of ascertained goods at the fixed price, enabling the defendant to bring trover; that in the cases cited for the defendant, it appeared either that the goods were undefined, or the price was not agreed upon; that no doubt the plaintiff could have been sued on a count for goods bargained and sold; and that as by his sale to the defendant he had passed the property to him, he also could maintain this action. Rule discharged.

Mandamus to restore a parish clerk.

Ex parte Henry Hughes Allen.

When an attorney, from bodily and mental ailment, becomes incapable of continuing his practice and of instructing his articled clerk, the Court will make an order that such clerk may be re-articled to another attorney.

Hoggins moved, on behalf of the above gentleman, for a rule discharging him from his present articles of clerkship, and to permit him to be re-articled for the remainder of his term to another attorney.

It appeared that in April 1842, he was articled to his father, and served under him until July last, when his father became so infirm in body and mind as to be unable longer to attend to business, or to hold communication with any person; that since then he has been with Mr. Frederick P. Chappell, an attorney, who is willing to take him for the remainder of the term, but that the applicant's father is too ill to assign him. Application granted.

Motion to quash or supersede a writ of habeas corpus for having issued improvidently.

The Solicitor-General moved for a rule nisi to quash the writ of habeas corpus herein, as having issued improvidently, or for a supersedeas. (See 4 Law T. 100.)

The learned gentleman referred to a number of old authorities on the subject of the judicial independence of the island of Jersey, and contended that as it was doubtful, under the terms of the 31 Car. 2, c. 2, whether the writ of habeas corpus applied to cases like the present or not, it was, at all events, an exceedingly inconsistent mode of redress for subjects beyond the seas; particularly as they have an equally speedy and certain remedy by an appeal to the Queen in Council. (4 Co. Inst. 286; Rex v. Overton Siderfin, 20 Car. 386; Note to Coleridge's Blac. Com. 1 vol. 108; 2 Burr. 856, 834, 859; Rex. v. Hobhouse, 3 B. & Ald. 420.)

Rule nisi, the return to the habeas to be stayed until this motion disposed of.

REG. v. WILLIAM RUSHWORTH.

Where under the 17 Geo. 3, c. 56, the party convicted gives notice of appeal, and the Sessions grant a case which is ultimately decided in favour of the conviction, this Court will send back the conviction with a writ of procedendo, to enable the justices to enforce it by the proper means.

Pickering moved for a ca. sa. to take into custody the above party, or for a writ of procedendo, under the following circumstances. Rushworth had been convicted under the 17 Geo. 3, c. 56, and ordered to pay a sum of 20*l.*, and in case of default to be committed to Wakefield Gaol for one month. Against this conviction he appealed, and at the sessions the conviction was quashed, subject to a case, upon the hearing of which the order of sessions was quashed, and the conviction confirmed. Upon this a writ of levari facias had issued, to which there had been a return of nulla bona, and it was now sought to enforce the conviction by a writ of ca. sa. out of this court. (Rex v. Neville, 3 B. & Ad. 299.)

PATTESON, J.—Are there any instances of our granting this writ in such cases? It is true, this is a Criminal Court, and on an indictment removed, we can give judgment; but this is a summary proceeding before magistrates.

Pickering.—There is in principle no distinction.

PATTESON, J.—You may have a procedendo to send back the conviction.

Rule absolute for a writ of procedendo.

REG. v. THE RECORDER OF BOLTON.

Where under the 17 Geo. 3, c. 56, s. 8, a party is summarily convicted and he gives notice of appeal, and enters into recognizances to try, &c. and afterwards abandons his appeal, the Sessions have no authority to permit the respondents to enter the appeal, nor to confirm the conviction or award the respondents their costs. In such a case the proper course is to estreat the recognizances and apply to the justices to issue their warrant to enforce the conviction, which stands as though unappealed against; and should the justices refuse to act, they will be compelled by mandamus to proceed.

Baines, Q.C. on a former day, shewed cause against a rule obtained by Cowling, calling upon the Recorder of Bolton to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding him to enter, or cause, or allow to be entered, as of the last sessions, an appeal, or the matter of an appeal of William Barlow against the conviction of him, the said William Barlow, by two justices of the peace, and proceed to hear and determine the matter of the said appeal, or to affirm the said conviction, or award such costs to be paid by the said William Barlow as may appear to be reasonable.

It appeared, that on the 15th of July last, one William Barlow was convicted by two justices of the borough of Bolton, under the 17 Geo. 3, c. 56, s. 8, for wilfully neglecting to work up certain cotton goods, the property of his masters, the Messrs. Lomax, whereupon he was adjudged to be imprisoned in the house of correction at Salford, with hard labour, for one month. Upon this decision he gave notice of appeal, and entered into a recognizance, with two sureties, to try his appeal, to abide the judgment of the Court, and pay such costs as should be awarded. Two days before the sessions he gave notice that he abandoned his appeal, and on the first day of the sessions, no appeal having been entered by the appellant, the respondents (the justices) applied to be permitted themselves to enter it. This application was disallowed; upon which the respondents applied to the Court to confirm the original conviction, which the Court refused to do, on the ground of a want of jurisdiction; whereupon the respondents asked for their costs, the rule of Court as to three days' notice of abandonment not having been complied with, which application, for the same reason, was not granted. Subsequently the convicting justices were applied to, to issue their warrant to apprehend and commit the said William Barlow to prison in execution of the original sentence, but they declined to grant the warrant, alleging that their jurisdiction was taken away by the notice of appeal. On behalf of the Recorder, and in opposition to this rule, it was contended that he pursued the proper course, he having no jurisdiction to entertain the case in the absence of an appeal entered by the appellant (7 Ad. & Ell. 588; 7 B. & C. 293); that the Court of Quarter Sessions should have been applied to, to have estreated the recognizances, whereupon the original conviction would have been in full force against the appellant, and may have been enforced as though no notice of appeal had been given, and if the magistrates declined, they could have been compelled to have enforced it by mandamus; that the 8 & 9 Wm. 3, c. 30, giving respondents their costs where an appeal is not proceeded with, applies only to orders of removal; that the case of Reg. v. Twyford and Another (5 Ad. & Ell. 430), relied upon on the other side, in which the Court refused to direct a mandamus to justices to enforce a conviction under this Act, under somewhat similar circumstances, was distinguishable in this, that the appellant, in consequence of not having entered into his recognizances, remained in gaol, and it was doubtful, therefore, whether such imprisonment must not have been taken to have been in execution of his sentence on the conviction; that the power to award costs was ancilary to the appeal, and that they could not be given independently of it.

Cowling, contrà, endeavoured to draw a distinction between the words "appeal" and "the matter of an appeal," as used in this Act, and contended that, at least, the Recorder ought to have made an order for the costs of the respondents.

HIS LORDSHIP now delivered judgment, holding that the Recorder was quite correct in the view and course which he had taken, for that this Court had in several cases held, that respondents have no right, on default of the appellant, themselves to enter the appeal—that similar words in the appeal clause of this Act are to be found in other Acts under which it has never been allowed to the respondents to enter an appeal. That it seemed to him to be quite impossible to contend that if the person appealing does not enter his appeal, the respondents had a right to enter it. That the Recorder, therefore, had no alternative but to refuse the respondents' application. That as to the argument of the inconvenience which would result from the inability of the Recorder to enforce the conviction, and the doubt as to the right of the justices to enforce it, he himself had no doubt that the party, on neglecting to prosecute his appeal, was placed in the same situation as though no notice of appeal whatever had been given, and that the justices had a clear right to issue their warrant and enforce their conviction. That this case is distinguishable from the King v. Twyford, inasmuch as the party was there in custody; and the Court merely said that, under the circumstances, there was sufficient doubt to justify their refusing the mandamus to the justices. That as to the giving of costs to the respondents, costs were given by the Act as ancillary to the hearing of the appeal, and are not governed in this case by 8 & 9 Wm. 3, c. 30, which applies only to orders of settlement. That the writ of mandamus ought not, therefore, to go, and that the rule should be Discharged, with costs.

HENZELL v. HOCKING.—V. Williams moved for a rule to stay all further proceedings in this action until the taxed costs of 57*l*. 18*s*. for not proceeding to trial be paid. Rule nisi.

THE QUEEN v. SIR W. M. STANLEY, BART. AND OTHERS.—Wortley, Q. C. moved for a certiorari to remove into this Court two indictments found at the last assizes for Chester, against the defendants, for working a quarry so as to obstruct a public highway; and also for constructing a railway so as to interfere with public rights. It was alleged that a view will be necessary,—that it will be proper to try the case by a special jury, and that points of law will arise.

Certiorari granted.

LAMBERT v. HOLT.—His lordship directed this rule to be discharged; the costs to be costs in the cause.

Act of bankruptcy—Fraudulent preference—Construction of 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 3.

Where the acting member of a firm, with a knowledge of the insolvency of the firm and after a determination to suspend payment, had given checks to three different persons, private friends of the partners, and there was no evidence to shew that the checks were given under pressure; it was held to amount to a fraudulent preference, which constituted a valid act of bankruptcy.

Money held to be within the meaning of the terms "goods and chattels," in the 3rd section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 16.

The principal point which arose upon this petition was, as to the validity of an alleged act of bankruptcy under the 3rd section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 16. The circumstances of the case will sufficiently appear from the Chief Judge's judgment.

Russell, Mylne, Swanston, Bacon, and W. W. Cooper, appeared for the several parties.

The cases of Abbott v. Burbage (2 Scott, 656); Gibson v. Boutts (3 Scott, 229); and Bevan v. Nunn (9 Bing. 107; 2 M. & Scott, 132), were cited.

The CHIEF JUDGE said, that during the progress of the argument he had communicated with the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas relative to a case in which his opinion was stated, in terms which left some doubt as to his intention. He would, however, at once, state his impression of the present case. On the 11th of September, 1841, the firm was in difficulties, and it was known to be so by Mr. Smith, the manager and partner, who must also have been aware that the firm was not solvent. The result proved the accuracy of Mr. Smith's impressions, as both fiats issued before the end of the year. Since that time the fiats had been in active operation; but, now, in November 1844, it was admitted that there had been no dividend, and it was not suggested as probable that there would be more than five shillings in the pound. In September 1841, Mr. Smith, aware of the insolvency, consulted with his solicitor upon it, and it was arranged that either stoppage or suspension should take place on the following business day, and notice of this arrangement was given to the Bank of England, where acceptances were expected to be presented. As part of the same transaction, three checks were drawn for debts due to different persons, private friends of the partners. One of these was in favour of Messrs. Vaughan and Co. for an amount about to be due to them on the following Tuesday; but for this payment there was no evidence to shew pressure. Had the check been sent to them before the decision to stop payment, the effect would have been different. Another check was given in favour of a cousin of one of the partners, who had rendered pecuniary assistance to the firm. No jury would say that that was done under pressure. A third check was given to the solicitor of the partners. These were all payments where the amount due was unknown, by a trader who intended to stop on the following day. To hold, then, that such transactions were fair because Mr. Smith supposed that there would be a suspension of payment without failure, would be unreasonable. The suspension of payment would be sure to bring the whole of the creditors upon the firm, when they might be made bankrupts against their will. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, his Honour was of opinion, that the three acts, taken together, amounted to a fraudulent preference in some or one of them. It had been said that fraudulent preference did not necessarily constitute an act of bankruptcy: this depended upon the construction of the 3rd section of the 6 Geo. 4, and he was inclined to be of opinion that it was sufficient. He would, however, reserve his opinion until he heard from the Lord Chief Justice, and reconsider the matter, if requisite.

Nov. 13th.—With regard to this case, the Chief Judge said, that he had considered the whole of the authorities to which his attention had been drawn, and that he still retained the opinion he had before intimated, that on the 11th of Sept. 1841, Mr. Smith, one of the bankrupts, was a party to acts of fraudulent preference sufficient to constitute an act of bankruptcy, if payment of money to creditors by fraudulent preference might be construed to be a "gift, delivery, or transfer of goods and chattels" within the 3rd section of the 6 Geo. 4, c. 16. Money was certainly among the things to which the term "goods" might be applied. Could it be reasonably said that a man's money was not part of his goods and chattels? This case was certainly within the range of the evils intended by the Legislature to be guarded against. If a man who was insolvent gave away 1,000*l*. surely the act was as fraudulent as if he gave bills of exchange, plate, or pictures of a similar value. Bills of exchange were included in a case decided in the Common Pleas. He (the Chief Judge) was required to distinguish between bills and cash, but he could not. After carefully considering the terms of the various sections bearing upon this subject, his Honour had arrived at the conclusion that there was nothing to prevent him from considering money as comprised within the terms "goods and chattels." Such a view was independent of the case of Bevan v. Nunn, in which the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas was at variance with the present construction. He had considered the point anxiously and with much distrust of his own opinion, in consequence of his deference for the high authority of that learned judge. There were cases in which a judge might properly act contrary to his own impressions, but the present was not one in which he considered that he ought to pursue that course. The opinion of the Lord Chief Justice was single, and was not necessary for the decision of the case in which it was given, which turned on the 81st section. He should, therefore, hold with Mr. Commissioner Fane, that the act of bankruptcy by Smith, in September 1841, was in all respects good and sufficient.

Bankrupt's petition to annul a fiat—Acquiescence.

Where a bankrupt has, under the 23rd section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, given his written consent to the adjudication of his bankruptcy, and to the advertising the same, he is not precluded, on the ground of acquiescence, from presenting a petition to annul the fiat.

This was a petition by the bankrupt, seeking to annul the fiat, on the ground of there being no act of bankruptcy.

Swanston, for the petitioner.

Russell, for the respondents, raised an objection to the petition being heard, as the bankrupt had, under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 23, surrendered to the fiat, and voluntarily given his consent, in writing, to the adjudication, and that the same might be advertised. He contended, that this was such an acquiescence on the part of the bankrupt, as to preclude the hearing of this petition.

The CHIEF JUDGE, however, overruled the objection.

Practice under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96—Whether to dismiss petition, or refuse to name day for final order—When costs of opposition allowed out of estate.

In this case, at the first hearing, Homes appeared for two creditors, and elicited from the insolvent that he had contracted debts to a large amount, with but little probability of ever being able to pay them, and that two of these debts were incurred but a few days before the filing of the petition. Under these circumstances,

His HONOUR was about to dismiss the petition, when

Homes prayed that the petition might not be dismissed, as there was property, which an assignee, if appointed, could get at. He contended that the proper course for the Court to pursue was to refuse to name a day for making the final order, but to proceed with the petition as far as respects the appointment of assignees and the distribution of the property.

His HONOUR.—You wish me, then, virtually to dismiss the petition as regards any benefit the insolvent may receive, and go on with it as regards the benefit to the creditors?

Homes.—Not exactly; the insolvent may, after undergoing such a probation as the Court may think just, come up again under sec. 28; and it is questionable whether he runs any risk of arrest from creditors who come in and take a dividend.

His HONOUR.—I shall refuse to name any day for making the final order, but an assignee may be appointed, and the property collected and distributed. I think it right, however, on the occasion of refusing to name a day for a final order, to intimate to the insolvent the time during which he will be unprotected. In this case, which does not present any prominent features, I think three months a reasonable time, during which the insolvent will not be permitted, unless under special circumstances, to apply to the Court under the 28th sec.

Homes then applied for the costs of the opposition to be ordered out of the estate.

His HONOUR.—If your opposition had been confined to the object of punishing the insolvent for misconduct, I should doubt whether I ought to allow your costs out of the estate; but you have elicited many facts for the benefit of the estate; indeed, the main part of the examination has been to obtain information relative to the insolvent's property. I shall order the costs out of the estate.

No day named for the final order; assignees appointed, and costs of opposition ordered out of estate accordingly.

REG. v. BROWN and O'REGAN.

Where a prosecution for misdemeanour is instituted at the suit of the Crown, whether the Attorney or Solicitor General conduct the prosecution in person or not, a defendant is entitled, under the statute 60 Geo. 3, cap. 4, to a copy of the indictment before he pleads.

Bennett, Q.C. (with whom were the Hon. J. Plunkett, Q.C. and Brereton), for the Crown, objected that the statute only applied to cases where the Attorney or Solicitor General conducted the prosecution in person.

BALL, J.—I think it is just the same thing here as if the Attorney-General appeared in person; you represent the Attorney-General; it has been so held, for instance, in the case of counsel for the Crown claiming the right to reply.

Bennett.—At all events, they are not entitled to copies until after they have pleaded.

O'Hea.—But it is for the very purpose of pleading that we require them.

BALL, J.—My impression is, that the order ought to be granted. I can give no other construction to the statute; perhaps, therefore, you had better, to prevent the necessity of my making any order, allow copies to be taken under a protest.

Bennett.—The Attorney-General does not appear on circuit; he only directs certain counsel to be employed.

BALL, J.—As I said before, I think that it amounts to just the same thing.

The defendants were then furnished with a copy of the indictment, and on the following day pleaded not guilty, and having been held to bail within twenty-one days previous to the opening of the commission, traversed in prox.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING HERALD.

"SIR,—It may not be generally known to many of your readers that the new judge of the Court of Common Pleas is not the first 'Sir William Erle' who has had a seat in that Court. As I was, in the course of my 'timely and orderly reading,' turning over the pages of 'Coke on Littleton,' the following passage casually met my eye, which I send you verbatim et literatim:—' Sir William Herle—A famous lawyer, constituted chiefe justice of the Common Pleas by letters patents, dated 2 die Martii, anno 5 E. 3. (1342.) It appeareth by Littleton, and by the records, that he was a knight, against the conceit of those that thinke that the chiefe justices of the Court of Common Pleas were not knighted till long after. Our student shall observe that the knowledge of the law is like a deepe well, out of which each man draweth according to the strength of his understanding. He that reacheth deepest, he seeth the amiable and admirable secrets of the law, wherein, I assure you, the sages of the law in former times (whereof Sir William Herle was a principal one) have had the deepest reach.' GENERAL CODE OF THE POOR LAW COMMISSIONERS.

To the Clerks of the Peace of the several counties, ridings, divisions, and places in England and Wales;—

To the Guardians of the Poor of the several unions and parishes in England and Wales;—

To the Overseers of the Poor of the several parishes and places in England and Wales;—

And to all whom it may concern.

Whereas it was enacted by the Act passed in the last Session of Parliament, intituled "An Act for the further Amendment of the Laws relating to the Poor in England," that, on application of any overseer, or of any board of guardians, or of any attorney at law, it should be the duty of the clerk of the peace of the county or place, or his deputy, if thereunto required, to tax any bill due to any solicitor or attorney in respect of business performed on behalf of any parish or union situate wholly or in part within such county or place; and that the allowance of any sum on such taxation should be primâ facie evidence of the reasonableness of the amount, but not of the legality of the charge; and that the clerk of the peace should be allowed for such taxation after the rate to be fixed from time to time by the Master of the Crown Office, and declared by an order of the said commissioners:

And whereas the Master of the Crown Office has fixed the rate of allowance to the clerk of the peace in respect of such taxation as herein declared:

Now therefore, we, the Poor Law Commissioners, in pursuance of the statute aforesaid, do hereby declare, that the clerk of the peace of every county or place in England and Wales shall be allowed for the taxation of every bill due to any solicitor or attorney in respect of business performed on behalf of any parish or union, after the rate of four-pence per sheet, or folio, of seventy-two words each.

PROJECTED RAILWAYS.—STANDING ORDERS OF PARLIAMENT.—The projectors of a great number of lines of railway, and for which companies have been formed and notice given of their intention of applying in the ensuing session of Parliament for an Act to carry out their intentions, have unexpectedly been placed in a difficulty which will be fatal to their application, not having complied with the standing orders. It appears the standing orders require that a notice of the intended application shall be inserted in the London Gazette once in three consecutive weeks either in the months of October or November, and that such advertisement should be left at the office of the London Gazette two days before the day of publishing the Gazette. In a great many instances the parties from some cause or other omitted to send their advertisements until Friday morning last, and owing to the enormous number of advertisements, they were refused insertion, and it is now too late to remedy the omission; in all these cases the parties will not be entitled to ask for their Act of Parliament, the standing orders not having been complied with. Whether Parliament under the circumstances will relieve the applicants is very uncertain; if not, they cannot apply until the following session.

THE ENSUING WINTER ASSIZE.—Magistrates and their clerks will probably have become informed before our present number reaches them, that it is only intended to try at this assize the class of prisoners usually tried at assizes, not those triable at the quarter sessions; in other words, it is not to be a general gaol delivery, but it will be a special one only. It follows from this, that magistrates may before the assize commit prisoners for trial at the next quarter sessions, though the assize intervenes, without fear that the prisoners so committed will be discharged by the judges. Attention to this will obviate the inconvenience which arose last year, from the want of a timely communication, that the gaol delivery was a limited one. The notice, as published by the authorities, is, that the commission is "for holding a special gaol delivery;" and it requires "all prosecutors and persons bound by recognizance to prosecute or give evidence against the prisoners being in the gaol of ——, as shall have been committed for trial at the next assizes, or at the next gaol delivery for —— to be in punctual attendance," &c. This annunciation means, that such prisoners only as are committed for trial at the assizes will be tried, and that the judges will not feel themselves called upon to discharge prisoners in the gaols committed for trial at the sessions; though it must be admitted the wording of the notice is not as explicit and grammatical as it should be. We are enabled also to state, from a source of undoubted authenticity, that at the ensuing assize the judges will try all cases committed to the assizes, but will not interfere with those committed to the sessions. Prisoners therefore triable at the sessions may be safely committed thereto and should be so, notwithstanding the intervention of the assize.—Justice of the Peace.

"SIR,—You would do the public a service by calling the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the fact, that while the charge for office copies of bills and answers obtained from what used to be the Six Clerks' Office has been reduced from 10d. to 4d. a folio, the charge for copies of reports, which are generally long, still continues at 10d. per folio of 90 words, and forms a grievous burden to the suitor, who is frequently prevented from having his cause finally heard by reason of his not being prepared to pay the heavy demand which is made at the Report-office as the preliminary step to delivering out a copy of the Master's report. I may add, that the salary of the Master of the Report-office is 2,000*l.* a year, (a) though the duties are such as may be performed by any ordinary clerk, and the present Master scarcely ever attends, being very infirm.

THE PROPERTY LAWYER.

AN ACT TO SIMPLIFY THE TRANSFER OF PROPERTY (7 & 8 VICT. c. 76).

No. III.

[We regret that several errors crept into our last article on this Statute, in consequence of the lateness of the hour at which the article was printed. As, however, the more important ones related to the law as it is, we doubt not that our readers at once detected them.]

The 4th clause declares—

That no lease in writing of any freehold, copyhold, or leasehold land, or surrender in writing of any freehold or leasehold land, shall be valid as a lease or surrender, unless the same shall be made by deed; but any agreement in writing to let or to surrender any such land shall be valid and take effect as an agreement to execute a lease or surrender; and the person who shall be in the possession of the land in pursuance of any agreement to let may, from payment of rent or other circumstances, be construed to be a tenant from year to year.

Leases and surrenders which may now be made without writing are not affected by this clause; surrenders, therefore, will be implied as at present. One main object of this clause evidently was to prevent the occurrence of the nice questions so frequently arising, whether a particular instrument, intended to operate as an agreement for a lease, does not in fact amount to an actual demise. The enactment is, that a lease in writing must be by deed, but an agreement in writing shall be valid as an agreement to execute a lease; so it is now. The question in the cases to which we have alluded always is, "Is the instrument an agreement or a demise?" If it be an agreement, effect is given to it as such. But in the altered state of the law, how will an instrument in writing, but not under seal, containing words of actual demise, operate? Not as a lease, because it is not under seal; not as an agreement, because it is an actual demise. To illustrate our meaning, let us take the case of Doe v. Groves (14 East, 244), in which the agreement was as follows:—

Agreement made this 7th day of March, 1798, between T. W. of the one part, and E. G. of the other.—The said T. W. doth hereby agree to let, and also, upon demand, to execute unto the said E. G. a lease of the farm, &c. as the same is now in the occupation of the said T. W., and the said E. G. doth hereby agree to take, and upon demand to execute, a lease of the said farm, to hold the same from the 5th of April, 1798, for the term of fifteen years, under the yearly rent 147*l.* to be paid half-yearly on the 5th of April and 10th of October, which said lease is to contain the usual covenants and an agreement for re-entry, in case of non-payment of the rent or non-performance of covenants, and also the further covenants, &c. That this agreement shall be binding until the said lease is made and executed.

That was held to amount to an actual demise. Now, assume that, after the 31st of December, an agreement in writing, not under seal, is made in precisely the same language; the authority of that case settles that it is not a mere agreement, and the section of the Act before us says, that it is not a lease, because it is not by deed. What will it be? and in what position will a tenant stand who takes possession under it? The courts, indeed, may say, the law having been altered, the intention of parties must be supposed to vary in like manner, and we will, therefore, out of deference to that intention, and to carry out the object of the Act, construe as mere agreements instruments which we have hitherto held to be actual demises. But until decisions to this effect have been pronounced, the clause in question will create great difficulty and render it unadvisable in the extreme for tenants to rely on any agreement not under seal. Constructive tenancies from year to year are unaffected.

The 5th sec. enacts:—

That any person may convey, assign, or charge by any deed, any such contingent or executory interest, right of entry for condition broken, or other future estate or interest as he shall be entitled to, or presumptively entitled to, in any freehold or copyhold or leasehold land, or personal property, or any part of such interest, right, or estate respectively; and every person to whom any such interest, right or estate shall be conveyed or assigned, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, according to the nature of the interest, right, or estate, shall be entitled to stand in the place of the person by whom the same shall be conveyed or assigned, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, and to have the same interest, right, or estate, or such part thereof, as shall be conveyed or assigned to him, and the same actions, suits, and remedies for the same as the person originally entitled thereto, his heirs, executors, or administrators, would have been entitled to, if no conveyance, assignment, or other disposition thereof had been made.

According to the present law, interests of the nature referred to in this clause cannot be barred at law; they are alienable in equity, and will pass by will; but the only method at law of operating upon any of them is by way of estoppel. This clause, however, enables "every person" to convey such interests wholly or partially,—and absolutely or for a limited purpose,—by a simple deed; and the transferree will stand in the same position and have the same rights and remedies as the transferror. But interests created before the Act comes into operation are not included, the Act not extending to any "estate, right, or interest created before the 1st January, 1845." The question which we touched upon in reference to the 2nd clause, has been mooted with regard to this clause, viz. whether the words "every person" will not extend to parties under disabilities and enable them to convey. It is obvious, however, that this is not so; the language may be unguarded, but it cannot be contended that the protection which the law carefully throws around parties in those situations is cut away from them by a loose expression; that a lunatic, for example, is thereby invested with an unqualified power of disposition over contingencies which is denied to him over vested interests. Such an anomaly could be created only by the most unequivocal language. From the operation of this clause, mere expectancies as heirs, &c. and also choses in action, are excepted, and estates tail cannot, under its authority, be barred or enlarged; these exceptions are as follows:—

Provided that no person shall be empowered by this Act to dispose of any expectancy which he may have as heir, or heir of the body inheritable, or as next of kin, under the statutes for the distribution of the estates of intestates of a living person, nor any estate, right, or interest to which he may become entitled under any deed there after to be executed, or under the will of any living person; and no deed shall by force of this Act bar or enlarge any estate tail: provided also, that no chose in action shall by this Act be made assignable at law.

Choses in action will, of course, continue assignable in equity.

The 6th clause declares that the words "grant" and "exchange" shall not create any warranty or right of re-entry, or any covenant by implication, "except in cases where by any Act of Parliament it is or shall be declared that the word "grant" shall have such effect;" and the 7th clause places tortious and innocent assurances on the same footing. These clauses are not of much practical consequence. Usually the word "grant" is either omitted or guarded in conveyances by parties who could not be required to covenant for the title; and even if used without limit in such cases, the danger is more fancied than real. A deed of exchange will still be unadvisable in consequence of the necessity of entry, &c. to perfect it.

The 8th section is of more importance. It enacts:—

That after the time at which this Act shall come into operation no estate in land shall be created by way of contingent remainder; but every estate which before that time would have taken effect as a contingent remainder, shall take effect (if in a will or codicil) as an executory devise, and (if in a deed) as an executory estate of the same nature and having the same properties as an executory devise.

The wording of this clause is peculiarly awkward, and calculated to give rise to serious difficulty. The intention was to do away with contingent remainders as such, and convert them into executory estates. But the clause says, first, that a contingent remainder shall not be created, and then that unless it is created, an executory estate shall not arise. The one is a consequence of the other, and the cause is forbidden. The result is, that contingent remainders are abolished, and no substitute is provided. Therefore the ordinary limitation in a marriage settlement, for instance, to the first and other sons, &c. cannot take effect, and the object cannot be attained by any other means. This is the obvious strict construction of the clause.

On the other hand, the Courts may strain the language in order to give effect to the apparent intention of the Legislature, and prevent the serious consequences which the literal interpretation would produce. They may hold the meaning to be, that "no estate shall take effect by way of contingent remainder, but that every estate which would have taken effect as a contingent remainder shall take effect as an executory estate, &c." Therefore, a good contingent remainder must be limited (for which purposes, of course, the rules appertaining to remainders must be observed), and it will be governed by the rules which now govern executory devises. Whether the clause extends to copyholds or not is doubtful. "Land" is the only word used, and in every other clause applicable to copyholds they are expressly mentioned.

The ordinary limitation to trustees to preserve, &c. may, of course, be omitted.

The clause proceeds to declare that contingent remainders in existence at the time the Act comes into operation shall not fail by the destruction or merger of any preceding estate, or its determination by any other means than the natural effluxion of the time of such preceding estate, or some event on which it was in its creation limited to determine.

The 9th clause enacts:—

That when any person entitled to any freehold or copyhold land by way of mortgage has or shall have departed this life, and his executor or administrator is or shall be entitled to the money secured by the mortgage, and the legal estate in such land is or shall be vested in the heir or devisee of such mortgagee, or the heir, devisee, or other assign of such heir or devisee, and possession of the land shall not have been taken by virtue of the mortgage, nor any action or suit be depending, such executor or administrator shall have power, upon payment of the principal money and interest due to him on the said mortgage, to convey by deed or surrender (as the case may require) the legal estate which became vested in such heir or devisee, and such conveyance shall be as effectual as if the same had been made by any such heir or devisee, his heirs or assigns.

The inconvenience and expense caused by the legal estate vested in a mortgagee descending to his heir, or passing to a devisee, incompetent to convey, or who is not at hand, or cannot be found, are a serious evil, which this clause was intended to remedy, by enabling the personal representatives who are entitled to the money to convey the estate. We fear, however, in practice the clause will be useless. In the first place, the power of the representatives to convey is limited to cases in which possession of the land had not been taken by virtue of the mortgage, and no action or suit is depending. The difficulty of proving these negatives is obvious; and, supposing a party to be himself satisfied, how will he be able to satisfy a future purchaser? Moreover, in consequence of the careless construction of the clause, a variety of doubts and questions have been already suggested, and must necessarily arise; e. g. whether, as one executor may give a receipt for the money, he also can convey the estate, or must all the executors join? Again, can the representatives convey to a transferree, or sell the mortgaged property and convey to a purchaser? (a) We think it clear that, in its present shape, and until it has received judicial interpretation, this clause will not work.

The 10th clause declares—

That the bonâ fide payment to, and the receipt of, any person to whom any money shall be payable upon any express or implied trust, or for any limited purpose, or of the survivors or survivor of two or more mortgagees or holders, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, or their or his assigns, shall effectually discharge the person paying the same from seeing to the application or being answerable for the misapplication thereof, unless the contrary shall be expressly declared by the instrument creating the trust or security.

This clause will render it unnecessary to insert the common provisions enabling trustees and surviving mortgagees to give good discharges.

The 11th sec. dispenses with the necessity of having a deed indented, and enables any person not a party to a deed to take a benefit under it in the same manner as he might under a deed-poll.

The 12th clause enacts—

That where the reversion of any land expectant on a lease shall be merged in any remainder, or other reversion or estate, the person entitled to the estate into which such reversion shall have merged, his heirs, executors, administrators, successors, and assigns, shall have and enjoy the like advantage, remedy, and benefit against the lessee, his heirs, successors, executors, administrators, and assigns, for non-payment of the rent, or for doing of waste or other forfeiture, or for not performing conditions, covenants, or agreements contained and expressed in his lease, demise, or grant against the lessee, farmer, or grantee, his heirs, successors, administrators, and assigns, as the person who would for the time being have been entitled to the mesne reversion which shall have merged, would or might have had or enjoyed if such reversion had not been merged.

At present, if an estate, out of which a lease for years has been carved, become merged in the reversion, the remedies against the lessee under the lease are extinguished, the relation of landlord and tenant no longer existing. The effect of this clause is in such a case to give to the person entitled to the remainder or reversion in which the lessor's estate has merged, the same remedies which such lessor would have continued to have but for the merger.

The 13th section fixes the 31st December as the time when the Act shall come into operation, and declares that it shall not "extend to any deed, act, or thing executed or done, or (except so far as regards the provisions hereinbefore contained as to existing contingent remainders) to any estate, right, or interest created before the 1st January, 1845."

By the 14th and last section, the Act is not to extend to Scotland.

We have thus gone through the several provisions of this Act, and pointed out the alterations which, according to our views, it will make. The changes which will be occasioned in the common forms of deeds are evidently few and comparatively trifling, consisting only of the omission of the common receipt clauses, the limitation to trustees to preserve, and the reference to the Act dispensing with a lease for a year. Even these alterations it will not be incumbent to make. Undoubtedly some improvements of consequence are effected by this Act; but there is evil mingled with the good, and we much fear that in the end the former will be found to predominate. We shall probably return to the subject in future articles.

ENTERTAINMENT TO Mr. JUSTICE ERLE.

On Thursday evening a banquet was given at the Albion, Aldersgate-street, by the Western Circuit, to Mr. Justice Erle, on his elevation to the bench. A most sumptuous entertainment was provided on the occasion by Messrs. Staples. Mr. Rogers, the leader of the circuit, was in the chair, and was supported not only by the present members of the circuit, but in addition the body were rejoined by Sir Thomas Wilde, Mr. Serjeant Merewether, Sir John Audrey, W. Hayter, Esq., M. P., and others, who having some time left the circuit, were anxious to express their concurrence in the unanimous feeling which had prompted this token of respect to their distinguished guest. The party were also joined by Sir Frederick Thesiger, as representing the Attorney-General, Sir W. Follett, who was al[so] a member of the Western Circuit.

After due justice had been done to every delicacy which the accustomed efforts of the proprietors of the Albion could provide, and the usual loyal toasts had been duly honoured,

The Chairman proposed "The Health of Mr. Justice Erle."

The company by their long-continued acclamations indicated how much they concurred in the sentiments expressed by the chairman.

Mr. Justice Erle, in returning thanks for the hearty reception and princely entertainment he had received, begged to add that he accepted the kindness of his friends around him not more for the hearty goodwill which their applause indicated, than for the satisfaction which their applause expressed of his conduct during the years which he had spent in intimate connexion with the members of the Western Circuit. The maintenance of the high character of the bar was essential to its position, and the expression of kind feeling which he had received, he hoped might be taken as an approval on the part of those with whom he had so long associated that his efforts had been directed to that end.

"The health of the Attorney and Solicitor-Generals" followed, for which Sir F. Thesiger returned thanks; and the evening was concluded with the most perfect concurrence of a large body of the bar in a sentiment expressed by the Solicitor-General, that "the only credit due to the government was, that they had selected the best man."

ADMISSION OF ATTORNEYS.

The following is extracted from the regulations for the admission of attorneys.

"In the first six days, commencing on November 20th, certificates will be delivered only to such London agents as shall, in due time previously, have sent in the declarations of themselves and their country clients, accompanied by a list thereof, arranged in alphabetical order, and written on foolscap paper, book-wise.

"These six days will be appropriated among the London agents, according to the letter with which their surnames, or those of the senior partner in the firm, commence in the following order :—

"Those commencing with—
A or B, on Wednesday, Nov. 20.
C, D, E, or F, on Thursday 21.
G, H, I, or J. on Friday, 22.
K, L, M, N, O, or P, on Saturday, 23.
Q, R, or S, on Monday, 25.
T, U, V, W, X, Y, or Z, on Tuesday, 26.

"On every day subsequent to November 26, the certificates will be delivered to the rest of the Profession."

The Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the Great Seal, granting the dignity of a Knight of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland unto William Westbrooke Burton, esq. Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Judicature at Madras.

ILLNESS OF THE CHIEF JUSTICE.—DUBLIN, NOV. 16.—The Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench is still suffering from indisposition, but it is not of a dangerous character.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed William Turton, of Tunstall, in the county of Stafford, gent, to be a Master Extraordinary in the High Court of Chancery.

MIDDLE TEMPLE, NOV. 15.—Mr. C. H. Whitehurst, recently appointed one of Her Majesty's Counsel, took his seat this day as a Bencher of the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple.

MICHAELMAS TERM EXAMINATION.—The newspapers, following the printed list placed up at Westminster, have noticed the very large number of applicants for admission on the roll of attorneys in the present term, as being nearly 200. We learn, however, that the number for examination is about 130; and of these it is probable that a considerable proportion will content themselves with passing the examination, and defer their admission. Many after they are admitted do not take out their certificates to practise for a considerable time, and others are admitted in order to go to some of the colonies, where an admission in the courts at Westminster entitles them to be admitted and practise in the colonial courts. The remainder added to the Profession in England and Wales will not be fearfully large, though, we admit, it is large enough.—Legal Observer.

CALLS TO THE BAR.—LINCOLN'S-INN, NOV. 19.—The undermentioned members of this honourable society having kept the full number of terms, they were, in the customary manner, called to the degree of barrister-at-law :—Mr. John Sayres, of Wadham College, Oxford, the second son of John Sayres, of North Stokes, in the county of Sussex, Esq.; Mr. Edward Stirling Dickson, of the Old-buildings, Lincoln's-inn, the eldest son of Admiral Edward Stirling Dickson, of Paris; Mr. Hugh Ross, of Edinburgh, and of Chancery-lane, in the county of Middlesex, the eldest son of Colonel Hugh Ross, of Edinburgh aforesaid; Mr. William Benson, of Queen's College, Cambridge, the second son of Robert Benson, of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, Esq.; Mr. George Charles Appleby, of Magdalen College, Oxford, the only son of the Rev. George Appleby, of Barton-upon-Humber; Mr. Nicholas Darnell, of New College, Oxford, the second son of the Rev. William Nicholas Darnell, of Stanhope, in the county of Durham; and Mr. Samuel Edward Maberley, of Christ Church, Oxford, the youngest son of Joseph Maberley, of King's-road, Bedford-row, attorney-at-law.

GRAY'S-INN, NOV. 20.—The undernamed gentlemen were this day called to the degree of barrister-at-law, by the Hon. Society of Gray's-inn—viz. John Fitzpatrick Villiers, Esq., and Charles Skinner Troughton, Esq.

PAYMENT OF EXPENSES TO ASSIGNEES.—An application was made in the Court of Bankruptcy to Sir Charles Williams, to allow 2*l.* 2*s.* a day to a solicitor, who was an assignee to a bankrupt's estate, and had been examined as a witness, Mr. Richardson, the taxing master, having refused to allow it. Sir Charles Williams said it was very unusual for a solicitor to be appointed a trade assignee; but if they could obtain 2*l.* 2*s.* a day for their attendance, they would be enabled to get up a very good business; and he should expect to see the appointment of trade assignees contested for by the profession with as much zeal as a borough. (Laughter.) There was no instance on record of an assignee being paid; they were in the same situation as trustees, and generally solicited the appointment. If he was to allow the sum charged, it would be a precedent for all professional men to come forward and ask for compensation for doing their duty. The item was then struck out of the bill.

RUMOURED JUDICIAL CHANGES.—Amongst the gentlemen of the bar spoken of as likely to succeed to the next vacant mastership in Chancery are Mr. George Bennet, Q.C., Mr. Serjeant Howley (assistant barrister for the county of Tipperary), and Mr. Brewster, Q.C. Should the last-named gentleman be the successful candidate, it is highly probable that Mr. Butt, Q. C. would succeed to the office of advising counsel to the government.

PRICE'S PATENT CANDLES.

We have been requested to state, in reprinting the following from the Manchester papers, that Messrs. Richardson and Roebuck are one of the largest and oldest retail firms in the midland and northern counties, having a connection among families of the upper classes such as is possessed by few other traders in England; their opinion, therefore, on the matter in question is entitled to very great weight. The extent of their candle trade may be judged of by the fact of their purchases of the patent candles being to the amount of five thousand pounds sterling at a time.

"Richardson and Roebuck beg to state, for the information of the public, that the chief cause why the Composite (Price's Patent) Candles burn better than any other is, that they contain a very large proportion of the hard substance obtained by pressure from cocoa-nut oil by a patent process. It is a fact known to chemists for some thirty years past that cocoa-nut oil contains more hydrogen in proportion to its carbon than any other oily or fatty substance, and that it therefore gives a bluer flame, and one more absolutely without smoke, and less injurious to the eyes (in consequence of its greater similarity to the beautiful bluish-white light of day), than the flame of any other substance used in candle-making. Believing 'Price's Patent Candles' to be incomparably superior to any of the many imitations, at whatever difference of price, Richardson and Roebuck continue to recommend them to their friends; and they are happy to announce that they have made such arrangements with the patentees as will enable them to reduce the price.—Market-place, Manchester, Nov. 15, 1844." Price's Patent Candles burn without snuffing, like the finest wax, and are cheaper, in proportion to the light given, than the commonest tallow ones. They are sold by respectable dealers throughout the country, at, or under, one shilling per lb.; and wholesale, to the trade, by Edward Price and Co. Belmont, Vauxhall; and Palmer and Co. Sutton-street, Clerkenwell. Purchasers must insist upon being supplied in the shops with "Price's Patent Candles," or they are very likely to get some of the imitations, on account of the greater profit afforded to the dealer on these latter.

THE LAW TIMES.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1844.

TO READERS.

THAT we may keep pace with the Reports, which are, we presume, by far the most interesting information we can present to our readers during Term, we have devoted to them the greater portion of to-day's number, postponing all other matter not of immediate moment. The improvements adopted in our system of Reports are working as well as their novelty will permit; we have received but two or three complaints of cases omitted, and none of errors. Considering the magnitude of the plan, and the unavoidable difficulties to be encountered in its execution, the progress of it is, we trust, satisfactory to the Profession, as supplying to them an invaluable mass of information, placed in their hands with more completeness and greater speed than has been before attempted.

THE LEGAL ASSOCIATION.

A PAINFUL duty has been imposed upon us; but it is a duty, and it must be performed.

Early in the week we received from many quarters a complaint that the Secretary to the Metropolitan and Provincial Legal Association had inclosed, with the rules of the Society, addressed to the country members, a circular soliciting their agencies.

Inquiry proved that such was the fact, and we cannot hesitate to express the most unqualified disapprobation of the proceeding.

We should have added an indignant censure, but that the charge has been met by Mr. CLARKE in a manner which forbids severity. He expresses himself fully conscious of his error, deeply lamenting that a thoughtless act of his should have compromised a prosperous and promising Society; he acknowledges that the anger which his inconsiderate proceeding has produced is not undeserved; he declares his resolution to remove all suspicion from the Society by instant resignation of his office. He states, and we have no doubt that such was the fact, that it was done in a hasty moment, at the suggestion of a friend, without consideration of its effect in apparently associating the Society with his private interests. He assures us that it was not a fault committed of malice aforethought, but the inconsiderate adoption of a suggestion made to him by another, and acted upon in haste.

In the meanwhile the chairman and council of the Society have adopted the most prompt and proper measures to repudiate an act with which, upon the face of it, they appear to be connected. A meeting was immediately summoned, the results of which appear in our advertising columns. Mr. CLARKE tendered his resignation, which was accepted; and to prevent the possibility of a recurrence of such an event, it was resolved that for the future no officer of the Society should hold country agencies. Perhaps it is scarcely necessary to state that the council was entirely ignorant of the proceeding of the secretary, and we have no doubt that the Society will resolutely pursue the purposes for which it was established; and though the first case upon which it has been called upon to act was unhappily one of its own officers, it has discharged its duty, and, while it acquits him of wrong intentions, it justly censures the act itself, and proves by its promptitude that it still deserves the undiminished confidence of the Profession. We subjoin a letter we have received from Mr. CLARKE, in explanation of this occurrence, which, we believe, no person more laments than he does.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LEGAL ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—From the result of the special meeting of the council last evening, I have no doubt the publication of my resignation as a member of the Association, and of the resolution of the council thereon, will appear in the LAW TIMES of to-day, and respecting which you will perhaps have the kindness to insert a few words from me.

A few days since I forwarded a private circular soliciting agency business from certain members of the Profession, and in doing which I did not at the moment consider that as a London attorney I was committing any breach of professional etiquette in informing a country attorney that I was open for business of that description—my circular being very general, and my terms those that were usual; and the very fact of my having sent those circulars openly with the rules, &c. will, I think, clearly prove that my own impressions at the time was that I was doing nothing crooked that might savour of malpractice.

Sir George Stephen, the President of the Metropolitan and Provincial Legal Association, and the council, called a special meeting last evening, and expressed themselves highly displeased at, and strongly reprobated, my having issued the circular in question; and I must confess I now much regret having done so, although my notion at the time was that I was merely announcing a matter connected with my private business, and I fancied I had not so worded my circulars as to disgrace either myself or my Profession; nor did I look at it in the light of an undue advertisement for business. It was, however, last evening, unanimously decided by the council that I had taken a highly improper step, and that I had irretrievably committed myself, and that, painful as it was to express this opinion in regard to one of their own officers, they yet had a duty to perform to the Profession which nothing must excuse. After such an intimation, I of course felt bound, and at once expressed a wish, to resign my situation as secretary to the Association, and which resignation was accepted.

I deeply regret the circumstance, it being an offence arising more from want of thought on my part than any thing else; nor was I aware at the time that professional etiquette was carried to so nice a point as respects agency business between professional men.

I cannot, however, nor do I at all find fault with the decision of the council, as I am aware they profess and are determined to carry out the principles of the Association upon high ground, irrespective of parties, and I am sorry that the first act of that determination should have been exercised upon one who has toiled from the commencement without fee or reward in assisting to bring the Association to its present high and powerful position.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

E. CLARKE.

5, Bedford-row, 22nd November, 1844.

MR. GEORGE FARREN.

THE Barristers of Lincoln's-Inn have instituted an inquiry into this case.

We cannot state the details now, but it is enough to observe that Mr. FARREN disclaimed the advertisement and disowned the letter that accompanied it, asserting that, though the handwriting was exactly like his, it was a forgery.

The matter cannot rest here. Either Mr. FARREN has been most foully wronged by some villain who has dared to print and circulate an infamous advertisement with his name attached, and to forge his handwriting and signature to a letter so well, that of a thousand persons who saw it by the side of his acknowledged letters, not one would hesitate to swear to his belief that Mr. FARREN was the writer,—or he has been guilty of adding to professional misconduct the vilest falsehood. It is necessary, for his own sake, that the affair should be probed to the very quick; and therefore we beg to prefer two requests: First, to the gentleman who transmitted the documents, that he will immediately inform us how and where he procured them, and that he will send the envelope inclosing them, with any other information he may possess; and, secondly, to our readers generally, that if any of them have received any similar advertisements or letters, they will send them to us; and if they have even seen such, they will inform us when and where.

By so doing they will be but performing a duty both to Mr. FARREN and the Profession. Let us add to all, that, if desired, communications will be received in confidence; but we should be glad if permitted to make such use of them as we may deem desirable.

As this subject must yet again claim attention, we reserve comment for another occasion.

THE REPORTS.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

The Privy Council resumed its sittings for the hearing of appeals on Thursday, at ten o'clock, present Lord Langdale, Master of the Rolls, who presided, Dr. Lushington, the Right Hon. T. Pemberton Lee, Sir E. H. East, Sir Edward Ryan, Sir Alexander Johnstone, Mr. Baron Parke, and Lord Campbell.

BARNETT v. STEDMAN and Another.

Under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 69, ss. 1 & 9, amending the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 41, intituled "An Act for the better Administration of Justice in his Majesty's Privy Council," and extending its jurisdiction and powers, the Privy Council will hear and dispose of a bill of exceptions tendered against the judgment of a Colonial Court of Assize, without an intermediate appeal to a court of error in the colony, on security being given for debt and costs.

The facts of this case are briefly these:—George Barnett, lately of the island of Jamaica, but now residing in London, in 1837 was a co partner in the firm of Lynch, Barnett, and Girod, attorneys-at law, solicitors and proctors. In October, 1842, James Stedman and John Henry Koch, the respondents, administrators to the estate of a Mrs. Patrick Newland, late of Glasgow, merchant, deceased, brought an action of assumpsit against the appellant and William Girod, the surviving co-partners of the firm of Lynch, Barnett, and Girod, for the recovery of moneys alleged to have been received by the firm in January 1837. The declaration in this action contained counts for money had and received by the defendants and the said John Lynch in his lifetime to the use of the plaintiffs as such administrators, and an account stated between the plaintiffs as administrators; and the defendants, after the decease of the said John Lynch, in respect of moneys owing from the defendants and the said John Lynch in his lifetime to the plaintiffs as administrators. To this action the appellant and Girod severed in their pleas, each pleading the general issue, on which issue was joined. The cause came on for trial at the Kingston Assizes in Jamaica, before Sir Joshua Rowe, C. J. when Girod did not appear.

It was proved at the trial that administration had not been granted to the plaintiffs until many years after the death of Lynch, and there was no evidence of an account stated or acknowledging so, made to the plaintiffs after his death. It also appeared that the money sued for had been received by Girod in his character of procuration attorney, whilst Lynch and the appellant were in England, and had never been accounted for by him to his partners. It was contended at the trial, on the part of the appellant, that there was no privity of contract between him and the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs' title having accrued after the death of Lynch, that there was no evidence to sustain the account stated, and that Girod had no authority from his copartners to receive the money on account of the copartnership, and that, from the evidence, he must be taken to have received it, not as one of the firm, but as the procuration attorney of Newland's representatives, in which character alone he was entitled to receive it, and that the Chief Justice ought to have directed the jury accordingly. The Chief Justice refused to nonsuit the plaintiffs, and left it to the jury, whether Girod received the money as one of the firm or as such procuration attorney, directing them to find for the plaintiffs, if they should be of opinion that he received it in the former character; and the jury gave their verdict for the plaintiffs, with 1,619*l.* 12s. damages, and costs. On these grounds the defendants' counsel tendered to the judge a bill of exceptions, but which, owing to some difference of opinion between the council, was not yet sealed. In order to avoid the expense and heavy security required by the rules of the Court of Error in Jamaica, which amount almost to a prohibition against an appeal, the appellant now prayed in the form of a petition, that her Majesty in Council, under the authority of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 69, ss. 1, 9, would order the bill of exceptions, when sealed, to be referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to be by them heard and disposed of without any intermediate appeal to the Court of Appeal in Jamaica, and to make such order thereupon as to her Majesty with the advice of her Council might seem meet. Previously to the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 69, no appeal from the judgment of any Court of law of Jamaica could be made but through the medium of the Court of Error of that island. The first section of this Act enacts "that it shall be competent to her Majesty, by any order or orders to be from time to time for that purpose made with the advice of her Privy Council, to provide for the admission of any appeal or appeals to her Majesty in Council from any judgments, sentences, decrees, or orders of any Court of justice within any British colony or possession abroad, although such courts shall not be a court of errors, or a court of appeal within such colony or possession; and it shall also be competent to her Majesty, by any such order or orders as aforesaid, to make all such provisions as to her Majesty in Council shall seem meet for the instituting and prosecuting any such appeals, and for carrying into effect any such decisions or sentences as her Majesty in Council shall pronounce thereon." Sec. 9 makes any general rule or order of the Judicial Committee binding upon all courts in the colonies.

There were other points in the cause which it is not material to notice.

Millar, on behalf of the appellant, supported the prayer of the petition, and submitted that he was entitled to the benefit of this Act.

Wills, on behalf of the respondents, contended that special grounds must be brought before their lordships to warrant the application.(a) The general rule also was, that the appellant should not be allowed to appeal, unless he shewed the sincerity of his application and his own competency in the case by giving security for the amount of judgment and costs, provided he should be unsuccessful.

Millar, in reply, urged that a sufficient case had been made out to warrant their lordships in receiving this appeal.

Lord LANGDALE delivered the judgment of the Court.—We are of opinion that, on terms, this petition ought to be granted. The terms are that the appellant shall give security for the debt, and for 300*l.* as costs.

Part of the judgment related to a point in the case not material to this question, and not reported.

VERNON v. THELLUSSON.

Administration of assets—Creditor's suit—Injunction to stay trial—Notice—Delay—Practice on appeal motion—New affidavits.

Where a judgment creditor receives notice of the decree in a creditor's suit before he has obtained judgment against the executors, he will be restrained by injunction from proceeding to trial, and a false plea by the executors merely for the purpose of staying the proceedings at law, by an application to this Court, does not deprive them of their right to protection.

The principle of the cases on which the Court restrains proceedings at law after a decree in a creditor's suit considered.

New evidence may be put in on a rehearing.

This was an application to discharge an order of the Vice-Chancellor of England granting an injunction. Chinnock, a creditor of Sir Christopher Bethell Codrington, deceased, for 4,000*l.* upon bond, had, in his lifetime, commenced an action and obtained a judgment. On the death of Sir C. B. Codrington, the action was revived by scire facias, against his executors upon the judgment. They pleaded plenè administravit. The testator died the 15th December, 1842; on the 5th of February, 1843, judgment was received, and the action was commenced against the executors on the 19th of April; on the 2nd of May, the declaration in the action was filed, and on the 10th of May, the plaintiffs obtained leave to amend the declaration. The defendants had two days' time to plead given to them. The executors pleaded plenè administravit, on the 17th issue was joined, and notice of trial given for the first sitting after Trinity Term. The cause was heard on the 26th of May. The bill in equity in the creditor's suit was filed on the 3rd of May, before the time given to the executors for pleading had expired, and on the 13th the common decree was obtained. Notice of that decree was given to Chinnock's attorneys on the 13th of May. On the 23rd of May notice of motion for an injunction to stay the trial was given, and the motion was made on the 26th, the morning of the day of trial. The Vice-Chancellor had granted the injunction, and it was sought to discharge that order on the ground of delay on the part of the plaintiff in applying for the injunction.

Bethel and Campbell, for the motion.—One ground on which the Vice-Chancellor should have refused the injunction was that the executors had not given a faithful account of the assets in their hands. The pictures and effects of the deceased had been sold by Messrs. Christie, the auctioneers, on the 12th and 13th of May, who paid 1,000*l.* to the bankers of the executors, but they alleged that they had not been able, at the time of the motion, to make up the account of the sale. The total produce of the sale was about 11,000*l.* There was no other personal estate which could have been converted, and the deceased was indebted in two sums of 30,000*l.* and 60,000*l.* secured by mortgages. There was a leasehold house in Park-lane. The executors had notice of specialty debts amounting to 53,000*l.* The executors leaving the balance of the produce of the sale by auction in the hands of Messrs. Christie, without explanation, was a reason against the injunction. The injunction should have been applied for as soon as the action on the judgment was commenced. The plea of plenè administravit always includes an admission of assets. (Lee v. Park, 1 Keen, 420; Price v. Evans, 4 Simons, 514; Terrewest v. Featherby, 2 Merivale, 480; Drewry v. Thacker, 3 Swanston, 546; Largare v. Bowen, 1 Scholes & Lefroy, 299; Morris v. Bank of England, Cas. temp. Talbot, 217; Holt v. Wyer, 2 Cox, 202; Brook v. Skinner, 2 Merivale, 281, n.; Beechs v. Harrison 3 Term Rep.; Kent v. Pickering, 5 Simons, 569.) The plea of the executors, "that they have fully administered all the goods in the possession of the said testator, and have not in their hands any goods which were in the possession of the testator at the time of his death, nor had on the day of issuing the scire facias," is not the ordinary plea of plenè administravit. Should the executors die, the creditor will lose the benefit of their personal liability.

Stuart and Dean, contrà, cited Paxton v. Douglas (8 Ves. 520); Williams on Executors, 1181; Fielden v. Fielden (1 Sim. & Stu. 255). On its being proposed to read new affidavits as to the state of the assets, which had not been used upon the original motion, Bethel objected.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In all ordinary cases, on a rehearing the party is entitled to put in additional evidence; is there any authority to shew that there is any difference in the case of an injunction?

Stuart proceeded.—The affidavit states that there are judgments to the extent of 53,000*l.* against the deceased.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It has been held, in a case decided in this court, that where a plea at law is merely put in to prevent a judgment, it is of no consequence that it is a false plea. And where a judgment is suffered by default, with a view of bringing the case into this court, that is enough.

Bethel, in reply.

JUDGMENT.

Nov. 12, 1844.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case it appeared that a judgment for 4,000*l.* had been entered up in the Court of Exchequer against Sir Christopher Bethell Codrington, who died on the 15th of December, 1842. In February 1843 a writ of scire facias upon the judgment was sued out, and served on the 19th of April upon his executors. They appeared to that action, and a declaration was filed on the 2nd of May. The next day a bill was filed by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and all other creditors, and notice of that suit was given to the attorney of the plaintiff in the scire facias. There being some informality in the declaration, the plaintiff obtained leave to amend, and the defendants had two days given them to plead after the amendment. The executors, accordingly, on the 13th of May, pleaded plenè administravit. On the 11th of May the decree was made in the creditor's suit, and notice of that decree was served at the same time the plea was delivered. On the 17th, issue was joined, and notice of trial given for first sittings after Trinity Term 1843, and on the 26th of May the injunction issued. On considering the dates, if that is material in this case, it appears that there was no want of due diligence on the part of the plaintiffs in equity. The declaration was filed on the 2nd, and notice of the suit was given and the decree obtained before the time for pleading was out. A few days' interval occurred between the date of the decree and the motion for the injunction, but that happened from the courts not sitting. It was said that, as the executors had put in a plea of plenè administravit, the plaintiff ought to have been permitted to go to trial in order to falsify that plea, as it was clear, from the affidavits, that the plea of the executors was false in fact, and the plaintiff would then have obtained judgment against the executors personally. (Terrewest v. Featherby, suprà, and Brooks v. Skinner, suprà.) But these cases do not sustain the principle they were cited to support. (Lord v. Wormleighton, suprà.) It is clear that, on a plea of plenè administravit, if the verdict went for the plaintiff, the judgment must be de bonis testatoris only, and for a sum not exceeding the value of the goods found to have been in the hands of the executors. The principle on which those decisions proceed fails, because it was assumed very incorrectly that the judgment must be de bonis testatoris, et si non de bonis propriis. If there be goods of the testator, the plaintiff might bring an action on the judgment against his executors, on the suggestion of a devastavit. The executors cannot then plead plenè administravit, but can only deny the devastavit; and in such case judgment would be against the executors out of the assets. If they could prove there were no assets, that would be a discharge. (1 Institutes, 283.) If they proceed to trial, and the jury find assets, they will be withdrawn from the general administration. I concur in the doctrine of the case of Lord v. Wormleighton. Here, independently of the general question, the plea was not filed until after the decree, and it was obviously filed for the purpose of enabling the executors to gain time to make a motion to stay proceedings at law by an injunction; and it has been expressly decided, that pleading a false plea, merely for the purpose of staying proceedings at law, does not deprive the executor of his right to protection. (Fielden v. Fielden, Dyer v. Kearsley, suprà.) If the executors had suffered judgment by default, as they might have done, execution would have issued before the motion for an injunction could have been made. The Court, in cases of this sort, requires to be informed of the state of the assets, and here the account given by the executors is satisfactory. The motion must be refused with costs.

Stuart.—The creditor in the action desires to have it inserted in the order that he may be allowed to go in before the Master to prove his debt; and as otherwise he must present a petition, the executors would make no objection.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is a motion to discharge an order, therefore I may make any such addition as that required.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE v. CARTER.

Breach of injunction—Warrant remaining long unexecuted.

Thomas Pratt, who had been enjoined from committing trespass by cutting timber in Bagley-wood, was, in 1839, ordered to be committed to the Fleet for a breach of the injunction. The warrant founded upon that order had not been executed.

Bellamy moved that a new warrant might now be granted upon that order, as Pratt had lately recommenced to trespass. The present warrant directed the party to be committed to the custody of the keeper of the Fleet Prison; but that place of confinement having been abolished by the late Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 22), and persons guilty of contempts in this Court being now committed to the Queen's Prison, there was no gaoler who would receive Pratt if he should be apprehended on the old warrant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Suppose the party has something to allege against his commitment; I will not permit the plaintiff to come for a new warrant after six years, without hearing what the party against whom the application is made has to say. Many circumstances may have occurred. The plaintiffs must get a new order on a motion to commit for breach of the injunction, or move, on notice, that Pratt may shew cause why a new warrant should not issue. If the plaintiffs like to take the responsibility of executing the old warrant they can do so; but I shall give no directions on the subject, neither do I feel called upon to make any interpretation of the Act. I will not make an order for a new warrant without giving the party an opportunity of being heard.

Re LANCHESTER, a Lunatic.

Practice—Costs.

Elderton asked that the order confirming the commissioner's report in this matter might be amended by directing that the costs of the commission and subsequent proceedings might be paid.

The only property of the lunatic consisted of a sum of 900*l.* which was in the hands of a person who had refused to pay it until a commission had been issued. The lunatic was maintained by his brother.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—On the brother undertaking that the lunatic's maintenance shall not be diminished, the order may be altered.

Office Copies of Depositions.

During the argument in the cause of Parsons v. Bignold, an office copy of the deposition of a witness was handed to his lordship, in which several errors occurred, and the whole was written in a very slovenly manner.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (having complained of the "disgraceful" state of the copies, and having been informed that the persons actually employed to make the copies were paid only three farthings a folio).—The charge for office copies has already been reduced 8d. a folio, and I have it in contemplation to reduce still further the copy money in the examiner's office. This is not a question between the officers of the Court and the public, but between the Court itself and the public, as the sums received for office copies go to the Fee Fund. The low price paid for the work is scandalous, and I will take care that it shall be rectified. Enough shall be allowed to pay properly the people who do the work.

STEEL v. STEWART.

Production of papers—Privileged communications—Extent of professional privilege.

The master of a ship having been employed to go to India to collect evidence with respect to the seaworthiness of a vessel which had been condemned and sold, his communications to his employers and their solicitor held to be privileged communications; and that this is not an extension of, but, on the contrary, strictly within the principles which govern the Court in holding communications between solicitor and client privileged.

A vessel had been lost at the mouth of Hoogly on her voyage to Calcutta, and a question arose between the owner and the underwriters whether the loss was purely accidental, or whether the ship was in fact unseaworthy. The defendant in equity was the owner of the vessel, and he was plaintiff at law in a suit against one of the underwriters. Warren, the master of the ship, had been employed by the defendant to go out to India, and collect evidence there on his behalf, and he was so engaged for two years. During that time various letters were written by Warren upon the subject of the loss of the ship, some of which were addressed to the defendant himself, and some to his solicitors. The defendant, by his first answer, stated that Warren had been sent out by the defendant, by the advice of his solicitor, for the express purpose of collecting evidence. To this answer exceptions were taken, and by his second answer the defendant stated that Warren was sent out by, and as the agent of, the defendant's solicitor, for the purpose of collecting evidence. The dates of the several letters were mentioned in a schedule to the answer, and the right to withhold them was expressly claimed on the ground that they were privileged communications. On a motion before the Vice-Chancellor of England, for the production of all papers admitted by the answer to be in the defendant's possession, an order was made which expressly excepted all the letters written by Warren when in India, both those to the plaintiff himself and to his solicitor. The plaintiff appealed from that order, and asked that it should be varied so far as it excepted the letters from Warren.

Bethell and Hetherington cited Du Barry's case, mentioned in Bunbury v. Bunbury; Willis v. Rastock (4 Term Rep. 753); Sawyer v. Birchmore (3 Myl. & K. 572); Desborough v. Rawlins (3 Myl. & C. 515); Hughes v. Biddulph (4 Russ. 190); Vaillant v. Dodemede (2 Atk. 523); Combe v. Corporation of London (1 Y. & C. Ch. C. 651); Storey v. Lennox (1 Keen. 551; and 1 Myl. & C. 536); Bunbury v. Bunbury (2 Beav. 176).

Romilly and Lewis, for the defendant, contended that the master was appointed the solicitor's clerk pro hac vice, and in that character all his communications were privileged; and they cited Taylor v. Forster (Carrington & Payne's Reports), Desborough v. Rawlins, and Sawyer v. Birchmore; Bunbury v. Bunbury, suprà; Cholmley v. Perrin (2 Mylne & Keen's Reports, 380); Llewellyn v. Baddeley (1 Hare's Reports, 527); Preston v. Carr (1 Younge & Jervis's Reports); Herring v. Clobery (1 Phillips's Reports, 91); Phillips on Evidence, 131; Perkins v. Hemnshaw (Starkie's Nisi Prius Cases); Walker v. Wildman (6 Maddock's Report's, 47).

Bethell in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I recollect a clerk having been sent to the south of France to collect evidence; but I never heard of one having been sent to India.

Thursday, Nov. 14, 1844.

JUDGMENT.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case an action had been commenced in the Court of Common Pleas by the defendant in Equity, against the plaintiff, to recover the amount of a policy of insurance on the ship Sherbourn, which had been insured at and from Calcutta for a period of twelve months. The defence to this action was, that the ship was unseaworthy at the time the insurance was effected. A bill had been filed for a discovery in aid of the defence to the action, and for an injunction to stay proceedings at law. The plaintiff had moved for the production of letters and papers, admitted by the answer to be in the defendant's possession or power, and which were set forth in the schedule to his answer. The question at issue between the parties upon this motion was, whether these letters and papers so admitted to be in the custody or power of the defendant or his solicitor, did or did not come within the description of privileged communications, which he was not bound to produce for the plaintiff's inspection. The answer admits that Warren, the master of the ship, had been sent out to India by the defendant to collect evidence in support of the action on the policy, and that he had been engaged in that service for nearly two years, in consequence of its being necessary to examine a great number of natives and other persons in Calcutta who had been engaged in the repairs of the ship. It is distinctly stated that Warren's presence in India was necessary for the investigation. The answer likewise stated that Warren had been authorized by the solicitor of the defendant to pursue the inquiries, and that he had been maintained in India at his expense. In a subsequent part of the answer, the defendant admits, that while so employed, Warren wrote and sent home various letters and communications, some of which were addressed to the defendant, and others were addressed to his solicitor; but the defendant submitted that such letters and communications being confidential communications between the defendant and his advisers, in respect of the matters in difference between the parties to the suit and in the action, he was not bound to answer whether the same did relate or in some or any and what manner refer to the questions at issue in the cause. In a further answer, the defendant stated that these letters were written while Warren was so employed in Calcutta, as the agent of the defendant's solicitor, and that the letters sent home by him did refer to the matters at issue between the parties to the suit. It does not appear to me that there is any inconsistency in these two statements. Warren may have been sent out by the defendant by the advice of the defendant's solicitor, and may have also acted as the agent of such solicitor in the collection of evidence. The single question to be determined was, whether these letters and communications are to be deemed privileged. First, then, as to the letters written by Warren, as the agent of the solicitor, to the defendant; when a solicitor is employed to collect evidence for a client in reference to a pending suit, it is quite clear that all communications between such solicitor and client respecting the collection of evidence, are privileged. But a solicitor cannot always act in his own person; distance, and various other circumstances, must occasionally render it impossible for him to do so. Such was the case in the present instance. Many of the persons whose evidence was required, were natives of India, and others resident in and near to Calcutta; some one must have taken a voyage to India. It was necessary, therefore, that the solicitor should have employed an agent, and whether that agent be his own clerk, or any other person, appears to be wholly immaterial. In the performance of the duties thus required, from the agent employed by the solicitor, communications were made to the client on the subject of the evidence to be collected, which were in effect communications made by the solicitor himself, and as such were entitled to protection. Secondly, as to the letters from the agent to the solicitor himself, I consider them as falling within the same principle, and entitled to the same protection. They are equally privileged communications, having been written in furtherance of inquiries instituted by and under the directions of the solicitor, on the subject of the evidence required in support of the action at law. I therefore concur with the Vice-Chancellor in thinking these documents ought not to be produced; but I do not agree with that learned judge in the opinion that this is any extension of the principle on which cases of this class proceed. On the contrary, I think that it comes strictly within the principles which have always governed this court in declaring that communications between a solicitor and client are to be privileged. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor must be affirmed, with costs.

Re FOWLER, a Lunatic.

Waiving of accounts—Superseded commission—Practice in lunacy.

Stinton asked that an order made in this matter might be amended, by directing that the accounts of the committees might not be taken, and their recognizances vacated.

The commission had been superseded, and the late lunatic now wished to waive the taking the accounts of his brother and sister, who had been the committees of his estate. Ordered.

Re DYCE SOMBRE, a Lunatic.

Confirmation of report—Allowance to lunatic—Delivery of documents—Practice.

Wakefield having applied to have the original petition of Mr. Dyce Sombre placed in the paper to be disposed of—

Lloyd, for the committee of the estate, referred to the box of papers in the hands of the commissioner. It was necessary that those papers should be handed over to the committee of the estate, that he might take measures to get in certain debts, and keep up the payments of annuities in India, to which Mr. Sombre's property was liable. The commissioner required his lordship's order before he would place the papers in the committee's hands.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The committee can examine the papers, and such of them as the commissioners may think are requisite for the management of the property may be delivered out to the committee in person, but not to his solicitor. I understand the commissioner has made some report as to maintenance, and that, although that report has never been confirmed, the committee has made some advances in accordance with the commissioner's recommendation. But I wish it to be well understood that, in making advances without the confirmation of the report, the committee will do so at his own risk. Though Mr. Dyce Sombre is out of the jurisdiction of the Court, I feel it my duty to protect his property to the utmost extent of my power. The committee of the estate is a most respectable man; but I take this opportunity of stating that, as the report had not been brought before me for confirmation, the committee incurs very serious personal responsibility by making payments to or on account of the lunatic. I have not given my assent to those payments, and I make the observation because there has been great tardiness in all the proceedings in this matter, a tardiness which has been visible from the commencement; and of which I very much disapprove.

Lloyd.—The committee has been advised not to make, and he will not make, any further advances without your lordship's sanction.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Tuesday, Nov. 12.

FARNSHAW v. WALTER.

Practice—Demurrer—Multifariousness.

F. the inventor of certain improvements, induces A. to take out patents, both English and foreign, in his, A.'s own name. F. procures W. to pay off what is due to A. for certain advances made by him for experiments, &c. and then F. withdraws from the business, but executes a deed, whereby he grants W. a license to use the patents in all parts of England, with certain restrictions. W. having worked the patent invention for some time, entered into partnership with B. and H. under which they continued to work the patent jointly, the legal interest remaining all the while in A. from the moment they were originally obtained. Upon some question arising between F. and W. relating to their former partnership in the patents, F. filed his bill against W., A., B., and H., praying for an assignment of the patents by A. and for an account, not only against W. but also B. and H.

Held, upon a demurrer, that the bill was properly instituted; for though there might be many things which B. could not answer, yet he was rightly made a party to the suit, for that the Court could not deal justly between the parties, in respect of the patents, unless an account was taken against him also.

In the month of September 1840, certain patents from England, Belgium, Holland, and France, were granted to the plaintiff, as the inventor of certain improvements in paving and covering streets by the application of caoutchouc in combination with earthy materials. The English patent, and some of the foreign ones, were taken out by one Freeman in his own name, and the others in the name of the plaintiff, under the direction of the plaintiff, who was then abroad. Freeman had incurred some expenses in experiments; and in the year 1843, the plaintiff, having only the beneficial interest, entered into a negotiation with the defendant Walter, which terminated in his paying off Freeman his claim in respect of the advances he had made, and carrying on the working of the patent in partnership with Walter until the month of June 1843. About that time the plaintiff withdrew from the business, and executed an indenture of assignment, whereby he granted Walter a license to use the four patents in all parts of England, excepting the counties of York and Lancaster. The defendant Walter continued to work the patent invention for some time, and eventually entered into a partnership with two other parties, Brathwaite and Hull (who were made defendants to the bill by amendment), under which they continued to work the patent jointly. The English letters patent were stated to be in the possession of these two last-named defendants, whilst the foreign ones remained with Farnshaw or Walter. The legal interest in the patents had never passed out of Freeman since they were originally obtained. The bill alleged several breaches by Walter of the covenants contained in the indenture of June 1843, such as his not furnishing the plaintiff with proper accounts, his not having the articles properly stamped, and several other particulars. The bill prayed for an assignment and delivery of the patents by Freeman, and for an account of all the articles manufactured by all the defendants respectively, and of the partnership dues.

To this bill the defendant Brathwaite demurred for multifariousness, on the ground that he had no interest in the assignment, nor the plaintiff's recovery of his patents from the defendant, Freeman, or in the accounts between the plaintiff and Walter, and therefore submitted he ought not to have been made a party to the suit.

Bethel and Twells, in support of the demurrer. contended that there was a jumble of three distinct causes of suit; that the defendants, Hull and Brathwaite, had been brought into the arena of the Court whilst the other parties settled their accounts, which was a grievous infliction upon an individual who happens to be interested in one little corner only of the suit. That with respect to the claim which the plaintiff might have had with Freeman, it was totally irrelevant, for even as to the foreign patents there was a difference in several respects, some having been taken out by the plaintiff and others by Freeman. Moreover, that all the breaches of the conditions contained in the indenture of 1843 were confined exclusively to Walter.

Stuart and Cole, who appeared for the plaintiffs, were not heard.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It seems to be quite clear that an account must be taken between the plaintiff and the defendant Walter The plaintiff being the inventor of the improvements in question, did not take out a patent for them himself, but they were taken out by Freeman, who therefore at law became the patentee. There were then certain dealings between the plaintiff and Freeman, whereby the latter claimed to be entitled to certain sums of money. Then it appears that there were certain agreements whereby certain sums of money were due from Walter to plaintiff, but before the accounts could be taken, or any satisfaction had in respect of those accounts, Walter granted over the license, so as to make Brathwaite a party. It was represented on the bill, that Freeman had been satisfied for what was due to him, and that he was in reality only a trustee of the legal interest in the patent, for the purpose of granting a proper legal license to Walter and all those deriving any interest from him in the patents, including Brathwaite and Hull, and also for the purpose of clothing the plaintiff with the legal interest, subject of course to the license. Now, it is quite clear, before the Court allows a legal license to be granted according to the terms contained in the agreement between the plaintiff and Walter, it will see that what is due from one party to another shall be paid. Now, the grant of a patent is one thing, possession is another; therefore it was quite impossible for the Court to give proper directions as to the assignment of the patent and the license, and the possession of such patent, before an account was taken in the manner suggested by the bill. It is true there may be a number of matters in the bill which the defendant Brathwaite cannot answer; yet, as he has chosen to fish in troubled waters, he must bear the consequences of so doing. My opinion is, that the bill is properly exhibited, and that the demurrer must be overruled with costs.

RUFFELL v. NORMAN.

Will—Distribution—Time of vesting.

J. C. by his will devised and gave his freehold, copyhold, and personal estates to trustees, upon the trusts (among others) following:—"And when my youngest child for the time being shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, then, upon trust to pay, assign and transfer the said residue of my personal estate, and the funds and securities for the same, unto all my children who shall be then living, and the issue of such of them (if any) as shall then be dead leaving issue, to be equally divided between them, if more than one, share and share alike, and if but one, then the whole to such one." In two previous passages in his will, the testator, in reference to the interests of his children, directed, in case "his wife shall marry again, or depart this life." Held, that in the subsequent part of his will, the testator meant, in the event of his widow having married again, or having died before the youngest child attained twenty-one: and that, therefore, L. the youngest child for the time being, having attained the age of twenty-one, and having died before the widow married again, did not take a vested interest, but that, having left two children, they took as tenants in common.

John Cooper, by his will in 1818, having directed his trustees to complete an agreement into which he had entered for the sale of certain freehold and copyhold estates, and to stand possessed of the money arising from the sale thereof, upon the same trusts as he declared of his personal estate, gave and devised all the rest and residue of his real estates to his trustees in fee, upon trust for his wife Sarah, for and during the term of her natural life, if she should so long continue his widow, in order to enable her to support and maintain herself and such of his children as were unmarried and should choose to reside with her, and to educate and bring them up, until the youngest of them for the time being should have attained the age of twenty-one years; and in case his said wife should marry again or depart this life before his youngest child for the time being should have attained the age of twenty-one years, then and in either of these cases which should first happen he directed that the trust thereinbefore contained for the benefit of his said wife should from thenceforth wholly cease and be void, and that his said trustees should stand and be seised of the said hereditaments and premises, upon trust, to pay and apply the clear rents, issues, and profits thereof for and towards the support, maintenance, education, and bringing up of his said children till the youngest of them for the time being should attain the age of twenty-one years; and when his youngest child for the time being should have attained that age, in case his said wife should have married again or departed this life, then upon trust, that they, his trustees, should, as soon as conveniently might be afterwards, absolutely sell and dispose of all his said last-mentioned real estates; and the testator further directed that the moneys to be raised by the sale and disposition thereof should also be considered as part of the residue of his personal estate; and be held upon the same or the like trusts, and in the same or the like manner, as were thereinafter declared and directed concerning the same estate, from and after the decease or next marriage of his said wife, which should first happen, and from and after his youngest child for the time being should have attained the age of twenty-one years. The testator then appointed his said wife, during her widowhood, and his said trustees, executrix and executors of his will; and appointed them guardians of such of the persons and estate of his children as should be minors at his death; as to his son Daniel, until he should attain the age of twenty-one years; and as to his unmarried daughters, until they should severally attain that age or be married, which as to each of them should first happen; but if his said wife should marry again, then the testator directed that her power as one of the guardians of his children should immediately cease. After providing that his debts, funeral and testamentary debts should be paid, the testator gave certain legacies to his children, to be paid to them respectively as and when they should severally attain the age of twenty-one years, but without any interest in the meantime. And as to the proceeds to arise from the sale of his said real estates, and all the rest and residue of his personal estate and effects, he gave and bequeathed the same unto his said executrix and executors, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, according to the several natures thereof respectively, nevertheless, upon such and the like trusts, and for such and the like intents and purposes, for the benefit of his said wife during her widowhood, and of his said unmarried children until the youngest of them for the time being should have attained the age of twenty-one years, as were thereinbefore declared concerning his said real estate during such widowhood, and until such time respectively as last thereinbefore mentioned. And when his youngest child for the time being should have attained the age of twenty one years, then upon trust to pay, assign, and transfer the said residue of his personal estate and the funds and securities for the same unto all his children (excepting two of them therein named), who should be then living, and the issue of such of them (if any) as should be then dead, leaving issue, to be equally divided between them, if more than one, share and share alike, and if but one, then the whole to such one; but the issue of any deceased child should be entitled to only such part or share as such child would have been entitled to if living. And he directed that the interest of the share of any such issue who should be then under the age of twenty-one years, should be applied by his executors for and towards the maintenance, support, and education of such issue respectively during their respective minorities.

The testator died in 1819, leaving ten children surviving him. Joanna, the youngest of them, died in 1829, whereupon her next sister, Louisa, became the youngest child of the testator, having at that time attained the age of twenty-one years. Louisa married the petitioner, E. B. Ward, and died in the year 1832, leaving the defendants, Jane Ward and Daniel Ward, her surviving. E. B. Ward took out letters of administration to the estate and effects of his deceased wife. In the year 1839, Sarah, the widow of the testator, J. Cooper, intermarried with one William Norman, and died some time afterwards. A suit was then instituted for the purpose of administering the estate of the testator, to which the children of Louisa were not parties, it being then supposed that their deceased mother's share was a vested interest in her. One-ninth part of the testator's residuary estate (the supposed interest of Louisa) was therefore transferred to the separate account of "Louisa or her issue;" and an inquiry was then made before the Master as to what issue of the said Louisa were living at her decease. It was then found expedient to make Louisa's children parties to the suit by amended and supplemental bill. The present petition was presented by their father, E. B. Ward, for the purpose of having it declared whether he, as the administrator of his deceased wife Louisa, or her children, were entitled to the share so transferred.

K. S. Parker appeared for the petitioner.

Jenkins, on behalf of the children.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It appears to be quite evident that the testator intended to make a provision for his widow during her lifetime, or until she should think fit to marry again; and one of his reasons obviously was, to enable her to support and educate his children until the youngest of them should attain the age of twenty-one years. His words are, "in order to enable her to support and maintain herself and such of my children as are unmarried, and shall choose to reside with her, and to educate and bring them up until the youngest of them for the time being shall have attained the age of twenty-one years; and in case my said wife shall marry again, or depart this life before my youngest child shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, then I declare that the trust hereinbefore contained for the benefit of my said wife shall thenceforth wholly cease and be void." The testator thus provides for two events; either his widow's second marriage, or her decease before his youngest child for the time being should have attained the age of twenty-one years. The latter event did not take place. He then goes on to declare that in either event the trustees shall stand seized of the hereditaments, upon trust to apply the rents and profits of his estates for the maintenance and education of his children until the youngest should attain the age of twenty-one years, and then they are directed to sell the hereditaments. Then he declares that the proceeds arising from such sale should go and be considered as part of the residue of his personal estate, "and be held and applied upon the same or the like trusts, and in the same or the like manner, as are hereinbefore declared or directed concerning the same estate from and after the decease or next marriage of my said wife, which shall first happen." Afterwards, when the testator proceeds to deal with his personal estate, he directs the same to be held "upon such and the like trusts, and for such and the like intents and purposes, for the benefit of my said wife during her widowhood, and of my said unmarried children, until the youngest of them for the time being shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, as are hereinbefore declared concerning my said real estate during such widowhood, and until such time respectively as last hereinbefore mentioned." Had it rested thus, no doubt could have arisen upon the construction. Then we have the following sentence: "And when my youngest child for the time being shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, then upon trust, to pay, assign, and transfer the said residue of my personal estate, and the funds and securities for the same unto my children," which must be construed to mean in the event of his widow having married again, or having died before the youngest child attained twenty-one. No other sensible construction can be put upon the words of the will but this: this consequence necessarily follows, that although Louisa answered the description of the "youngest child for the time being," in the year 1829, and had then attained her age of twenty-one years; yet, as she died before the second marriage of the widow, she cannot be said to have taken a vested interest. It was not until 1839, upon the widow's second marriage, that the gift over to the children of the testator took effect. Louisa's children take as tenants in common.

ROLLS COURT.

Monday, Nov. 11.

Re CATTLIN.

The signing by solicitor and client of a debtor and creditor account, in which a bill of costs is one item, is sufficient to constitute a payment so as to preclude taxation, on a petition presented twelve months after.

An agreement as to payment, if sufficiently made out in evidence, cannot be set aside on petition under the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 73; a bill must be filed for that purpose.

This was a petition for the taxation of two bills of costs, and the question was, whether the first was paid twelve months before, and if not, whether, it having been delivered, there were any special circumstances to get it taxed twelve months after the delivery. Mr. Cattlin having in his hands moneys of the petitioners, made out a debtor and creditor account on the 15th April, 1843, in which one item was the amount of the first bill of costs; and the account was signed by the petitioner and Cattlin. The other bill was delivered in March 1844, and as to it, therefore, there was no dispute. The petition was presented on the 17th July, 1844.

Kindersley and Elderton, for petitioner.

Turner and Shebbeare, contrà.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—As the case now stands, payment was made of the first bill in April 1843, that is, by appropriation of part of the moneys in Cattlin's hands to that purpose. Whilst this account stands, how can I do any thing upon this petition? I might, perhaps, by bill, but cannot here. It seems to be supposed that this Court can, upon petition under the stat. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 73, set aside agreements; but that is not so. This mode of settling accounts, however, I do not like. This petition had two objects, one of which fails, and the other it was not necessary to come here for. I feel reluctant to do so, but I must give costs. Take the common order and costs of this application.

Re DRAKE.

A bill of costs was sought to be taxed on the ground, chiefly, that it was paid under protest: but this being denied by the other party, and the petitioner having been struck off the roll as a solicitor for swearing falsely, the petition was dismissed without costs.

Parrott, the petitioner, it was said, directed one Grove, on the 28th of June, 1844, to pay the bill of costs of Mr. Drake, amounting to about 11*l*. under protest, which it was also stated Grove did. On the [illegible] July, 1844, Parrott presented his petition for taxation, alleging as a ground, the payment under protest, and also erroneous charges. Drake denied the payment under protest; and there was no affidavit of it from Grove or any one present. It was also stated, that Parrott had falsely sworn that he paid certain sums to witnesses on a trial at law, which it appeared he never paid, and his name was in consequence struck off the roll of attorneys.

Wright, for the petitioner.

Prior, contrà.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—This petition prays for the taxation of a bill of costs after payment thereof; and it must therefore rest on special circumstances. The chief one of these is denied. Let it be dismissed with costs.

Re HOBLER.

A petition will not be restored to the paper again after it has been dismissed by consent of counsel on both sides. The parties are bound by the consent of counsel, who are relied upon by the Court as acting upon sufficient authority.

A petition for taxation of a bill of costs in this case had been presented before vacation by Watson, the then counsel of the petitioner, and before it was heard, petitioner's counsel applied to Bilton, who was for the respondent, to allow it to be dismissed without costs. To this respondent's counsel consented, on the undertaking by petitioners that no further application should be made for a similar purpose. The terms of the arrangement were indorsed on counsel's briefs and in the registrar's book.

Pike now presented a second petition, insisting that the petitioner had given no authority to his counsel to consent, and praying that the original petition might be restored to his lordship's paper, and heard in due course.

Bilton insisted that the extent of authority could not be measured by the Court, and said that all the parties originally concerned understood the terms as he did. The petitioner's case, however, had passed into the hands of another gentleman, who had instructed Mr. Pike to appear.

The MASTER of the ROLLS thought the business of the court could not be conducted without relying on the statements of counsel, who, of course, are to satisfy themselves as to the extent of their authority. The petition could not be granted; he would dismiss it with costs.

GIBSON v. CHAYTOR.

SAME v. SAME.

A demurrer to a bill for specific performance of an agreement for a lease, and to restrain an action of ejectment is not sustainable, if in the bill it is alleged that the action is brought by a third person for his own purposes, who is permitted to use, and uses, the names of the persons purporting to bring the ejectment, but is not himself a party, though the bill prays that they may be restrained from that and all other actions of ejectment.

Sir William Chaytor being tenant in common of one-fourth of a fee-simple estate, called Newfield Estate, with other persons, purchased the shares of the others at 4,000*l*. and afterwards agreed to sell the estate to the Byers-green Company for 6,500*l*. Accordingly, a deed of conveyance, in May 1840, was prepared, which the vendors to Sir William, upon having the 4,000*l*. paid to them, agreed to execute (no conveyance having been made to Sir William), and did execute and deliver it to Sir William, but he did not execute nor deliver, only 3,500*l*. of the purchase-money having been paid. The conveyance was to George Alison, a partner, in trust for the Byers Green Company, who was also a partner in a company called the Hunwick Coal Company, and a trustee of the lease of the Hunwick Colliery, in trust for himself and two other partners, John Botcherley and Thomas Brown. After the contract with Sir William Chaytor, Alison, Botcherley, and Brown agree with the Byers-green Company, in which they were also partners, for the purchase of 20 acres of the surface of the Newfield estate, on which to sink pits for the Hunwick Coal Company; and a conveyance was accordingly made to Buckton, a partner in the Hunwick Coal Company, in trust for Alison, Botcherley, and Brown, for the purposes of the colliery, or, as the plaintiff alleged, in trust for them for their own benefit; and that they afterwards leased the same to the company for 42 years from 1837, the same term as that for which they held the Hunwick colliery. In March 1842, the property of the Hunwick Coal Company was sold by the sheriff for debt, and Gibson, the plaintiff, became the purchaser, and entered into possession of the whole, including the 20 acres. The plaintiff also purchased Brown's reversionary interest in his one-third share of the same, and Botcherley having conveyed his one-third share to Alison, the latter conveyed, as the plaintiff alleged, fraudulently, the two-thirds to the defendant Gill, and afterwards became bankrupt. The Byers-green Company's property being sold under a decree of the Court, Gill also purchased on the 9th June, 1843, the unsold part of the Newfield estate. Alison then, as the plaintiff alleged, commenced an action of ejectment, in the names of Sir William Chaytor and Gill, against the plaintiff, for his own purposes, and the present bill was filed for the specific performance of the agreement to grant the lease of the 20 acres, and to restrain the action of ejectment, and all other actions, &c. &c.

Kindersley and Bates, for Sir William Chaytor, and Cooper and Hubbard, for Gill, insisted that the bill was demurrable, because Sir William Chaytor was an unpaid vendor, and the plaintiff did not offer to pay him off. Besides, it [illegible] passed by the sheriff's sale.

Turner, for the plaintiff, took a preliminary objection that the demurrer was not sustainable, because the bill alleged, and the demurrer therefore admitted, that the defendants' names were used by Alison, as plaintiffs in the action of ejectment, for his own purposes, he himself not being a party.

Kindersley and Cooper were called upon by the Court to reply on this point; upon which

The MASTER of the ROLLS said he was not satisfied with the explanation, and would overrule the demurrer, but without costs. It was only a question of costs, for if allowed he must give leave to amend. Two months' time must be allowed to amend and answer.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

Nov. 12, 13, and 22.

CRAIK v. LAMB.

Will—Construction—"Lineal descent."

Where a testator by his will gave the residue of his real and personal estate to "his relations who might claim and prove their relationship to him by lineal descent," and died a widower, and without issue, the devise was held, under the circumstances, to extend to those relations who proved their relationship by a descent from a common progenitor with the testator.

The question which arose in this case was upon the construction of the will of James Grice. The will was dated the 18th of Feb. 1837; and, after bequeathing several pecuniary legacies, was in the following words: "I give and bequeath all the remainder of my real and personal estate and effects, of whatsoever the same may consist, unto and equally between and amongst all my relations who may claim and prove their relationship to me by lineal descent, share and share alike, and do hereby empower my executors hereinafter named to make sale and absolute disposal of such estate and effects, and to distribute the same as aforesaid." The testator died on the 22nd of February, 1837, a widower, and without issue. His nearest relations by blood were first cousins, who now claimed the residue under the above bequest.

Spence and J. Adams, for the plaintiffs, who were the executors of the will.

Wigram and Busk, for the heir-at law, who contended that the devise of the real estate had lapsed.

Swanston, for the relations of the testator, ex parte maternâ, and Temple for the relations, ex parte paternâ, argued that the word "lineal" did not apply only to the persons who claimed to be in the direct line from the testator, but might be extended to those who claimed from a common progenitor. They cited Coke Litt. 23 (b); 2 Blackstone, 203 (b); and Litt. 703.

Wigram, in reply.

Nov. 22.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that the question to be decided in this case was as to the meaning of three words in the testator's will, and that it was a question not without difficulty. The testator was born in 1772. He was married once only, and by that marriage he had one child, who died under three years of age. The wife and child died many years before the date of the will, and the testator did not appear to have contemplated a second marriage. His nearest relations in blood were first cousins. The dispute in effect was whether the words "by lineal descent," ought, as the heirs-at-law contended, to be read as meaning "by lineal descent from me." Considering the circumstances, it was impossible to suppose that the testator could have meant his descendants, and his Honour would be very unwilling to come to such a conclusion unless he were compelled by some irresistible rule of law to do so. Any person reading the will with a knowledge of the facts, must believe that the words were used by the testator ignorantly. Still the question was whether the words used were too strong to be surmounted. His first impression was that they were so, but he had now, though not without difficulty, come to a different conclusion. Unless the words were understood as the heir-at-law contended they ought to be, they were mere surplusage, but still they must be understood as subject to the question of the meaning of the word "lineal." The testator, perhaps meant, that these parties were to prove themselves relations by lineal descent, meaning, by lineal descent, that they were descended from the same progenitor as the testator, and this in distinction from those who might claim by affinity. This construction was borne out by a reference to Johnson's and Richardson's Dictionaries, and by Bailey's edition of Facciolati. Considering then the circumstances in which the testator was placed, and the form and nature of the will, any argument derived from the surplusage of the words "by lineal descent," if they were surplusage, failed, for the words "from me" were not added. The words used meant that the relations were to be descended from a common progenitor with the testator, and, therefore, his Honour was of opinion that he was not bound by any rule of law to say that they must be construed as if they had been "by lineal descent from me." His Honour, however, would not give any opinion whether "relations" meant persons connected by marriage though not by blood, in other words, whether relationship included affinity. In this case he should declare that the next of kin were entitled.

FELDER v. BELLINGHAM.

Practice—Costs—Opening biddings.

A purchaser, at whose application the biddings had been opened and the price considerably advanced, though he himself was outbid, was, under the circumstances, allowed his costs and charges, and interest on the deposit made by him on his purchase.

A sale of property having been ordered in this cause, the Rev. Thomas Wheeler Gillham became the purchaser; and on the 21st of December, 1843, pursuant to an order of the Court dated the 5th of Dec. 1843, paid into the Bank of England, to the credit of the cause, 200*l.* as a deposit. Subsequently Mr. Gillham, on behalf of some members of the family interested in the subject-matter of the suit, applied to the Court to have the biddings opened, which was accordingly done; and on the re-sale, Mr. Gillham was outbid, and the biddings were advanced from 1,600*l.* to 2,100*l.* at which price the property was disposed of. Mr. Gillham now applied to the Court for the repayment to him of the deposit of 200*l.* with interest thereon at 4*l.* per cent. from the 21st of Dec. 1843; and that the costs, charges, and expenses incurred by him in and about the said order and the resale, and of this application, might be allowed and paid to him out of the funds in court in the cause. The circumstances were verified by affidavit.

Waley, for the motion.

J. Baily and Collyer appeared for different parties, and neither opposed nor consented to the motion.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that, under the special circumstances of the case disclosed by the affidavit, he should allow the costs asked, and interest at four per cent. on the deposit.

COLE v. FROST.

Practice—Assignment of an annuity made by a defendant to his solicitor in the cause, between the order for payment of costs by the defendant, and the issuing a sequestration for non-payment of them—Scandal—Costs.

This suit was instituted by creditors of an intestate, for the purpose of setting aside a sale of a leasehold interest in lands made by Ann Frost, the administratrix. By a decree made on the 23rd of February, 1844, the sale was set aside with costs, and the costs were ordered to be paid by Mrs. Frost, two months after the date of the order. The costs were taxed at the sum of 105*l.* for which Mrs. Frost was liable. There were also costs of her London agent to the amount of 168*l.* for which Mrs. Frost and her solicitor, Mr. H. Dunsford, were jointly liable to the agent. Mrs. Frost, under her marriage settlement, was entitled to an annuity of 40*l.* charged upon property, part of her deceased husband (the intestate's) estate. This annuity, it was stated, was the only property Mrs. Frost possessed, which could be subject to the process of the Court. On the 8th of April, an assignment was made by Mrs. Frost to her solicitor of this annuity. On the 23rd of April, the costs payable under the order of the Court became due, and on their nonpayment, in June, an attachment was issued against Mrs. Frost, which was followed by a sequestration of the property. The sequestrators being in possession of the property, a claim was made by Mr. Dunsford for 20*l.* the half-yearly amount of the annuity due. The plaintiff in the suit now moved that the sequestrator might pay the amount of the rent into court, and that Frost and Dunsford might be restrained from receiving the 40*l.* annuity out of the rent, it being urged that the assignment of the annuity was a fraud to defeat the process of the Court.

A motion by Dunsford was also at the same time made, for liberty for him to be examined pro interesse suo. The assignment, it was alleged by Dunsford, had been made bonâ fide, and in consideration of his costs.

Among the affidavits filed in support of the original motion was one reflecting upon the character of Mrs. Frost in a matter irrelevant to the subject in dispute.

Simpkinson and Follett, for the original motion.

Russell and Wood, for the cross-motion, contended that the Court had no jurisdiction to interfere with a person not a party in the cause, brought here by a sequestrator.

Simpkinson, in reply.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument: Franklin v. Colquhoun (3 Swanst. 310). and the cases cited in Mr. Swanston's note to that case); Kaye v. Cunningham (5 Madd. 406); Jones v. Claughton (Jac. 524); and 1 Daniell's Chancery Practice, 645.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The grounds taken in the argument by Mr. Russell and Mr. Wood are entitled to considerable attention; but they have not satisfied my mind that there may not be reason to act to some extent on the notice of motion given by the plaintiffs. Mr. Dunsford asks himself, by his notice of motion, to come in, and the right course appears to be to treat these two motions as having come on together. Let Mr. Bascombe (the sequestrator) be ordered to pay into court 30*l.* and the rent to become due from time to time, to be verified by affidavit. Refer it to the Master to inquire what, if any thing, is due to Mr. Bascombe for rent, after allowing the 30*l.* Let no proceedings be taken to recover the annuity of 40*l.* until further order. The above directions to be without prejudice to any question. Then, in the language of Mr. Russell's notice of motion, let Mr. Dunsford be at liberty to go in to be examined pro interesse suo. The Master to be at liberty to state any circumstances specially with regard to the consideration and intent of the deed of assignment. The residue of the notice of motion to stand over. Considering the statements in some of the plaintiff's affidavits, I direct the plaintiffs to pay 4*l.* on account of costs. Reserve other costs.

KENT v. WATERHOUSE.

Practice—10th Order of April 1828.

Quære, whether, under the 10th Order of April 1828, the motion that the defendant should be examined upon interrogatories, and stand committed until he should have perfectly answered such interrogatories, should be made ex parte?

Cockrill, in this case, upon the defendant's third answer being reported insufficient, moved ex parte, under the 10th order of April 3, 1828, that the defendant should be examined upon interrogatories to the points reported insufficient, and should stand committed until he should have perfectly answered such interrogatories. The old practice was that the motion should be made without notice. (Farquharson v. Balfour, 1 Turn. & Russ. 184.)

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, however, thought that it had better be mentioned to the Lord Chancellor, as he did not like to take such an extreme measure as to make an order to commit a man without notice.

Friday, Nov. 22.

INGLIS v. BROMLEY.

Practice—Application for liberty to conduct the suit, in consequence of want of due diligence in the prosecution by the plaintiffs—Costs.

Wright in this case moved on behalf of two legatees that they might have the conduct of the suit, on the ground of the want of due diligence in prosecuting it on the part of the plaintiffs. The suit was instituted by the residuary legatees under a will, for the purpose of administering the estate of the testator. The present applicants were made parties to the suit, but were afterwards, at their own request, dismissed. A decree was made on the 4th of June, 1843, directing certain preliminary inquiries to be made by the Master, but nothing effectual had been done in the case since. The present applicants had not established their claim before the Master, and therefore were unable to apply under the 56th order of April, 1828.

Swanston, in opposition to the motion, stated that the plaintiffs had, on the 17th of January last, carried in a state of facts before the Master, and that they had been engaged in a correspondence with parties in Ireland, to ascertain whether James Thompson, one of the defendants, was within the jurisdiction or not. Bromley, another of the defendants, and one of the executors, had, in the early part of the year, become bankrupt. There was a prospect that the plaintiffs would immediately be in a position to place evidence before the Master which would enable them to proceed with their accounts.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply) said that it was a clear case, and that the order must be made in the usual form.

Wright then applied for the costs.

Swanston contended that the costs did not necessarily follow the result. There was merely delay on the part of the plaintiffs, but there was no hint of there having been any abuse in consequence of the delay.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The last letter in the plaintiff's correspondence is dated the 23rd of April last. Without saying whether the time up to that date has been properly employed or not, there does not appear to have been any thing done since. The plaintiffs must pay the costs of the motion.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Friday, Nov. 22.

REG. v. GREGORY.

Application to postpone trial and judgment.

Platt, Q. C. moved to postpone judgment and the trial of a criminal information, fixed for the 29th inst. till next term. It appeared that the former sentences of imprisonment expired on the 26th inst. and this application was founded on an affidavit by the defendant, that, owing to the rupture of a vessel in the lungs, he believed that his life would be in jeopardy if obliged to appear. [By the COURT.—Is there an affidavit of a physician to that effect?] There is not; but the Court granted a similar application on the same affidavit before.

Talfourd, Serjt.—If there were a medical certificate I should not oppose the postponement, as to coming to receive judgment at least.

DENMAN, C. J.—It is certainly rather hard that because we gave an indulgence before, that that is to be pressed upon us as a reason for doing the same now.

Rule refused; with leave to give fresh notice of another application.

REG. v. TOWN COUNCIL OF STAMFORD.

Mandamus.

Whitehurst, Q. C. shewed cause against a rule obtained by Talfourd, Serjt. for a mandamus to the Treasurer of the Town Council of Stamford to render an account of the sum of 197*l.* 19s. 2d. received by the council under the 60th section of the Municipal Act. No request had been made, and no refusal to give the account. Rule refused.

LONG BENNINGTON v. DALBY.

Writ of prohibition.

Kelly, Q. C. moved for a writ of prohibition to stay proceedings instituted against the defendant, who had been libelled in the Consistorial Court of the Diocese of Lincoln as chapel-warden of the township of Postan, which, having been jointly rated together with Bennington to the church-rate, had refused to pay its share, alleging that Postan was a separate parish not amenable to the parochial jurisdiction of Bennington.

Martin, Q. C.—The ground for refusing was, that the people of Postan were never summoned to pay rates at all, and that if there was a power to levy at all, it was one by custom alone, and then to levy three-eighths only on Postan.

Martin, Q. C. contrà—There is no ground for prohibition in this case, which is unnecessary and expensive. (Beauchamp, Earl of, v. Turner, 10 Ad. & Ell. 218. This question has been previously before the Court. Reg. v. Dalby, 3 Q. B. 602.) It ought to be tried by mandamus. The Ecclesiastical Court has no jurisdiction in this case; it is a matter affecting the parish officers. (Stead v. Heaton, 4 T. R. 669.) The mode of proceeding is to make a rate in proper form, and then enforce it by mandamus. (Reg. v. Thomas, 3 Q. B. 589; 5 Com. Dig. I. tit. Prohibition.)

Kelly, in reply—The proper mode is to order parties to declare in prohibition. (Burder v. Veley, 12 Ad. & Ell. 233; Fuller v. Clemans, 6 Coke's Rep.)

Martin.—The applicant need not be put to declare in prohibition. (Re Chancellor of Oxford and Taylor, 1 Q. B. 952.) Rule refused.

REG. v. WILSON.

Courts of Quarter Sessions have power to quash indictments before plea pleaded.

Keating now shewed cause against a rule obtained last term for quashing an order made by the justices of Gloucestershire, whereby they quashed an indictment preferred by Mr. Augustus Newton at the Quarter Sessions. The order had been brought up by certiorari. This was a judgment, and as such could not be dealt with by motion and certiorari, but can alone be reversed by writ of error after judgment. (R. v. [illegible], 7 T. R. 373; R. v. Jackson, 6 T. R. 145; R. v. Potter, 2 Ld. Raym. 938; 1 Chit. Crim. Pleading, 747.) No authority, after diligent search made by Mr. Greaves, can be found on the other side. The ancient procedure was to bring the record up by certiorari, and assign error on it, but this is disused. The next point is, that the Court of Quarter Sessions have full authority to quash indictments. Courts of Assize have a jurisdiction inherent in the common law to exercise this power, and it is impossible to assign any valid reason why the Courts of Quarter Sessions should be excluded from it, the power being equally committed to them to do all that may be requisite for the ends of justice. It is often requisite to quash an indictment when, for instance, it charges several felonies in one count; the terms of the commission are to try offences and "inspect all indictments." The power was given to the sessions to try murders; why not the far lesser power of quashing indictments? All the incidents of common law proceedings attach to courts practising by common law. (Rex v. Wadley, 4 M. & Sel. 508; Hartley v. Hooker, Cowp. 523.) [WILLIAMS, J.—You are assuming that they did right to quash this indictment because it contained several counts.] No; I am contending only for the right of the sessions to quash, not for the discretion with which they exercised that right. [WIGHTMAN, J.—The record does not shew on whose application the indictment was quashed.] No; but it is drawn up by the clerk of the peace, and is in itself a judgment. [DENMAN, C. J.—We do not think at present we can go into the grounds of the order to quash.] Authorities against the power to quash should be adduced on the other side. There is nothing at present but a doubtful dictum in Jervis's Archbold.

Newton, contrà, referred to the proceedings at Gloucester. [DENMAN, C. J.—What we said was, that at present we would not enter into the question whether the discretion of the Court below was well exercised or not.] It is laid down in a book of universal use and some authority as a distinct rule that indictments must be removed to the Court of Queen's Bench from all inferior courts to be quashed. (Jerv. Archbold, Crim. Plead. 66.) This Court is called upon to establish a power which, if granted, will be exercised throughout the kingdom, by courts, of which it has been the tendency rather to restrain than to increase the jurisdiction of late. In this case the indictment had been found at a preceding court of quarter sessions. The defendants had a copy of the indictment furnished to them with the consent of the prosecutor, they then gave the prosecutor notice "that they intended to appear at the sessions, then and there to try their traverse." They did not plead, but moved to quash the indictment. The prosecutor was not allowed to be heard, on the ground that he was counsel in his own case. One party was heard and the other party was not heard; and the decision was come to on the one-sided view the Court took of the matter. In the first place it is required by 60 Geo. 3 & 1 Wm. 4, c. 4, s. 5, that in all cases where defendants are committed or held to bail to appear to answer for misdemeanours at a subsequent session, "he or she shall plead to such indictment at such subsequent session and trial shall proceed thereupon at such same session of the peace." This express enactment was not complied with. To give the Court of Quarter Sessions jurisdiction, there ought to have been a demurrer or plea of abatement. There was neither, and the Court had no sort of authority to do as it did. On demurrer the indictment would have been good, and the defendants must have admitted the charge. There may be cases in which the Court of Quarter Sessions may quash an indictment, but not in this case, where neither the statute nor the course of common law proceedings has been pursued. Where the Court has manifestly exceeded its jurisdiction, it is competent to remove the proceedings by writ of certiorari without writ of error. (Rex v. Justices of West Riding, 5 T. R. 629.) The Court of Quarter Sessions will possess a large and dangerous power, if in them the choice rests to quash indictments at their pleasure without plea or demurrer, and after refusing to hear the other side. There are difficulties sufficiently great already to discourage prosecutions.

Denman, C.J.—Mr. Keating has put this question in its right light as regards the right to quash indictments. There is no doubt that the courts of quarter sessions do possess power to quash indictments before plea pleaded. Courts of superior jurisdiction possess this power, and there is clearly no reason why inferior courts should not equally exercise it. They are to exercise their discretion upon the whole bearing of the matter brought before them. This Court may institute any inquiry as to the mode in which their jurisdiction is exercised; but here we have to look only as to whether they had the power or not. Mr. Newton has argued as if improper motives were imputable to the Court of Quarter Sessions in this case: if so, the rule should have been drawn up for a criminal information. There might have been very strong grounds for considering that the jurisdiction was improperly exercised in this case, but of that we can say nothing now, the writ of certiorari being clearly not the proper mode of bringing the circumstances before us.

Williams, J.—I was much pleased with Mr. Keating's remark, that it was for the other side to cite authorities to shew that a power did not exist, which there was every reason to suppose did exist, inasmuch as it is exercised by all courts of assize. Both courts are intrusted with the trial of felonies: why not with the same power to try them, and with the subordinate power to quash indictments? But no authority is cited; therefore I conclude that none such exists. On the return to the writ no question is open to us but the competency of the sessions to quash indictments. I think they have that power.

Coleridge, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is a question of jurisdiction. Mr. Newton, as well as Mr. Keating, seemed to say that in some cases the Quarter Sessions have power to quash indictments. They sit and try with all the incidents of common law proceedings, and clearly have power to quash indictments. This indictment was found it appears at a previous sessions. Mr. Newton thereupon cites a statute which he thinks compels defendants to plead under the circumstances of this case. This is a mistaken view of the case; that statute was merely intended to prevent delay. It could not be said to a judge that he could not try an indictment because it was found at a prior assize. The Sessions may have come to a wrong conclusion, but this does not affect their jurisdiction. Indictments have been quashed merely because the style of the sessions was wrongly laid. (Rex v. Roysted, 1 Lord Kenyon's Rep. 255.) It may be that the Court of Quarter Sessions have decided wrongly; if so, let the proceedings be brought here by writ of error, and we can then determine if the Justices were wrong.

Wightman, J.—I am of the same opinion. The Court of Quarter Sessions seems merely to have done that without demurrer which they might have done undoubtedly upon demurrer. The whole argument is, that they have not acted judiciously; this may be a proper matter for our inquiry, if the proceedings are brought here by writ of error. Rule discharged.

Keating applied for costs.

Denman, C. J.—The rule must be discharged, without costs. This is a question upon which we entertained very considerable doubt; and it was for the purpose of considering the question that we granted the rule.

Young v. Hickens.

After general verdict, and the discharge of a rule for a new trial, the Court will not grant a discontinuance to enable a plaintiff to set aside verdict for himself with nominal damages, so as to try the defendant again.

A rule for a new trial had been discharged two terms ago. Another rule was obtained by the plaintiff setting aside the verdict in this action, and entering a nonsuit, or for a discontinuance on payment of costs. There was a verdict found for the plaintiff with nominal damages of twenty shillings on the 1st count at the trial, and for the defendant on the 2nd and 3rd issues. This was an action of trespass, which arose out of a dispute as to the right to certain Pilchard fish, the defendant having thrown his net within that of the plaintiff. The plaintiff contended at the trial that some part of the defendant's net was open, so that the fish in question were not caught by him; on which ground Atcherley, Serjt. so directed the jury that they only gave nominal damages to the plaintiff for the disturbance to his net, finding for the defendant on the issues which went to the right to the fish, inasmuch as they were not "quite caught."

Crowder, Q. C. now shewed cause against this extraordinary rule, which had been applied for, in effect, to try the defendant over again, and re-open the question. There cannot be a discontinuance of the general verdict, but only after especial verdict, and then only by great favour. (Price v. Parker, 1 Salkeld, 178; Row dem. Gray v. Gray, 2 Wm. Bl. 815.) Neither can discontinuance be allowed after verdict by a side bar rule. (Goodenough v. Beetles, 2 C. M. R. 240.)

Montague Chambers, in support of his rule.—There will be a failure of justice if this rule is not granted. The record is in so complicated a state, that it is the only remedy. The Court has full discretion to order discontinuance. (Sweeting v. Halse, 9 B. & C. 369, n.) [Coleridge, J.—There has been no special verdict found here. You come after we have exercised a jurisdiction.] The officer did not deliver out judgment. [Williams, J.—Is there an affidavit of that?] I wish to trust to the recollection of the Court. We are willing to resign our judgment for 20s. I apply for leave to discontinue, and not for a side bar rule.

Denman, C. J.—The circumstances of the case must be very peculiar under which we grant an application such as this. We might do so under very peculiar circumstances, but certainly not under these. There is a marked distinction between the cases where a special, and only a general verdict has been found. The plaintiff should have applied for a cross rule last Term, and should then have stated the views he held, and we might have found some remedy. The delay is not properly accounted for. We cannot encourage reliance on this sort of indulgence, and cannot go so far out of the way as to grant this rule.

Doe dem. Selwyn v. Walters.

Order to set aside writ of possession too late.

Butt, at the desire of Patteson, J. applied to the full court for a rule to set aside an order of the Lord Chief Baron, which order set aside a writ of possession granted to the lessor of the plaintiff, on the ground that no notice of declaration was given to the landlord. The application to set the writ of possession aside was too late, judgment having been given in July 31, 1844, and the application to set it aside on the 15th of October. Rule nisi.

Ex parte John Long.

A mandamus does not lie to compel a gaoler to give a statutory allowance to a prisoner who acts under rules prescribed by the Secretary of State.

Pashley moved for a peremptory mandamus to command the gaoler of the Fleet Prison to allow John Long, a poor prisoner, committed for contempt of the Court of Chancery, 3s. 6d. per week and fuel, under 53 Geo. 3, s. 113, and 5 Vict. sess. 2, c. 22; from a fund thereby appropriated to the relief of prisoners who were not worth 10*l*. The gaoler justified his refusal by an order and rule of Sir James Graham. These rules only extend to the classification of the prisoners, and to putting those who, like the prisoner, belong to the one class, into another, where, at the end of twelve months, the allowance ceases; but this is only where the prisoners can then be discharged. But it can be no answer that the gaoler is acting under an order of the Secretary of State, if by compliance with it starvation may ensue, and murder be done. This may has no other means of sustenance. [Coleridge, J.—If the rules are laid before Parliament, I apprehend they must be enforced.] Suppose they are manifestly absurd and cruel. Suppose they order all red-haired prisoners to be knocked on the head, are they to be obeyed? [Coleridge, J.—That which the Secretary of State orders, with the sanction of Parliament, is at least binding on the gaoler.] If the rule is that men are to be locked up without food and it is no answer to an order to that effect, that it is both illegal and cruel, such a state of things is very much worse than the ancient law, debitores in partes dissecandi, which allowed creditors to cut debtors in pieces after a certain time; for they were at least kept till the time came. There is here a statutory right to certain relief out of a county fund, set apart for this express purpose, and I ask for a peremptory mandamus to compel the gaoler to give it. It is no reason against it, that this is an interference with an officer of the Crown. It is money paid into his hands. (Reg. v. The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury (4 Ad. & Ell. 286); Rex v. Payn (6 Ad. & Ell. 392); and is therefore distinguishable from Re Baron de Bode (7 Dowl. 776); and I ask for a peremptory mandamus for this most pressing and urgent necessity, on the authority of Reg. v. Fox (2 Q. B. 246) and Reg. v. Scott (2 Q. B. 248). [Coleridge, J.—Was Sir James Graham applied to to interfere?] He must have been requested; for the affidavit states there was a refusal.

Denman, C. J.—We cannot grant a mandamus in this case. The superintendence of the prison rests entirely with the Secretary of State, and the affidavits ought distinctly to state that he has been applied to, and that he has refused to interfere. They do not do so, and this application cannot be granted.

Saturday, Nov. 23.

Apstead v. Tickener.

Where goods had been sold and the proceeds paid into court under an interpleader rule, and the claimant who had succeeded in the issue under such rule brought an action to recover the difference between the value of the goods so sold and the sum paid into court, the Court granted a rule to set aside the proceedings in the first action.

In this case, Platt, Q. C. had obtained a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the proceedings in this action should not be set aside, and why the plaintiff should not pay the costs of the action and of this application.

It appeared that the defendant Tickener had obtained judgment against one John Apstead, the father of the present plaintiff, Mary Apstead; that he had issued execution, and that the sheriff had seized certain goods, which it was alleged belonged to Mary Apstead; an action having been brought by her against the sheriff to recover the goods, he interpleaded, and Tickener was made defendant in the action; but Mary Apstead not being able to give security for the goods, the judge directed them to be sold and the money paid into court to abide the event. The plaintiff having obtained a verdict, now brought the present action for the difference between the value of the goods in question and the sum they fetched at the sale.

Knowles, Q. C. now shewed cause, and contended that the plaintiff had a right to bring the present action; and if not, the present application to the Court was not the proper way to raise the question, which might be done by pleading judgment recovered in the usual way, which would put the defence on the record, instead of trying the question by affidavits, as was the case now. He further contended, that if the Court now held that the recovery in the former action under the Interpleader Act was a bar to the present one, and made this rule absolute, the plaintiffs would have no means of reviewing their lordships' decision in a court of error.

Platt, Q. C. was not called on by the Court.

By the Court.—We do not think we are called on to decide whether a recovery under the Interpleader Act is a bar in all cases, and are not prepared to say that it is; but this is an application to the discretion of the Court; and it appears to us that the whole matter in dispute has been decided. It is sworn that the whole matter has been decided by the former action, and you have not negatived that affidavit. The plaintiff might have given security, and then the goods would not have been sold; and if she could not have done so, she should have so objected before the judge, and then he would not have interfered.

Rule absolute, but without the costs of the action.

Reg. v. The Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes for the Borough of Stamford.

Mandamus—Probate duty, return of, under 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, s. 24—When made.

This was a rule calling on the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue against them for the payment back of certain duties.

It appeared that one Stacy had died, leaving a will, by which he devised his property, real and personal, to three persons, of the names of Jackson, Falkener, and Tridget. The real property amounted to 3,000*l*. and the personal to 18,000*l*. The will was duly proved by Jackson and the others, and about 1,200*l*. probate duty paid at the rate of 10 per cent. the devisees being strangers in blood to the testator. Soon after this a claim was set up to the property by the next of kin, and the executors were cited in the Ecclesiastical Court to prove the will in solemn form. Eventually, however, a compromise was entered into between the parties. The executors did not appear to support the will, and administration was granted to the next of kin, who, on receiving 8,000*l.* from Jackson and the others, gave up his claim to the rest of the property.

The question for the Court now was, on this state of facts, whether Jackson and the others were entitled to receive back the probate duty they had paid under the 23rd and 24th sections of 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, on the 8,000*l.* so paid over to the administrator.

The Solicitor-General and Crompton now shewed cause, and contended that the parties had not brought themselves within the 24th section, as they were bound to do.

Kelly, Q. C. contrà.—We are clearly within the Act. The duty was paid on a probate. There is now no will existing, therefore we are entitled to the return of the difference of the duty payable by a stranger and that payable by the next of kin; we do not seek the return of the duty payable by the administrator, but only the difference.

Denman, C. J.—We think you are within the Act, and suppose that this intimation of our opinion will be sufficient without making the rule absolute.

The Solicitor-General.—Certainly, my lord.

Rule discharged.

DOBSON and OTHERS v. GROVES and OTHERS.

Where an arbitrator examines a witness in the absence of one of the parties to the award, this is a good ground for setting aside the award, although no improper motive is imputed to the arbitrator.

This was a rule calling on the defendants to shew cause why the award made in this case should not be set aside, on the ground of irregularity on the part of the arbitrator. It appeared that certain disputes had arisen between two rival pier companies at Greenwich, and that an action had been brought by Sir Richard Dobson and others, who were shareholders in one company, while, on the other hand, an indictment had been preferred by the other party against Sir R. Dobson and others for an alleged public nuisance, by injuring the navigation of part of the river Thames by an embankment, and preventing persons from landing at the other pier, or from navigating their boats on that part of the river. At the trial of the indictment it was agreed to refer both the indictment and the suit to arbitration. The arbitrator made his award in favour of Groves and the other defendants in the action, on all the material issues, and also awarded that the embankment in question was a nuisance, and directed it to be abated.

It was now sought to set this award aside, on the ground that the arbitrator had examined a witness for the defendants in the absence of the other party; there being present a gentleman, a special pleader, who had acted as counsel for the defendants; and that he had refused to allow their attorney to be present, although he had requested to be allowed to remain. There were other objections to the award on which nothing turned.

Platt, Q. C., C. Jones, Serjt., M. Chambers, and Hugh Hill now shewed cause, and contended that as no corrupt or improper motives were imputed to the arbitrator, the only question for the Court was whether the simple fact of his having examined a witness in the absence of one of the parties to the award was such an irregularity as would vitiate the award. Here it was submitted it would not; it was shewn by the affidavits that the party who had been examined had been mentioned by one of the witnesses as a person who could give important evidence on the subject of the award, but that neither party would call him as a witness, although requested so to do by the arbitrator. Under these circumstances, it was contended that the arbitrator had a right to call him, not as the witness of either party, but to assist him in making his award. Emery v. Ware (5 Vesey, 848), and Anderson v. Wallace (5 Clark & Finn. 26), were in point, and shewed he might do so. Further, that it was not at all shewn that the defendants had done any thing to bring about the meeting; and that as to the special pleader being present, that was sworn to be accidental, and that he had not interfered in any way at the meeting in question.

Cases cited: Achison v. Cargey (2 Bing. 199); Warner v. Heaver (3 B. & Ad. 295); Atkinson v. Abrahams (1 B. & P. 175); Bignol v. Gale (2 M. & G. 830).

M. D. Hill, Q.C. contrà (Watson, Q.C. Bodkin, and Baddeley, with him).—There is a clear irregularity of the arbitrator here, sufficient to vitiate the award. Walker v. Frobisher (6 Ves. 70), and Featherston v. Cooper, establish the principle and are in point; and the judgment of Lord Eldon in the latter case decides the question. (Stopped by the Court.)

By the Court.—The principle here is clear; nothing is imputed to the arbitrator but an irregularity; it is clear that the meeting was held for the purpose of enabling the arbitrator to make up his mind, which ought not to have been done unless there had been a power expressly given him so to do in the submission. We think the principle held by Lord Eldon is the correct one, and that we ought not to be bound by the cases cited on the other side. We throw out of mind the minute circumstances of this case and decide it on the broad principle.

Award—Irregularity of arbitrator.

HUNTER v. CALDWELL.

(Argued Nov. 4.)

SEMBLE, An attorney is not liable for negligence for omitting to file within five months after their date writs issued for the purpose of avoiding the effect of the Statute of Limitations.

This was an action brought by Hunter against the defendant, who was an attorney, for negligence. The facts of the case were, that some time in 1841 Mr. Hunter directed the defendant to commence an action against one John Hicks, and at the same time, as Hicks could not be found to be served with process, directed the defendant to take all such steps as are required by 2 Wm. 4, c. 39, s. 10, to prevent the debt for which the action was brought being barred by the Statute of Limitations. It appeared that the defendant Caldwell had issued certain alias and pluries writs in accordance with that section of the Act, but that the two last writs had not been duly returned and filed with the proper officer, in consequence of which Hunter had been nonsuited at the trial. He then brought the present action, and obtained a verdict against Caldwell. Some time since the now Solicitor-General obtained a rule to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial, or to arrest the judgment.

Crowder, Q.C., and Ball now shewed cause, and contended that the verdict was right. The 10th sec. of the Act had not been complied with, owing to the negligence of the defendant, whereby the plaintiff had lost his right to recover. The defendant should have filed each writ within five months of its having been issued, after having had it returned non est inventus by the sheriff. Filing a writ means entering of record, the neglect of which he is charged in the declaration. Witnesses were called at the trial, who shewed this to be the practice, and this practice not having been complied with, was such negligence in the defendant as rendered him liable to an action.

The Solicitor-General and Rawlinson, contrà, contended that there had not been such gross negligence on the part of the defendant as rendered him liable to an action. Much difficulty is felt in the profession as to the meaning of the words "entered of record," and there is no decision to shew that it is necessary to file the writs within five months, as contended for on the other side. The defendant is not bound to know what construction the Court may put on a doubtful Act of Parliament; and even if the Court now decide that it is necessary, still that will not justify the jury in finding the defendant guilty of gross negligence where the point is so doubtful that even the witnesses called at the trial differed in opinion as to the practice; further, the judge should have decided the point as to the gross negligence, and not have left it to the jury, who were not competent to decide a point of practice of this court.

Cases cited: Dunmore v. Jenkins (2 A. & E. 260); Bulmer v. Gilmore (4 M. & G. 108); Kemp v. Burt (4 B. & Ad. 432); Brocker v. Chandles (3 Camp. 17), Elkington v. Holland (9 M. & W. 655); Williams v. Williams (10 M. & W.); Godfrey v. Dalton (3 B. & A.)

Cur. adv. vult.

Denman, C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—This was argued early in Term. A motion was made for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, or against the evidence, or to arrest the judgment. The negligence charged in the declaration was, for not filing a record, and the question was, whether there was proof of not entering the record in a particular way. We are of opinion there ought to be a new trial, at all events, because we are of opinion the jury were not justified in calling by the name of gross negligence an error in a matter so very doubtful as this. Ultimately, if there should be another verdict, it may possibly be fit to inquire if the judgment should not be arrested, but at present we think it not to be so; because the evidence ought to go before a jury, and then it is impossible to put the question whether the party acted wrong without putting the other, whether it was gross negligence.

Subsequently Crowder came into court and mentioned the case.

Crowder.—In a case of Hunter v. Cardwell, in which your lordships granted a new trial, as I understand, upon the ground of the verdict being against the evidence, that would be upon payment of costs, I apprehend?

Denman, C. J.—Yes.

REG. v. GREGORY.

Wordsworth moved for judgment against Barnard Gregory.

Platt, Q.C. moved that the indictment be quashed, or to arrest judgment, on the ground that it was wrongly found, inasmuch as the 13th section of 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 36, which enacts, that no bill of indictment, other than for perjury, or subornation of perjury, shall be presented to the grand jury, unless the prosecutor shall have entered into recognizance to prosecute. The indictment had been found against this defendant eighteen days before the recognizance was entered into to prosecute. Therefore the Central Criminal Court had no jurisdiction; and this recognizance was only to prosecute a libel, whereas the defendant was indicted for eleven. (Rex v. Carlton, 6 C. & P.)

Talfourd, Serjt. (with whom was Wordsworth), prayed for time to consider and shew cause against the motion.

Ordered to stand over.

REG. v. COMMISSIONERS OF EXCISE.

Entry of Channel Island spirits—Mandamus.

M. D. Hill, Q. C. moved for a rule to shew cause why a mandamus should not issue to compel the Commissioners of Excise to issue permits for the introduction of some casks of spirits from the Channel Islands into the port of London, on which the duty had been paid under 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 42, s. 40, the excise officers pretending that they were not allowed to permit importation by an order of the Board, made under the belief that the system of excise in the Channel Islands did not sufficiently guard against fraud. Assignment of errors against a judgment of outlawry.

Kelly, Q.C. assigned errors in behalf of Colonel Tynte, upon a judgment of outlawry against the deceased defendant in the time of Geo. I. in whom the Barony of Wharton then vested, which Colonel Tynte now claims. The assignment of errors was handed in to the Court by the claimant in person.

REG. v. WALLER.

Assault by parish officer—Service of notice that rates are due.

Whateley, Q.C. moved for a new trial of this indictment for an assault alleged to have been committed by a parish officer of Shoreditch at a vestry holden in the church there. The parish officers had, acting within their authority, erected barriers to keep all people out who had no right to be present. All persons who were not rate-payers were excluded, and the defendant forcibly excluded the prosecutor, a Mr. Hopkins, which was the assault complained of. It appeared that the prosecutor was in arrear in the payment of his rates, but that he had had a written notice thereof. The whole question turned on whether this notice, not having been served personally upon him, but only left at his house, was sufficient so as to justify the parish officers in excluding him for nonpayment; otherwise it was admitted there was a clear assault. (Reg. v. Ford, 2 Ad. & Ell. 589.) The 5 Geo. 3, c. 85, was also cited, to shew that there was no necessity of personal service.

GILL v. PIGOTT.

Amendment of plea—Plea of illegality.

Sir J. Bayley moved for a rule to allow the defendant in this action to add a plea of illegality, or to plead again on withdrawal of plea.

It appeared that, owing to the decision in the Court of Exchequer respecting the race in which Running Rein came in first, the plaintiff became legally entitled to the second prize in a lottery upon that race, in which the plaintiff had drawn the horse which came in third. The defendant was the stakeholder, and had paid the money over, by the direction of the club, to another party. Illegality is not an issuable plea, or the defendant would have applied to amend. (Humphreys v. Earl of Waldegrave, 6 M. & W. 622; Staples v. Houldsworth, 4 B. & C. 144.)

Greenwood, contrà.

By the Court.—This is a case in which we cannot interfere. Had not the money been paid over by the defendant, it would have been asking the Court to abet fraud.

Re THOMAS WOOD, One, &c.

Attachment refused to compel solicitor of board of guardians to sort and deliver up its papers promptly.

The Solicitor-General shewed cause against a rule for an attachment against Mr. Wood for refusing or neglecting to give up to the board of guardians of the poor of St. Mary, Newington, a host of documents belonging to them. These documents extended several years back, and came into Mr. Wood's hands as solicitor to the guardians. He was now pressed to deliver them to his successor, and had already done so as regarded papers belonging to the last seven years; but as they occupied two rooms, he was excused in the delay that had occurred in sorting and scheduling them.

The search extended over thirty years. Mr. Wood believed he had no more than those delivered.

Gray, contrà.—The delay has been great, the excuses frivolous, and the papers are not all delivered up. Rule discharged without costs.

Addison moved for a certiorari to remove an indictment found against the defendants, which would otherwise be tried at the winter assizes, which were not attended by the leading members of the circuit.

NICHALLS v. WARREN.

An arbitrator to whom an award is referred back in general terms to be amended, is bound to receive fresh evidence if offered to him.

This was an award respecting the height of water to which the parties were respectively entitled. A rule had been obtained to refer the award back to the arbitrator, Serjt. Shee, "a complaint having been made that certain matters were omitted from the award, it was referred back to the arbitrator to be amended." Subsequently to the first award, new evidence had been discovered which he was required to go into, but which he refused to receive. A rule nisi having been obtained for referring the award back again for the purpose,

Platt, Q.C. (with whom were Chambers and Lush), shewed cause against the rule. The arbitrator examined fifty or sixty witnesses, and felt he could not have more information than he had already got. He would have gone beyond the terms of the rule had he received more evidence; its spirit was to reconsider the materials of his award, but not to re-open the arbitration. He awarded that the head of water was to be fifteen inches, and it was not necessary for him to demarcate the height by ordering a stone on the bank which might sink. Besides, he had a right to exercise his discretion.

DENMAN, C. J.—I do not see how he could without fresh evidence.

Kelly, Q.C. contrà, was stopped by the Court.

DENMAN, C. J.—The terms of the reference are general. This put it in the power of the arbitrator to go over the matter again; and thus, if he was asked to hear fresh evidence, he was bound to have done so. The award must be referred back again.

Kelly, Q. C. asked the Court not to refer it back to the same arbitrator, who seemed, of all the gentlemen at the Bar, the only one who had come to a strong conviction against them.

DENMAN, C. J.—Certainly there are strong considerations against referring to the same arbitrator. We have great respect for him, but there certainly are some incorrect proceedings on his part.

Kelly, Q. C.—We are willing to refer to any other arbitrator.

Platt, Q. C.—We will never consent to it. We will go to a jury. Rule absolute.

DOE dem. LEQUEUX v. HARRISON.

Evidence of the constitution of a society must be given to enable them to recover in ejectment copyhold property under a devise—A mandamus will lie to a lord of the manor who is seized quousque to admit the heir, there being no adverse possession.

A rule for a mandamus having been applied for, an action of ejectment had been directed to inform the conscience of the Court as to the heirship of certain copyhold property in the manor of Botsham, of which a portion had been devised to the company. The lessor of the plaintiff was the heir of the surrenderor. The lord of the manor had made proclamation for an heir, and was seized quousque. Neither the heir nor the society had been admitted. The heir is entitled to bring an action against a stranger, but quære whether he can sue the lord before admittance. To get rid of this technical difficulty, it was agreed before the action was brought, that the objection on the score of the non-admittance of the heir should be waived. At the trial, the will having been put in, the objection was taken that the devisee was not admitted; and that the waiver did not extend to him. It was also objected that there was no evidence to shew who the society was. The will contained a bequest of 10*l.* for the support of some "dumb animals."

Platt, Q. C. (with whom was Peacock) now shewed cause against a rule for a nonsuit. There is not a tittle of evidence as to the existence of this society; or of the dumb animals either, whose grandchildren may be in their graves. The 10*l.* was bequeathed only so long as they should live. The Statute of Mortmain would bar the claim of the society. The legal estate remained in the surrenderor. The Court has full power to grant a mandamus to admit a copyholder, who claims by descent. (Rex v. Brewers' Company, 3 B. & Cr. 172; Rex v. Wilson, 10 B. & Cr. 80.) The lord was the defendant in this action, and could not be prejudiced by the verdict for the plaintiff. The heir has a right to mandamus without any admittance at all, which may be dispensed with in this case. (Doe dem. Burrell v. Bellamy, 2 M. & Sel. 87.)

The Solicitor-General (with whom was Gurney), contrà.—The agreement was to waive all technical objections to ascertain the heir; it was not intended that they were to be free and that we were to be fettered. It is not necessary that devisees should be admitted.

COLERIDGE, J.—Is there enough to shew who the London Annuity was? Whether they were a corporation or a voluntary society, and whether they were competent to take land or not, you have no evidence. The date of the will, moreover, is 1837, devising lands in Surrey. Why were steps not taken sooner?

The Solicitor-General.—Perhaps they might not know of it.

COLERIDGE, J.—Yes; it is stated they had notice.

The Solicitor-General.—It is only stated that it is believed they had notice.

WIGHTMAN, J.—Are they capable of admission?

The Solicitor-General.—If not as a corporation, perhaps they are competent to take as individuals.

COLERIDGE, J.—You did not go far enough with your evidence; even admitting the technical point.

The Solicitor-General.—The Statute of Mortmain applies only to "charitable uses." There were none such here, unless it be contended that the care of the dumb animals was one. The lessor of the plaintiff is a stranger to the estate, and can have no right to recover as against the devisee of the copyholder, who has the legal estate. (Doe dem. Borough v. Reade, 8 East, 353.) The defendant might defend himself upon his title, there being no adverse possession. The 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 3, gives a testator the power of devising copyhold property without surrender to the uses of his will, and without having been himself admitted to the estate.

COLERIDGE, J.—That statute takes effect from January 1, 1838, and does not apply to a will made before it was passed.

DENMAN, C.J.—This rule must be discharged, and the rule for the mandamus ought to be made absolute.

COLERIDGE, J.—The lord being seised only till the tenant comes, does not hold adversely.

Rule discharged.

Ex parte THE MAYOR OF GREAT YARMOUTH.

A criminal information will be granted for calling a mayor a puppy and a fool with reference to his magisterial capacity, and threatening to wring his nose.

This was a rule for a criminal information against Charles Corry Aldered for abusing and assaulting Mr. Samuel Charles Marsh, the Mayor of Great Yarmouth.

It appeared that a man named Palmer had been brought before the mayor and another magistrate (Captain Pearson) for ringing at the door of Mr. Aldered, who sent a note of the charge to the mayor, who sent it back, as the mayor's affidavit stated, with a message that Mr. Aldered must come himself, but, according to Mr. Aldered's affidavit, with an addition to the message, that "if he sent any more impertinent messages, he (the mayor) would pull his nose." Three days after Aldered and the mayor met in the street, when the former accosted the latter, and, laying his hand on the mayor's arm, according to the mayor's statement, said, "What do you mean by sending this note to me?" and, on the mayor's declining to answer him, added, "You are a puppy, and a pretty d——d fool for a mayor, and I have a good mind to pull your nose," at the same time raising his hand to the mayor's face in a threatening manner, and followed him down the street. These facts were deposed to in the affidavits of several witnesses. Mr. Aldered and other deponents denied the assault, and averred that he had accosted the mayor in a civil and courteous manner, who replied, in a foolish, absurd, ludicrous, affected, and pompous tone, "Sir, I shall give no answer to you." That Mr. Aldered then merely rejoined, "I will give you a useful piece of advice; if you conduct yourself in an impertinent manner, I will wring your nose." He denied following him down the street.

Platt, Q.C. against the rule.—The sum total of the offence is, I have a mind to wring your nose, if you do so and so. This is no ground for a criminal information. It was so held in Rex v. Darby Carthew, where a magistrate was called "a cockle-headed justice." The mayor was the aggressor. Why was not an action brought or an indictment preferred? The offence took place on the 12th June, and on the 4th of November the aggrieved party comes to this court for a criminal information. There was no assault.

Martin, Q.C.—From the first to the last it is impossible that the mayor could have done otherwise than as he has done. He was bound to reject the written charge in the first instance, and when assailed in the street, he said he refrained from resenting the insult as it became him to do, in consideration of his magisterial function. He looked to that Court, as he had a right to do, for protection. The gravamen of the insult was in alluding at all to pulling his nose.

DENMAN, C. J.—The words having been spoken of the mayor in his magisterial capacity, are not sufficiently excused, and there must be a criminal information. Rule absolute.

DOE dem. WARWICK v. COOMBS.

The non-observance of a manorial custom that a surrenderee be admitted within three years, does not necessarily involve a forfeiture. The lord may waive or enforce the custom at his pleasure.

This special case was argued on Nov. 12. An action of ejectment had been brought to recover certain copyhold lands in the manor of Hackney. There was a surrender by Mary Pigott to pay Warwick on trust to secure an annuity, through whom the lessor of the plaintiff claimed in 1815; but there was no admittance within three years by the surrenderee. By statute anno 21 Jac. 1, for the confirmation of certain copyholds in the manors of Hackney and Stepney it is enacted, that all customs set forth in a certain deed shall be of "as full force and effect as if they were specially enacted by the authority of this Parliament." The surrender in question was to the use of Gray Warwick according to the customs of the said manor: among these customs was one that the surrenderee "ought to come to be admitted within three years."

Watson, Q.C., for the plaintiff. The words "ought to be admitted" are not imperative. They do not say the land shall be forfeited on non-admittance. The only course would be, that the lord might make proclamation, and seize quousque until the surrenderee purge himself of the contempt. (Gladstone v. Long, Cro. Eliz. 879.) In this case the surrender was conditional, to which the custom does not apply. It was a surrender only to secure an annuity for lives, and as soon as the lives dropped, so would the estate, for the surrender was of the entire estate in fee for the lives. The custom alone binds the landlord and his tenant. The lord here waived the rigour of the custom, and admitted the surrenderee, which he had full power to do after the three years had elapsed.

Kelly, Q. C.—Here is a complete defect of title in admittance, according to the custom of the manor. The surrender was in 1815, and the admittance not till five years after. Admittance is of the very essence of the customs of a manor, and if these are not rendered imperative by the statute, none are in force, and the Act is null. The defendant is in possession, clothed with the legal title, and has a right to call upon the disturbing party to prove his title. The Legislature must have had conditional surrenders in its eye, and yet says, "every person who shall surrender shall come," &c.

COLERIDGE, J.—Where there is an absolute surrender, the servant must be upon the Court Roll, but need this be in the case of a conditional surrender?

Kelly, Q. C.—There is no conditional surrender named in the Act.

COLERIDGE, J.—The Act does not exclude general rules, but only regulates particular cases.

Watson, in reply. The statute had reference to particular disputes. This does not apply generally. (Coke's Copyholder, 128.) The lord has a right to exercise his privilege, and may waive admittance. (Cowp. 741.) It is not said that he may not admit after the three years if he chooses. Cur. adv. vult.

The Court now gave judgment.

DENMAN, C. J.—Doe d. Warwick v. Coombs was argued in the special paper. The land sought to be recovered was copyhold of the manor of Hackney; and the title of the lessors was not disputed, except in the point of admittance, which, it was contended for the defendant, was void, because it was made more than three years after the surrender, and so contrary to the custom of the manor. The customs are settled in a statute passed in the reign of King James I., and by the 34th item it is provided "that every person to whose use the said land or tenements shall be surrendered, ought to come within three years to take up the same if he be of age, and be admitted, or pay his fine, or else by his guardian." This was a case of conditional surrender in 1816, and the lessee was admitted in 1820. It was contended on the part of the surrenderors that every binding custom was binding only between the lord and tenant; and that, at all events, in respect of the conditional surrender, it could not so apply where, by the intention of the parties, no admittance might take place at all, and none would be contemplated until there was a breach of conditions. It is unnecessary to consider the latter point because we agree with the plaintiff on the former. The obvious intent of the custom is, that the lord should have his tenant on the rolls, and know who he is, and receive the fine. If the custom be not observed, the lord may insist upon it, and enforce it by such remedies as the custom may give him; but he may also waive it, and he does so by admittance. Judgment for the lessor of the plaintiff.

REG. v. FEOFFEES OF OTTERY CHARITIES.

A mandamus had been obtained, ordering a Dr. Coleridge to deliver up certain trust deeds to the trustees of a charity. A rule had been obtained to shew cause why the prosecutor in this case should not be allowed to demur. The return to the mandamus had been made, and what amounted to a stet processus had been ordered.

Willis, in support of the rule.

Rogers, Q. C, contrà.—This has been argued in concilium. There is a writ which has not been decided to have issued improvidently. The writ and the return are still outstanding. The Court will not interfere.

By the COURT.—We have no authority in this matter. Rule discharged without costs.

STULTZ v. WYATT.

Proclamation in outlawry.

Watson, Q. C. shewed cause why the proceedings in outlawry should not be set aside, with costs, for irregularity.

Sir J. Bayley, contrà.—The proclamation is defective. The 1 Vict. c. 45, requires the notices to be upon all the church doors. There are affidavits shewing that it was only on one, there being many chapels, and one other church. This is not a mere irregularity, but the whole proceedings are void.

By the COURT.—This application cannot be granted; the objection should be taken in error.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Saturday, Nov. 23.

HEMSWORTH v. BRYANT.

Where, in a case of arbitration, the plaintiff is told he will have notice of a day to reply before the award is made, and notice of award made is afterwards given, the not having had the opportunity of replying on the whole case will not be an answer to laches, and neglect on the part of the plaintiff in not coming in time to the court will be a good answer to the objection.

Channell, Serjt. moved for a rule nisi why an award should not be set aside. The order of reference was dated May 23, 1843, directing that the costs of the cause and the reference should abide the event of the award. The award was made on March 23, 1844, and was therefore not within the time limited by the statute. Several meetings took plac between May 23, 1843, and March 23, 1844, at the last of which the defendant closed his case, and it was arranged before the arbitrator, with the defendant's consent, that an appointment should be made for the plaintiff to address the arbitrator, the arbitrator then to make a reply on the whole case. Before the 23rd of March, namely, on the 16th, a docket was struck against the plaintiff, who subsequently became a bankrupt. No notice of appointment had ever been given to the plaintiff. Notice of the award had been given on the 8th of May, but a copy of the award was not delivered until the 8th November. An award without notice is a non-existing award. (Re Smith and Another, 8 Dowl. 133; Perring v. Keymer, 3 Dowl. 98; Rogers v. Dallimore, 6 Taunt. 111.)

TINDAL, C. J.—Your ground of motion is that, 1st, the plaintiff expected, and he had reason to believe, that there would be a day given for his reply, which was not given; 2nd, that the commission of bankruptcy, with the consent of the defendant, took the merits of the case into consideration, and found the other way. Although, certainly, the cases shew that a rule is not laid down in these causes which is to be observed strictly, the Courts, to a certain extent, govern themselves by analogy to the statute. Here, on the 8th of May the plaintiff has notice of the award in time to make his objection: but, instead of coming to the court in Trinity Term, he delays, and allows expenses to be incurred in the meantime, and he now comes to move to set aside an award which, in the interval, he treated as a valid and a good award. Rule refused.

ELRIDGE v. CULLING.

Where under a peremptory undertaking the plaintiff was to try at the sittings after Term, and the cause was entered on the evening of the last day, this is too late, and the Court will not interfere to set aside the judgment as in case of nonsuit.

Byles, Serjt. shewed cause against the rule nisi in this cause why the judgment of nonsuit should not be set aside on payment of costs. The ground upon which judgment was signed was, that the party had not proceeded to trial pursuant to a peremptory undertaking. It was sought to set aside this judgment for irregularity. The action, which was for debt, was commenced on the 29th December, 1842. The day after the commencement of the action the plaintiff arrested the defendant, and kept him in gaol until October, 1843, when he was discharged by supersedeas. The plaintiff declared in the action on the 9th January, 1843, and the defendant at once pleaded never indebted. The plaintiff having taken no further steps, the defendant, in November, 1843, ruled him to reply. The plaintiff did not proceed to try, and in Easter Term last the defendant obtained a rule nisi for judgment as in case of nonsuit. The rule was discharged on a peremptory undertaking to proceed to trial at the sittings after Trinity Term. The plaintiff entered the cause for trial on the evening of the last day for entering the causes for trial, just before the closing of the office. On the 13th June the sittings commenced, and the cause was made a remanet. Under these circumstances it was the plaintiff's duty to apply to enlarge the peremptory undertaking. The first four days of term passed, and it was not until the seventh day the rule was obtained. The Court should have been informed of these circumstances. (Ward v. Turner, 5 Dowl. 22, citing Gilbert v. Kirkland, 2 Dowl. 153.) Had the plaintiff proceeded to trial, the verdict would then have been regular. (Wegnete v. Marlord, 1 D. & Lo. 735.) The plaintiff having purposely neglected to bring the cause on for trial, the judgment is regular.

Channell, contrà.—The cause was properly entered for trial, and the plaintiff has performed the conditions of the peremptory undertaking. The briefs to counsel were not delivered, because the plaintiff saw the cause could not be taken.

ERLE, J.—The books of practice lay down that a party who propounds an excuse must take care to come in time.

COLTMAN, J.—There is a case cited in the last edition of Arch. Prac. 366.

TINDAL, C. J. (delivering judgment).—The 14 Geo. 2, c. 17, begins by stating that where any issue is or shall be joined in any action or suit at law in any of his Majesty's Courts of Record, and the plaintiff has neglected to bring such issue on to be tried according to the course and practice of the said court, it shall be lawful for the judge, at any time after such neglect, upon motion, to give judgment for the defendant as in cases of nonsuit, unless the judge shall, upon just cause and reasonable terms, allow further time for the trial of such issue; and if plaintiff shall neglect to try such issue within the time so allowed, then judgment shall be given. I am disposed to hold that the word "neglect," where it applies to default in observing the peremptory undertaking, ought to have the same construction as the word "neglect" in the earlier part of the statute; that is, if he neglect to bring the cause on to trial according to the "course and practice of the Court." It cannot be said, that because the cause had been made a remanet, therefore the plaintiff had neglected to bring on the trial according to the "course and practice of the Court." But has he used due diligence? The affidavit states that the peremptory undertaking was given on the 8th of May. On the 11th of June, the last day for entering causes for trial, the plaintiff enters the trial so late in the evening that it cannot be tried, while the affidavit goes on to state that if the cause had been entered during the morning, the cause would have been tried. This, when coupled with no briefs having been delivered to counsel, and the repeated delays in every step of the cause, the defendant having to urge him on at every stage of the proceedings, it must be said that the plaintiff has neglected to bring the cause on within the rule, and that he has been guilty of default, and we think we ought not to interfere.

The rest of the COURT gave judgment to the same effect. Rule discharged with costs.

Monday, Nov. 25.

GIBB v. KING.

Quære, if a defendant in custody of the keeper of the Queen's Prison for a criminal matter can, since the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, be brought up to this Court to be charged in execution on a civil action?

The defendant was brought up by a habeas corpus directed to the keeper of the Queen's Prison, in order to be charged in execution with a judgment debt of 60*l.* 1s. recovered against him by the plaintiff. The return to the writ by the keeper of the prison was that the defendant was in custody under a warrant of commitment for a misdemeanor.

Byles, Serjt. in behalf of the defendant, moved that the defendant might not be so charged in execution. The ground of objection was, that this Court had no power to have a defendant brought up to be charged with a civil action when the defendant is in custody on a criminal account. (Walsh v. Davies, 2 N. R. 245; Jones v. Davers, 5 M. & W. 234; and Freeman v. Weston, 1 Bing. 221.) The only question was whether the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22 (by which the Fleet prison had been abolished, and the Queen's Bench prison constituted, under the name of the Queen's Prison, the only prison for debtors, &c.) had made any alteration in the practice in this respect.

No counsel appeared for the plaintiff.

The COURT adjourned the matter until next Term, on the understanding that there should not, in the meantime, be a supersedeas, and that notice should be given to the plaintiff to shew cause.

COVINGTON v. HOGARTH.

Where the plaintiff has proceeded, as well by action as by summoning defendant, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 11, before the Court of Bankruptcy, for the purpose of having the debt admitted, and the defendant has, in consequence of such proceedings in bankruptcy, paid the debt, the defendant cannot stay the proceedings in the action without paying the costs also.

Talfourd, Serjt. shewed cause against a rule obtained by Channell, Serjt. in this Term, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why all further proceedings in this action should not be stayed, the plaintiff having received the amount of the debt under proceedings taken in the Court of Bankruptcy.

The facts of the case were as follows: On the 31st of August last the plaintiff filed an affidavit of debt for 60*l.* 17s. 6d. against the defendant in the Court of Bankruptcy. On the 2nd September notice was served on the defendant requiring payment of such debt, and, at the same time, the defendant was served with the writ of summons in this action. On the 6th Sept. notice was given that the former proceedings in bankruptcy were abandoned, and defendant was then summoned under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 11, before the Court of Bankruptcy, for the purpose of admitting or denying the debt. The defendant thereupon appeared and filed an admission of the debt in the Bankruptcy Court, and afterwards paid the amount of such debt to a person on behalf of the plaintiff; but the costs of the action not being paid, the plaintiff delivered a declaration. The defendant then took out a summons before Cresswell, J. to stay the proceedings in the action, without the payment of costs, but the learned judge refused to make any order, and referred the matter to the Court. A further summons was, however, afterwards taken out by the defendant for particulars of the plaintiff's demand, under which particulars were accordingly delivered. The question was, whether where a party has proceeded for his debt as well by action as by notice and summons under the late Bankruptcy Act, he is to have the proceedings in the action stayed without payment of the costs.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff, that the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, ss. 11 & 12, gave remedies to the creditor for the enforcement of his debt, which were only collateral to his right of action.

Channell, Serjt. in support of the rule submitted that the defendant having paid the debt, was within the equity of the statute, 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 59, and entitled to have the cause stayed without paying the costs.

The COURT said, the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, contemplated the action subsisting, notwithstanding proceedings in bankruptcy under that Act; as, where the defendant denied the debt, he was required to give security for costs as well as for the debt. There was no provision to deprive him of his costs, but he had in fact a double remedy for obtaining his debt. The action was still in existence, and could be stopped only in the ordinary way after action, which was by payment of costs. If the defendant wanted to protect himself from costs, he might do so by giving the required security under the Act; but if he had no defence to the action, he must pay the costs.

Rule discharged.

POOLE v. GRANTHAM.

Where, in an action of trespass, there is a demurrer, as well as issues of fact, and judgment is given for the plaintiff on the demurrer, and the plaintiff goes to trial on the issues of fact without entering the demurrer on the record, with a tam quam venire, and obtains a verdict for only twenty shillings damages;

although, notwithstanding the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, s. 2, the plaintiff is entitled to the costs of the demurrer without a certificate, yet he is not entitled to any of the costs of the cause.

Sir Thomas Wilde, Serjt. shewed cause against a rule obtained by Byles, Serjt. this Term, calling on the defendant to shew cause why the Master should not be at liberty to review his taxation of costs in this cause.

The action, it appeared, was trespass quare clausum fregit, and for taking goods. There was a plea of the general issue, and other pleas on which issue was joined, and a demurrer to a plea which went to the whole cause of action. Judgment was given in favour of the plaintiff on the demurrer; and on the trial of the issues of fact, the plaintiff obtained a verdict, damages 20s. The learned judge not having certified at the trial, the Master refused to tax the plaintiff his costs. The trial had taken place more than a year ago, and the record had subsequently been lost. Byles, Serjt. therefore agreed to admit that the record must be considered to have been a common nisi prius record, without the demurrer entered together with a tam quam venire. On the part of the defendant it was denied that the plaintiff was entitled to any other costs than of the demurrer, and Brewer v. Dew (3 Law T. 60) was cited.

Byles, Serjt. relied on Taylor v. Rolfe and Others (13 Law J. N. S. Q. B. 39), as shewing that the plaintiff was entitled to the costs of the demurrer, notwithstanding 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, s. 2; and contended that as the plaintiff would have been entitled therefore to a proportionate part of the costs of the trial had there been a tam quam venire, he ought not to be in a worse situation because he had not set out on the record matter which was superfluous and only tending to lengthen the proceedings.

MAULE, J.—You are asking for costs of what has not taken place, on the ground that, if it had, it would have been unnecessary.

TINDAL, C. J.—You are entitled to the costs of the demurrer, but that is all. The rest of the rule must be Discharged with costs.

COLSON v. BISHOP OF CARLISLE.

Rule H. T. 4 Wm. 4—Several counts—Quare impedit.

Talfourd, Serjt. applied for a rule calling on the plaintiff to elect on which of the counts in this action of quare impedit he would proceed, and that the other counts be struck out.

The question was whether the rule of Hil. T. 4 Wm. 4, which confines the plaintiff to one count does not apply to real actions.

Cases cited: Shepherd v. Bishop of Chester (6 Bing. 437); and Doe dem. Williams v. Williams (2 A. & E. 381). Rule nisi.

WATT & WIFE and OTHERS v. SMITH.

The certificate of an acknowledgment under the Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 74, s. 84), taken under a special commission, is not the less the certificate of such of the commissioners by whom it purports to be made because it is signed by more.

An affidavit verifying the certificate may be made before one of the commissioners executing the commission, if such person is qualified to take oaths.

Shee, Serjt. moved that the certificate of acknowledgment by three married women might be enrolled pursuant to the Fine and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 74, s. 85).

The commission for taking the acknowledgment was directed to three commissioners; namely, Jesse Dicker, Jones Berridge, and Alexander McKan, and authorized them, or any two of them, to take the acknowledgment.

One of the objections raised by the officer of the Court was, that the certificate purported to be the certificate of Jesse Dicker and Alexander McKan only, but was in fact signed by the three commissioners.

TINDAL, C. J.—The signature of the third commissioner was only superfluous.

Another objection made was, that the affidavit verifying the acknowledgment was made by Jesse Dicker before Berridge, one of the commissioners, who had executed the commission.

TINDAL, C. J.—I am not aware of any rule that the affidavit may not be taken before another of the commissioners, who is qualified to take oaths.

Rule granted.

STEWART v. PATCH.—Dowling, Serjt. shewed cause against a rule obtained by Channell, Serjt. for setting aside the judgment, which had been signed as in case of a nonsuit.

Rule absolute on payment of costs, and a peremptory undertaking to try at the sittings after next term.

KAVANNAGH v. GUDGE and ANOTHER.—Byles, Serjt. applied for a rule to shew cause why the Master should not tax the costs of the demurrer on which the plaintiff had obtained a judgment. Rule nisi.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Friday, Nov. 22.

WALTON v. MASKALL.

Demurrer—Meaning of "honoured" as applied to a promissory note—Reception of a promissory note for and on account of a debt, and to give time, does give time.

In this case the plaintiff had declared in assumpsit against the defendant on a guarantee to pay a certain promissory note of 17l. in case it should not be "duly honoured and paid" by the makers.

The declaration set out that, in consideration that the plaintiff would receive of Messrs. Johnson and Elkins their promissory note for 17l. for and on account of a certain debt (therein specified), and thereby give them time for the payment thereof," he defendant promised to pay the said sum of 17l. in case the promissory note should not be "duly honoured and paid" by the said Johnson and Elkins when it became due. It averred that the plaintiff did receive the said promissory note for and on account of the said debt, and did thereby give time for the payment thereof; but that Elkins and Johnson had not honoured or paid the said promissory note when it became due, although they had been duly requested.

The plea traversed the allegation of request to Johnson and Elkins to pay the note.

To this there was a demurrer.

Knowles, for the demurrer, submitted that the allegation of a request to Messrs. Johnson and Elkins was not a immaterial averment.

Martin, in support of the plea, contended that it was, and urged that "honoured" meant paid on request when due. He cited Lewis v. Gompertz (6 M. & W. 403). He contended also that the declaration was bad, on the ground that it did not appear therefrom but that the promissory note had been taken for and on account of the debt, as a collateral security, in which case the plaintiff by receiving it would not have given time.

PARKE, B. said "honoured" meant "paid at maturity."

POLLOCK, C. B. said that the reception of a note in pursuance of an agreement, by reception thereof to give time for the payment of the debt, was, in law and fact, a giving time for so doing; and in illustration he cited Kearslake v. Morgan (5 T. R. 513).

The COURT delivered their opinion seriatim, that the declaration was good and the plea bad.

Judgment for plaintiff.

[It should not be inferred from the above case that though "honoured" means simply "paid at maturity," that "dishonoured" means not "paid at maturity;" "for," said Pollock, C. B. "it is possible a bill may be neither honoured nor dishonoured." And again, it may be observed, dishonoured has been held to import not paid on presentment at maturity. So that presentment at maturity was imported into the meaning of the word as an essential part. (See King v. Bickley, cited Byles on Bills, 4th ed. 205, n. d.)

In a word, a bill may be honoured or it may be dishonoured; but between these two there is a third term—viz. not honoured.]

SMITH v. PARKER.

Libel—Pleading—Defendant, in pleading to a libel, must not sever an allegation which is entire.

This was a declaration for libel. The libel consisted of a paper which alleged that the plaintiff was the master of the Grammar-school at Lichfield, and, the more the pity, a clergyman; that he had been brought up before the magistrates for beating the boys; that for seven years no boys had received instruction at this school, owing to the violent conduct of the plaintiff as master.

The defendant pleaded, with other pleas, that the plaintiff had been brought up before the magistrates for beating the boys; that, for seven years, no boys had received instruction at the school.

To these pleas the plaintiff demurred.

Martin, in support of the demurrer, urged that the simple fact that plaintiff had been brought up before the magistrate for beating boys was not enough to justify the publication of this.

But POLLOCK, C.B. said, it might be laid down as a universally true proposition that in an action of libel truth was a sufficient defence.

Secondly, Martin urged that the other plea above noticed was no answer to the charge in the declaration, which was not simply that no boys had received instruction at the school, but that this had happened through the violent conduct of the plaintiff as master.

Warrington, in support of the last-noticed plea, contended that the simple assertion that no boys had received instruction at the school was libellous, and, therefore, presented matter for confession and avoidance, to which the plea might address itself.

But the COURT held it was not, and it was not what the defendant was charged with.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

WORTH v. TERRINGTON and Others.

Trespass—Pleading—There may be new assignment of imprisonment ultra in trespass for assault and imprisonment, and plea pleaded justifying imprisonment for "reasonable time."

In this case the declaration was for assaulting and imprisoning the plaintiff.

One plea justified the assault, on the ground that the defendant was improperly forcing himself into the clerk's desk in a certain church, so the defendants removed him.

Another plea, in answer to the imprisonment, justified imprisoning the plaintiff for a "reasonable time," on the ground that, after he had been removed he attempted to return, and would have returned but for such restraint.

The replication was de injuriâ, and the plaintiff newly assigned that he complained of imprisonment for more than the reasonable time.

To this new assignment the defendant demurred.

Bramwell, in support of the demurrer, contended that the new assignment was bad for duplicity. This, he said, might be tested thus—viz. that the plaintiff, if he succeeded either on the issue de injuriâ, or on the new assignment, might recover damages which would cover his whole cause of action.

But, said PARKE, B. so he would in the ordinary case of declaration in trespass quare clausum fregit, with right of way pleaded, replication, traversing the right, and new assignment of extra viam.

The COURT stopped Cowling, who was for the plaintiff, and said they had already held, in Cohen v. Smith (see Leg. Chron.), that time was as divisible as space; so the replication and new assignment in this case stood on the same footing as in the ordinary case of trespass quare clausum fregit, and were good. Judgment for plaintiff.

WHEATLEY v. JAY.

Bill of exchange—Pleading in abatement.

Non-joinder of co-acceptor is not sufficient—The plea must disclose he was co-drawee.

In this case the defendant had pleaded in abatement to a declaration in assumpsit against him as acceptor of a bill of exchange.

The plea was demurred to, on the ground that mere statement of the non-joinder of a co-acceptor was not enough; it should have shewn that the bill had also been drawn on him—in other words, that he was a co-drawee.

Peacock, in support of the plea.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Saturday, Nov. 23.

THE MAYOR OF MACCLESFIELD v. GEE.

Practice—The discontinuance of an action upon which there were issues of fact outstanding after judgment on demurrer, does not preclude the parties from bringing a writ of error.

Williams shewed cause against a rule obtained by Henderson, calling on the plaintiff to shew cause, amongst other things, why a rule to discontinue obtained in this action should not be set aside.

The Mayor of Macclesfield had commenced six actions against as many butchers, to try the right of the butchers to sell in their shops on market-day. In each of these actions several pleas had been pleaded, and there had been demurrer to the four pleas in each case. One case was selected for trial. The demurrer had been decided in favour of the plaintiff, but the defendant succeeded on the issues in fact. Under these circumstances the plaintiff had taken out a rule to discontinue on payment of costs. Assuming that the plaintiff was entitled to receive them, the plaintiff's costs on demurrer, it was said, were greater than those which the defendant would be entitled to receive on the issues in fact; and on taxation the Master would not allow the defendants their costs, except by deduction thereof out of the costs to be paid to the plaintiff. It was on account of this taxation that the present application was made.

Henderson, in support of his rule, submitted that no writ of error lay after a rule to discontinue; 2nd, that the plaintiff had no remedy for his costs; 3rd, that by the rule to discontinue he was bound to pay the defendant's costs. Thus, it will be seen, his case depended on the hypothesis that compliance with a rule to discontinue dictated in its very process payment of all costs to defendant, and was a positive bar to all further proceedings in that action.

But the COURT held, that the rule to discontinue did not oblige the plaintiff to pay any other than the costs which the defendant was entitled to receive, in other words, that it did not interfere with the plaintiff's right to receive costs which had already been adjudged to him. 2nd, That a writ of error might be brought to try the validity of a judgment on demurrer, though action had, as in this case, been discontinued. 3rd, That the proper course, under these circumstances, was to tax the plaintiff's costs, and to tax the defendant's, and not to set them off; but to leave each to his remedy to gain them. The defendant, by writ of error, to dispute those on demurrer by disputing the judgment.

PARKE, B. said there should be an entry of the discontinuance on the record; and then a judgment, that plaintiff take nothing by his writ; and he referred to Tidd's Practice, p. 230, for the form.

Rule discharged without costs, the point being new, although it was on appeal from the Master's decision.

Re SMITH.

Costs.

The Master, in taxation of costs in a suit for less than 20l. may, as between attorney and client, allow for counsel's fees, when the client was, previously to the retainer, informed that he would, in any event of the suit, be obliged to pay the fees.

Pashley shewed cause against a rule obtained by Martin, Q. C. calling on the Master to review his taxation of the applicant's bill of costs, in the case of Taylor v. Walton. Mr. Smith had been engaged as attorney for the defendant in an action of Taylor v. Walton, which was tried before a country sheriff. Mr. Smith had, at the special request of the defendant, retained counsel for him. He had, at the same time, informed the defendant that these costs could not be recovered from the plaintiff, even though defendant should obtain a verdict; and that counsel of eminence would not attend for less than a fee of 3l. 3s. On taxation, the Master refused to allow any fee for counsel, no item of that sort being set down in the list of charges to be allowed on taxation of costs in cases of action before the sheriff.

Pashley urged that the Master had done rightly; that he was bound to allow no item for which there was not an example in the list of charges, and contended that if an agreement could give the Master that power, not only might he be called upon to allow them in cases of fees of three guineas, but of three hundred; and he would in fact become the trier of such agreements. He cited Re Woollet (1 Dowl. & Lowndes, 593); Levy v. Magnay (10 M. & W. 664).

But the COURT held, that the directions to the taxing officers, which the Master had relied upon as imperative, were not; and that their object was to prevent extravagant charges, but did not circumscribe what might be charged for. Rule absolute.

STALWART v. INGS.

Award.

Application to set aside an award, on the ground that the arbitrators had not both signed at the same time.

Alexander, Q. C. shewed cause against a rule obtained by Whateley, Q. C. to set aside the award in this case, on the ground that the award had not been signed by the arbitrators at the same time.

Whately contended that the award had been made in conformity with the intentions of the arbitrators. He cited Little v. Newton (2 M. & Gr. 35); Battye v. Gresley (8 East, 318); applying them to his view of the case, that signatures need not be cotemporaneous.

The COURT stopped Whately, and gave it as their opinion that the making of the award, being a judicial act, the arbitrators must do it at the same time, otherwise a change of opinion might intervene. They, however, refused to set aside the award; since their decision would in that case be final; whereas, if an action was brought to enforce the award, the question might be carried up to a court of error.

The COURT discharged the rule; the parties to try the right by action, and the Court to grant no attachment to enforce the award. Rule discharged.

DAVIS v. ANKLE.

Attorney—Application to recover from an attorney the costs charged for entering up judgment where none had been entered up.

Jervis, Q.C. moved for a rule calling on the plaintiff's attorney in this case to shew cause why he should not refund the sum of 5l. to the defendant, and pay the costs of this application. It had been agreed between the plaintiff and defendant, by their respective attorneys, that the action in this case should be stayed on payment of 8l. Defendant wishing for further time, applied to plaintiff's attorney for that purpose, when he was informed by him, that, not to trifle with him, he must pay the further costs of entering up judgment "now due" in the action and proceeding to execution. The defendant understanding by this that judgment had been entered up and execution issued, paid, in addition to the 8l. the sum of 5l. the subject of this motion. On examination it was found that no judgment had been entered up. Rule nisi.

GUTHRIE and ANOTHER v. BEAUMONT.

Award—Application to set aside an award, on the ground that the arbitrator had received evidence not communicated to the defendant.

Whately, Q. C. applied to set aside the award in this case. The cause had been referred to two lay arbitrators, and had been decided by them in favour of the defendant. From the bill of costs sent in by the defendant's attorney, it was discovered that he had charged for business in the procurement and submission of evidence to the arbitrators which had never been made known to the plaintiff. Rule nisi.

Monday, Nov. 25.

WHICHER v. THOMAS.

Taxation of bill after verdict—Special circumstances under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

Crowder, Q. C. shewed cause against a rule obtained by Jervis to refer the bill of the plaintiff Whicher to the Master for taxation. It appeared that in an action brought to recover the amount, the defendant had allowed judgment to go by default, and the amount found to be due had been levied under a fi. fa. on November, 3, 1843. The rule had been obtained on Nov. 4, 1844. Crowder now opposed it on three grounds:—

1. That the application was more than a year after execution.

2. That the bill contained no taxable item, and, therefore, the application should have been to the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls. The business done was superintending the taxation of a Mr. Sherwood's bill for certain prosecutions.

3. That there were no special circumstances, for that all the matters had been known to Thomas before the action brought.

POLLOCK, C. B.—Does the 41st section apply to all prior sections?

Crowder.—Yes.

Jervis, Q. C. in support of the rule, contended that it must be made absolute, on the ground that the facts shewed fraud, and that Whicher had made no affidavit; but he admitted that the facts were known to Thomas before the action brought, but said that judgment had been allowed to go by default, through a belief that the defendant was protected by a certain undertaking of Mr. Whicher.

POLLOCK, C. B.—You had a good defence then, and why should you now come here?

Jervis.—There need not be new circumstances, but only special circumstances. It appeared clearly that 5l. had been overpaid, and that Whicher, after being retained upon the terms of his undertaking, procured the employment of a Mr. Bojon, by Mr. Thomas, under false representations, and that Thomas had been obliged already to pay him; so that now Whicher was compelling payment a second time.

PARKE, B.—Can you be relieved from a verdict?

POLLOCK, C. B.—You should at least have come quickly. Your motion should have been calling upon the plaintiff to refund the excess.

PARKE, B.—The old rule was not to disturb a verdict for taxation (a).

Jervis.—There are special circumstances, and the application is within twelve months; the fi. fa. was executed on the 3rd, but the money not paid until Nov. 4.

Cases cited: Doe v. Roe (4. Dowl. P. C. 95); 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

POLLOCK, C. B.—The rule must be discharged. It is consistent with the facts that there was no fraud as suggested. Thomas may have retained the second attorney, and was therefore bound to pay him; and one mode of accounting for the delay is, that Thomas did acquiesce in what was done. No sufficient explanation is given why the verdict should be set aside. It is in the discretion of the Court to grant these applications, and we think that where there are no new circumstances or fresh matter coming to the knowledge of the party, we cannot listen to an application on the ground that he was improperly sued, and that the verdict was wrong, where he has lain by for a twelvemonth. But as Mr. Whicher does not deny the facts alleged, and cannot set up his own strict propriety of conduct in this matter, we shall not give him the costs. Discharged without costs.

(a) See, however, instances cited in Chitty's Archb. p. 77.

HAMILTON v. BENTINCK.

If a defendant apply for a commission to examine witnesses long after issue has been joined, the Court will only issue it upon terms, of his finding security.

Martin, Q. C. and Dasent, shewed cause against a rule obtained by Watson, Q. C. for a commission to examine witnesses in Demerara.

The action was brought upon a contract set out in the declaration, the substance of which was, that plaintiff should honour bills drawn by one G. in Demerara, for the cultivation of the estate of defendant. The defendant pleaded in June last, denying G.'s agency or authority to enter into the contract.

The issue was made up, and notice of trial given, in July, for the first sittings in London this Term. On the 17th September, defendant got leave to plead additional pleas, which do not affect the question of G.'s authority. Notice of trial on the amended issue was given on the 19th of October. The cause was made a special jury case, which threw it over to the sittings in London after this Term.

On the 15th of November this rule was obtained for a commission.

For the plaintiff, it was now contended that it was too late. The commission ought to have been applied for immediately after the first issue was joined. The evidence sought to be obtained only affects the pleas originally pleaded.

POLLOCK, C. B.—This is in effect an application to postpone the trial, in order that defendant may get fresh evidence; and as he did not choose to apply in proper time, the question is, upon what terms he shall be allowed to do so. We think, upon his finding security for 3,000l. half the amount claimed, the commission may issue upon those terms.

Rule absolute.

MORRIS v. ROBERTS, Executrix.

In an action brought against an executrix de son tort, upon a bond given by the testator, and where the plaintiff holds a policy on the testator's life as a collateral security, which has been paid, the Court will not compel the plaintiff to enter satisfaction upon the roll upon receiving the amount of the bond less by the whole amount of the policy, unless it appear that he has actually received the whole of it, although it appear that he has improperly permitted the administrator to deduct from the policy the expenses of administration, there being general assets enough for that purpose.

Williams shewed cause against a rule obtained by Gray, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why, upon payment of 53l. satisfaction should not be entered upon the roll. The action was upon a bond; the defendant was sued as executrix de son tort.

It appeared that the plaintiff had had deposited with him, as collateral security, a policy of insurance upon the life of defendant's testator, for a smaller sum than the amount of the bond. A person of the name of Rogers had taken out administration to the testator's effects, and an action had been brought by the attorney of Rogers, in the name of Rogers, but upon behalf of the plaintiff, to recover the amount of the policy. It had been recovered, and received by the plaintiff on account of his debt, with the exception of an amount which he had allowed Rogers to deduct for the expenses of obtaining administration. It appeared that there were other funds in Rogers' hands, and it was now contended that the administration should have been paid for out of them, and the whole amount of the policy should be deducted from the plaintiff's debt.

POLLOCK, C. B.—If, as we understood when the rule was obtained, it had appeared that either the plaintiff or his own attorney had received the money, and had afterwards paid it wrongfully to Rogers, the Court might have interfered; but at present it is not clear that either he or his attorney did actually receive all the money. All that we can be sure of is, that either the plaintiff or his attorney has made a bad bargain with Rogers. Are we now upon a motion of this sort to enter into disputed facts? It may be that there are assets, and that this expense ought to have been defrayed out of the general estate. But can we now, for the purpose of such an application as this, enter into the question whether the plaintiff ought to have received this money or not? Giving the defendant the fullest benefit of his statement, we cannot make the rule absolute. Very likely the plaintiff ought not to have made the bargain, but that does not put him for all purposes in the same position as if he had received the money. This rule must be discharged. Rule discharged.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. CLAY and ANOTHER.

The Solicitor-General appeared to shew cause against a rule, obtained by Chambers on behalf of one of the defendants, calling upon the Crown to furnish him with particulars of the charges against him. The Solicitor-General stated, that though the Crown was willing to consent in this case to the principal matters sought by the rule, he did not admit the right of the defendants to have the rule made absolute.

To prevent the case being made a precedent, the rule was discharged, subject to an understanding that the Crown would furnish what was asked for.

Rule discharged.

Crown Case.

Friday, Nov. 22.

(Before the fifteen JUDGES.)

REG. v. O'BRIAN and OTHERS.

Indictment.

Mode of charging accessories in murder where the death does not on the same day follow the blow.

The prisoner had been indicted and tried before Cresswell, J. at the last assizes for York, who had reserved the case for the opinion of the judges as to whether any judgment could be pronounced, and, if so, against which of the prisoners.

The facts of the case were, that the prisoners (Irishmen) had set upon one Benjamin Goff, one of a band of musicians who were playing tunes politically offensive to them, and in the riot Goff was killed. Medical evidence attributed his death to one or the other of two blows: one given with a stick by one of the prisoners, the other by a stone that had been flung by another of the prisoners. The riot took place on the 27th of May. Goff died on the 29th of the same month.

There were four counts in the indictment:—

The 1st charged the prisoners as principals in the first degree with the murder of Benjamin Goff, by kicking and beating.

The 2nd charged O'Brian as principal, and the rest as accessories; and laid the death as having happened by blow of a stick.

The 3rd charged another of the prisoners as principal and the rest as accessories, and laid the death as having happened by a blow from a stone.

The 4th varied from the rest in laying the death as having happened by kicking and beating with sticks and stones.

The first count was abandoned at the trial, and the jury found a general verdict of guilty of manslaughter on the three others.

Two principal questions arose on the indictment—1st. Could a general verdict be sustained on the indictment, when the counts laid the death so variously? 2nd. Was the mode of charging the accessories sufficient? The indictment mentioned the day on which the blow had been struck—viz. the 27th May, and that Goff had languished till the 29th, when he died; then it charged the accessories as having, on the day and year first aforesaid, been present aiding and abetting (the principal) the said felony and murder to do and commit.

Heaton appeared for some of the prisoners, and Wilkins for others.

Bliss was for the prosecution.

The Court did not deliver any opinion.

Ex parte THE DEAN AND CHAPTER OF CANTERBURY.

Prohibition to restrain Tithe Commissioners from proceeding.

Bowler Q.C. (with whom were Deeds and Peacock) moved for a prohibition, forbidding the Tithe Commissioners for England and Wales to enforce an apportionment of tithes in the parish of Appledore, in the county of Kent, the objection being that the award had directed a larger rate-charge than the modus to which a portion of the land was subject, contrary to the 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 71, s. 33. It was stated that all parties were willing to abide the decision of the Court. Rule nisi.

An order in this behalf had been made pursuant to the 27th section of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 76, with which the Guardians of the Union refused to comply.

(Before Mr. Justice WIGHTMAN.)

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF GLOUCESTERSHIRE, Ex parte RICHARD FARLEY.

Mandamus to compel justices to hear an application under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 74.

Newton moved for a rule nisi for a mandamus commanding two justices acting for the division of Botloe, Gloucestershire, to hear and decide upon an application under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 74. (The Small Tenement's Recovery Act.)

It appeared that the tenancy of a tenant having duly expired, and he having neglected to give up the tenement, notice was served of the intended application to the justices to obtain possession. On the day named, application was accordingly made to two justices, and whilst the landlord's agent was stating the particulars of the case, an attorney's clerk came into the room, and informed the magistrates that his employer's client had a mortgage upon the property, which was a good reason for their not entertaining the application. Upon this the justices declined to proceed, and refused to take any evidence whatever, saying, that it was optionable for them to proceed or not, and that the landlord might bring his action of ejectment.

PATTESON, J.—The question is, whether it is imperative on them to proceed.

Newton.—The words are "it shall and may be lawful," &c. which means that they shall proceed.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE, IN THE MATTER OF THE APPEAL BETWEEN STANLEY-CUM-WRENTHORPE, Appellants, and ALVERTHORPE-CUM-THORNS, Respondents.

Where a parish on whom an order of removal is made, do not give notice of appeal within the twenty-one days, and the pauper is not removed, they may, nevertheless, appeal, the grievance under the 79th sec. of the 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 76, being the order: against which they have a right at any time to appeal whilst it is in existence.

R. Hall and Overend, shewed cause against the rule herein (see 4 LAW T. 100), and contended that inasmuch as the appellants had not, during the currency of the twenty-one days, given any notice of appeal, and as the pauper had not been actually removed, the respondents were not entitled to appeal.

In support of the argument the following cases were cited:—Rex v. Norton (2 Str. 831); Rex v. The Justices of Herefordshire (3 T. R. 504); Rex v. The Justices of Salop (6 Dowl. 28); Rex v. Hanson (4 B. & Ald. 519); Rex v. The Justices of Surrey 2 T. R. 504); Rex v. Schole (6 East, 514); Reg. v. Stock (8 Ad. & Ell. 405); Rex v. The Justices of Suffolk (4 Ad. & Ell. 319); Rex v. The Justices of Lincolnshire (3 B. & C. 548); Rex v. The Justices of Leicestershire (4 Dowl. 634); Rex v. The Justices of Cornwall (6 Dowl. 28); Rex v. The Justices of Herefordshire (6 Dowl. 638); Rex v. The Justices of Middlesex (9 Dowl. 163); Rex v. The Justices of Cheshire (1 Dowl. 570); Reg. v. The Justices of Lancashire (12 L. J. M. C. 110).

Pashley and Pickering, contrà, argued that the only effect of not giving notice of appeal within the twenty-one days is, that the pauper might still be removed; that the grievance against which, by the Poor Law Amendment, the appellants are entitled to appeal is, the order of removal, and whilst that remains in force the appellants have at any time a right to appeal. (Rex v. The Justices of Leicestershire, 4 Dowl. 633; Reg v. The Justices of Middlesex, 9 Dowl. 634; Rex v. The Justices of Suffolk, 4 Ad. & Ell. 319.)

WIGHTMAN, J. was of opinion that the appellants were justified in appealing as they did, as the grievance consisted in the order of removal, which was still subsisting, and which the appellants had a right to ask the Sessions to quash.

Rule absolute for a mandamus.

Monday, Nov. 25.

(Before Mr. Justice PATTESON.)

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE.

Quære, whether a philosophical society is rateable to the relief of the poor?

Pashley moved for a mandamus commanding the above justices to issue their warrant of distress to compel payment of a poor-rate from the Huddersfield Philosophical Society. This society had been assessed, and, on being summoned to shew cause why a distress warrant should not issue, they appeared and contended that they were exempt from assessment by the provisions of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 36. s. 1, and the justices being of this opinion, refused to issue their warrant. It was now insisted that this society is not within the provisions of the Act. Rule nisi.

AUSTIN v. DAVEY.

A party must come to the Court to set aside irregular proceedings within a reasonable time; where, therefore, execution was levied on an irregular judgment in vacation, and the motion to set it aside was not made until the 15th day of the next term:—Held, too late.

Barcham shewed cause against this rule, which called upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the judgment and all the subsequent proceedings should not be set aside for irregularity. In this case the declaration was filed, and notice given on the 2nd of August to plead in eight days, and on the 10th judgment was signed for want of a plea. Subsequently execution issued, and the amount of debt and costs levied. A summons was then taken out to set aside the proceedings before Mr. Baron Gurney, who declined to interfere. It was now contended, in answer to the rule, that, notwithstanding, according to the case of Morris v. Hancock (1 Dowl. N. S. 320), the judgment was signed too soon, the defendant having all the 10th of August on which to plead—the defendant had come to the Court too late to seek relief; that a party should come within a reasonable time, which is generally understood to be within eight days; that here the execution was levied on the 21st August, and the application to the Court not made until the 16th of November, being the 15th day of term.

C. Edwards.—There is no express rule limiting the time of application in such a case—it is dependent chiefly upon whether or not any fresh step has been taken; here, no inconvenience has been sustained by the delay, as no further step could have been taken by the plaintiff. (Brooks v. Hodgson, 8 Scott, N. R.)

PATTESON, J. thought the application too late, and that the defendant should have come to the Court within the first eight days of the term.

Rule discharged with costs.

STANDERWICK v. WATKINS.

Where, in moving for a new trial, affidavits are used imputing personal misconduct to the jury, affidavits of the jury may be used in answer.

W. J. Smith shewed cause against the rule obtained herein by Prideaux (see 4 LAW T. 101), and was about to read affidavits from three of the jury in answer to certain imputations of misconduct contained in the affidavits on which the rule was obtained, when Prideaux objected, that as no new affidavit was used on moving the rule, no fresh ones could be read on the other side; and that under any circumstances, an affidavit from a juryman could not be received. (Atkins v. Meredith, 4 Dowl. 658; Straker v. Graham, 7 Dowl. 223.) He did not object to the affidavits made in answer to the summons being read.

(It appeared that after this cause had been tried before the Undersheriff, an application had been made to a judge in vacation; and on that occasion affidavits impugning the conduct of the jury were made use of by the defendant, and counter affidavits of some of the jury by the plaintiff. This rule was obtained on reading the affidavits made on the part of the defendant on the summons.)

PATTESON, J. thought that in all cases where personal misconduct is charged against a jury they are entitled to rebut it; and the defendant's old affidavits being brought before the Court, it was the same thing as though they were entirely new.

The case was argued on its merits.

Rule absolute for a new trial, the costs of the first to abide the event.

DOE dem. ROBERTS v. ROE.

Removing for judgment against the casual ejector, the rule will be absolute, notwithstanding the declaration is headed as of a term not yet arrived, and there is no date to the notice to appear.

T. W. Saunders moved (in three cases) for judgment against the casual ejector. The declaration, which was served in October last, was entitled "Trinity Term, in the eighth year of Queen Victoria," last Trinity Term being in the seventh year of the Queen's reign. The notice contained no date, but directed the defendant to appear "next Michaelmas Term." He submitted whether this should be a rule absolute or nisi only.

PATTESON, J.—You may have a rule absolute.

(See Doe dem. Woodruffe v. Roe, 5 Scott, N. R. 800). Rules absolute.

DENNETT v. HARDY.

Quære as to the proper course to be pursued, in order to obtain a writ of trial—Whether the writ should be applied for before or after the delivery of the issue, and as to the inserting of the test and return of the writ in the issue delivered.

Boriff shewed cause against a rule obtained by Horn, calling upon the plaintiff to shew cause why the issue and notice of trial indorsed thereon, delivered herein, should not be set aside for irregularity. The objections were twofold; 1st, That the issue contained no teste of the writ of trial, and had no date for its return; 2nd, That notwithstanding there were two issues joined, the writ of trial appeared to be awarded to try only one issue, the word "issue" being inserted instead of "issues." It was now contended, in opposition to the rule, that inasmuch as, by the practice, the issue is always made up and delivered before the writ of trial is applied for, it is impossible to insert these dates; and that the Masters, on taxation, will not allow the costs of the writ if applied for before the issue is delivered. That as to the mistake of the singular for the plural in the word "issue," it was a mere oversight, which the Court would allow to be amended.

Horn argued that the practice of delivering the issue before the writ of trial is obtained is erroneous; that the R. G. H. T. 4 Wm. 4, r. 2, sch. 5, points out the form which should be followed.

PATTESON, J.—The form certainly appears to be inconsistent, and I have constantly at chambers, when parties have applied to me for a writ of trial, and it has appeared that the issue has not been delivered, rejected the application.

Horne.—The issues might be joined without delivering the issue as made up. The plaintiff should abstain from delivering it until he has obtained his writ. (Ward v. Pell, 1 M. & W.)

PATTESON, J.—There is certainly a defect in this issue, in stating the word issue in the singular instead of the plural, and that must be amended. I have always thought the proper time for applying for the writ of trial was after the delivery of the issue; and of course, in such a case, the dates could not be inserted. I think, however, that there is some doubt as to the proper course to be pursued. The plaintiff had better amend the issue in this particular also.

Rule absolute, to amend on payment of costs.

Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts.

COURT OF REVIEW.

Wednesday, Nov. 20.

Ex parte SIMPSON, Re HUNT.

Practice—Costs—Separate appearance of official assignee.

Upon a dispute arising between parties representing respectively the joint estate of a bankrupt firm and the separate estate of one of the partners, as to a fund in the hands of the official assignee, the official assignee was held entitled to his costs of appearing by separate counsel.

In this case, which, upon one point was reported in our last number, the principal discussion was as to the respective rights of the joint creditors of the bankrupt firm and the separate creditors of some of the partners to a portion of the estate. The official assignee was in possession of the estate of the bankrupts, and on this petition, which was discussed by the creditors' assignees, on the one side, and inspectors appointed over the separate estate of one of the partners, on the other, the official assignee appeared by separate counsel. The Court having decided that the two parties were proportionably entitled to the fund in dispute, and that each should bear their own costs,—

W. W. Cooper, on behalf of the official assignee, applied for his costs, which

The CHIEF JUDGE directed to be paid to him, one-half out of the joint estate, and the other half out of the separate estate.

Ex parte APPLETON, Re APPLETON.

Bankrupt's certificate—Loss of proceedings.

Where the proceedings under a bankruptcy, which occurred in 1819, had been lost, the Court, upon the application of the bankrupt, directed that, notwithstanding the loss of the proceedings, the Commissioner should be at liberty to appoint a public sitting, &c. according to sec. 39 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122.

This was a petition of the bankrupt praying that the Commissioner might appoint a public sitting for the allowance of his certificate, and that notice of the same might be duly advertised in the London Gazette. The bankruptcy in this case occurred in 1819, and the proceedings under it were duly carried on up to the final examination of the bankrupt, which he passed. The certificate was signed by a large number of the creditors, but a relative of the bankrupt, who was a creditor to a large amount, having refused to sign it, the requisite number of signatures was not obtained. In May last the bankrupt applied to Mr. Commissioner Evans to appoint a public sitting for the allowance of his certificate, under the 39th section of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122. As none of the proceedings in the bankruptcy had been returned to his court, the Commissioner declined to call the meeting. It appeared that all the proceedings had been lost, and satisfactory affidavits of their loss having been obtained, the present application was made to the Court.

J. D. Chambers, for the petition, cited Ex parte Baldwin, re Baldwin (7 Jurist, 636).

Toller, for the surviving assignee, offered no opposition to the petition.

The CHIEF JUDGE said that he thought that such an order as he was reported to have made in the case cited should be made now, viz. that, notwithstanding the loss of the proceedings, the Commissioner should be at liberty to proceed, &c.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Thursday, Nov. 21.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE and Mr. Commissioner GOULBURN.)

Re BRACKWELL.

Persons petitioning the Court for protection from process under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 6, are not to be entitled to their immediate discharge; but time will be allowed for the detaining creditor to appear and oppose the petition.

Sturgeon moved for the interim protection and discharge from custody of the insolvent in this case, he having complied with the requisitions of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 110, s. 1, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 6. He knew he was labouring under some disadvantage and difficulty in this case, as it appeared that certain rules were about to be prepared, upon the ground of "expediency," regulating the interpretation of the new statutes relating to bankrupts and insolvents.

Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.—You are assuming this position.

Mr. Commissioner GOULBURN.—No such rules have yet been made.

Sturgeon was glad of it, as he hoped, with all deference to the Court, to shew that the present practice was authorized by the statutes, and however expedient the intended rules might be for the protection of trade and commerce, that expediency should not be suffered to over-ride the positive terms of deliberate Acts of Parliament, passed for the relief of insolvent and unfortunate debtors. Lord Mansfield, in a case reported in the Term Reports, p. 313, held, with respect to the "expediency" of a law being carried into execution, that as long as it was the law, so long was he compelled to give it effect; and Lord Tenterden has since, in a case which would be found in Barnewell and Cresswell's Reports, declared a similar opinion. Moreover, in all cases where a statute was made in favour of the subject, the most liberal construction should be given to it.

Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.—Where do you say we are obliged to grant the discharge of a debtor in custody?

Sturgeon begged to submit, that upon a debtor filing his petition, pursuant to the 6th sec. of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, he was entitled to his release from custody, and that was the practice pursued in every other court in the building. If the Act passed in the 5 & 6 Vict. did not exist, he might almost defy the Court to discharge a prisoner under the last Act at all; the two Acts must be taken in conjunction, and he need not remind the Court that its protection was at once extended to insolvents who were not in cutody, and petitioned in the usual way.

After a lengthened argument the motion was refused.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

We are again compelled to curtail all matters not of immediate moment, to admit the reports, which will be found peculiarly interesting and instructive. The Morning Chronicle has angrily denounced what it has been pleased to term "a job," in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and if the facts be as stated the affair certainly assumes that complexion. As it is really a professional question, we quote the comments of our contemporary, which, however, must be received with an allowance :—

It would seem that even the signal failure of the great job of last session (we mean the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill) has not deterred the author of that measure, the Right Honourable John Nicholl, M.P. from again mixing himself up with a new job in Doctor's Commons. Great complaints have been made that the principal offices in these courts are held by members of the same family; and, though it is universally admitted that Sir H. Jenner Fust, a relative of the Right Honourable John Nicholl, is an excellent judge, the public do not consider it to be altogether seemly, that among the advocates, and proctors, and registrars, should be found the near relatives of a judge, however eminent he may be. At any rate promises were made during the debates on the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill that this system of treating a court of justice as if it were a family estate should be put an end to.

The appetite, however, of the Nicholl and Jenner families does not yet appear to be satiated. The death of Mr. Iltid Nicholl has created a vacancy in the office of Queen's Proctor. The interests of the public require that this office should be filled by a proctor of the greatest experience and ability. It is, however, stated now, that the Right Hon. John Nicholl has recommended to the government a list of proctors, all of whom are members of the family out of whom the fortunate one is to be chosen, but not one of whom, we venture to say, however respectable in private life, would have occurred to him, if experience in the profession were the only test. The following are the names.

Mr. Nicholl, cousin to the Right Honourable John Nicholl.

Mr. Dyke, son-in-law to Sir H. Jenner Fust.

Mr. Fox, ditto ditto.

Mr. Jenner, son to ditto.

Mr. Dyneley, cousin to ditto.

We hope it is not too late to prevent the perpetration of this rank job. There is no want of experienced and able proctors, either Tory or Whig, from whom the Premier can make a selection. We trust that Sir R. Peel will disregard the advice of the Nicholl and Jenner families, and ask any experienced professional man what proctor he would employ to conduct a suit in Doctors' Commons, and let the appointment be given to the proctor of the greatest experience, though he may not happen to be one of the family.

The following letter is interesting, and deserves to be placed among the archives of the Lawyer :—

MALPRACTICES OF THE BAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

Sir,—The public and the Profession are indebted to you for your fearless exposure of some recent cases of malpractice at the Bar. You suggested, upon one occasion, that the inns of court should "disbar" any person who might be proved to have been guilty of misconduct. At the time you made this suggestion I heard a doubt expressed as to whether the inns of court had this power. Upon this point permit me to trouble you with a few observations.

In the first place let me refer you to Booreman's case, which is thus shortly reported in March, who has given to the profession the cases taken from the 15th to the 18th years of the reign of Charles I.

"Booreman was a barrister of one of the Temples, and was expelled the house, and his chamber seized, for non-payment of his commons; whereupon he, by Newdigate, his counsel, prayed his writ of restitution, and brought the writ in court ready framed, which was directed to the benchers of the said society; but it was denied by the Court, because there is none in the inns of court to whom the writ can be directed, because it is no body corporate, but only a voluntary society, and submissive to Government; and they were angry with him for it, that he had waived the ancient and usual way of redress for any grievance in the inns of court, which was by appealing to the judges, and would have him do so now."

That a wholesome supervision was exercised by the benchers over the members of the different inns of court appears from the earliest legal antiquaries. Dugdale, in his Origines Judiciales (141), calls them "nurseries or seminaries;" and further states (324), that exercises were regularly performed. Now all this implies control and supervision; but to put the matter beyond doubt, we have but to quote the Mirror of Justices, written in French long before the Conquest, in which, in the chapter entitled Abuses of the Common Law, are the following words :—

"It is abuse to suspend a pleader if he be not attaint of a trespass, for which he is condemnable to corporal punishment."

So that thus early the power of suspension appears to have been exercised. This view is also borne out be Fortescue, Chief Justice, in the time of Henry 6, in his work "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," wherein he says, p. 114, that the members of the inns of court have a special regard to the preservation of their honour and fame. These institutions are, says he, "an university or school of all commendable qualities." And in another passage he broadly states :—

"Offenders are punished with none other pain but onely to be amoved from the company of their fellowship. Which punishment they do more fear than other criminal offenders do fear imprisonments and irons. For he that is once expelled from any of those fellowships in the innes of court, is never received be a fellow in any of the other fellowships."

This view is also borne out by another passage to the Mirror, in which it is said—

"A pleader is suspendable when he shall do wrong or falsity, or move or offer false corruptions, deceits, leasings, or falsities, or if he is attainted to have received fees of two adversaries, and if he say or do anything in despite or contempt of the court."

Lord Coke, in his Commentary (2d Inst.) on the 29th chapter of the Statute of Westminster says :—

"Before this statute, in the irregular reign of Henry 3, serjeants, apprentices, attorneys' clerks of of the King's courts, and others, did practise and put in use unlawful shifts and devices, so cunningly contrived (and especially in the cases of great men), in deceit of the king's courts, as oftentimes the judges of the same were, by such crafty and sinister shifts and practices, inveigled and beguiled, which was against the common law, and therefore this Act was made in affirmance of the common law."

The reader will not fail to observe, on reference to the statute itself, that after the word "serjeant" there is a comma, and then comes the word "counter," though both words are joined together without any comma by Lord Coke in his Commentary. But in order to shew that there can be no mistake as to the word "counters," Dugdale and the Mirror may be cited to prove that counters were pleaders, and that apprentices, counters, pleaders, and utter or outer barristers, were all indifferently used as signifying one and the same thing.

"The ancientest mention of an apprentice in this sense," says John Selden, "which our published books have, is in 1 Edw. 3, fol. 17. The name was used for practisers, and apprenticii ad barros are barristers in the ridiculous verses used by Andrew Horne before his Mirrour aux Justices."

In another passage Selden says—"

"Indeed, the study of the common law hath not place in our Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, because another university (the innes of court) is appointed."

Thus implying a governing body, and regular discipline, supervision, and control over the members. All doubt, if any could exist on the subject, is dispelled by the observation of Lord Coke, that serjeant is a general word, and therefore counter is added to it. And counter he defines as narrator of the count or declaration, which duty, it may be added, is always performed by an outer or utter barrister not of the dignity of the coif, or of one of her Majesty's counsel. The words of the statute, "ou autre," however, greatly extend its operation, and Coke, in commenting on these words, says:—

"This extendeth to apprentices, attorneys, clerks of courts, or any other. And if an attorney ought not wittingly to plead a false plea, a fortiori a serjeant, or an apprentice, ought not to doe the same. And this artificial deceit is of all other the worst, for hereby the matter is so tricked, shadowed, and heightened by colour of painted art, as thereby the judges themselves are abused and beguiled, and the punishment extends as well to the apprentice as to the serjeant."

That this was the enlarged reading given to the statute 103 years ago, appears from the case of one Mitchell, an utter or outer barrister and justice of the peace, who was considered by Lord Hardwicke to be a serjeant counter, who had been guilty of malpractices by the Statute of Westminster, and who in consequence was not allowed to be heard any more in the profession. The report is thus given in 2 Atkins, 173:—

"Mr. Justice Mitchell [he was a justice of the peace as well as barrister] this day, by petition, prayed to be discharged out of the custody of the Fleet, as a close prisoner within the walls thereof. He was committed for being a principal contriver in marrying Miss Hughes, a ward of this Court, a fortune of 30,000*l.* to a schoolmaster at Islington, one Science, by trade a watchmaker.

"As to Mr. Mitchell's submission to be restrained as acting as a barrister, I shall at present, said Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, give no other directions but that, according to his own submission, he shall be restrained from acting as such till further orders. Because, from any inquiries that I have hitherto made, I am not satisfied what is the proper course to remove him from practising as a barrister.

"If Mr. Mitchell had continued a solicitor there had been no difficulty, for the ready and proper way would have been to have struck him out of the roll of solicitors; and surely it would be very hard when he has advanced himself to a degree of greater rank and honour in the law, that there should not be some precedents for degrading a person who, by his malpractices and misbehaviour, has rendered himself highly unworthy of the character he has taken upon him of barrister-at-law.

"But whether this ought to be done by disbarring him, or whether the Court, by its own power and authority will silence him for the future, I shall not at present determine, but have already mentioned it to Lord Chief Justice Lee, who will assist me in finding out precedents in such cases.

"The Statute of Westminster, 1, c. 29, says that attorneys and serjeant counters who have been guilty of any malpractices, and have acted unbecoming their Profession, may be silenced, and not be allowed to be heard any more in the way of the Profession.

"My Lord Coke, in his second Institute and Exposition upon Westminster, 1, c. 29, p. 214, is clearly of opinion that apprentices at law, which is another name for barristers, are included under the head of serjeant counters."

Mitchell was afterwards, as appears from a judgment of Lord Hardwicke in Ambler's Reports, struck out of the commission as justice of the peace, and prohibited from practising at the bar.

HABEAS CORPUS IN JERSEY.

The following is the judgment of the Royal Court of Jersey on the subject of the writ of habeas corpus lately issued in the case of Mr. C. C. Wilson. The question, as will be seen on a perusal of the judgment, is, whether an Act of Parliament can rescind an ancient charter; the Act of Parliament is, of course, against the assumptions of the Court, the old charters of Jersey are in their favour:—

"At the Royal Court of Jersey, in the year 1844, on the 13th day of November. The Queen's Attorney-General having read to the Superior Court a report of the Deputé Viscomte, shewing that on Monday last he received from Mr. J. Kandich, the gaoler, a report informing him that on the said day he was served with a writ named habeas corpus, running as follows:—

"'Habeas Corpus cum causa.

"'Victoria, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, defender of the Faith. To John Kandich, Keeper of our Prison of Jersey, in the Island of Jersey. Greeting,—We command you that you have the body of Charles Carus Wilson, detained in our prison, under your custody, as it is said, together with the day and cause of his being taken and detained, by whatsoever name he may be called or known, in our Court before us at Westminster immediately after the receipt of this writ, to do and receive all and singular such matters and things which our said Court shall then and there consider of him in this behalf, and have there and then this writ. Witness, Thomas Lord Denman, at Westminster, the 6th day of November, in the 8th year of our reign.

"'By the Court, "'ROBINSON.'" and endorsed thus:—

"'By Rule of Court.

"'The amount of the expenses to be tendered to the gaoler for the bringing over of the within-named prisoner to be 5l., by the direction of Mr. Justice Patteson.

"'WILLIAM STEPHENS, 30, Bedford-row,
"'Nov. 6, 1844.' "'London.'

which had been served on him by Col. Davidson, who had, at the same time, given in his hands a paper commencing with—

"'Wednesday, the 6th day of November, in the 8th year of the reign of Queen Victoria,' and terminating

"By the Court,"

as well as a Bank of England note, bearing the number 84,030, and the value of 5l. sterling, all which documents the gaoler gave him at the same time; the whole, as contained more at length in said report, lodged au greffe.

"Seeing: That the constitutions issued by King John after the separation of the Duchy of Normandy (of which the Channel Islands are the only remaining parcel) from the Crown of England, declare in positive terms that the 12 jurats (coronatores juratos), in the absence of the itinerant justices, and concurrently with said justices, when in the country, must judge all causes in this island, of what nature soever they may be: that this exclusive and independent jurisdiction has been recognized and confirmed (with our other privileges) by the greater number of our Kings, and more particularly by Edward I. Henry III. Edward II. Edward III. Richard II. Henry IV. Henry V. Henry VI. Edward IV. Henry VII. Henry VIII. Edward VI. Mary, Elizabeth, James I. Charles I. Charles II. and James II.—

"That the King Charles II. to whom, in the days of his adversity, the island was happy to give shelter, saith the charter, bearing date from Westminster, the 10th October, in the 14th year of his reign—

"'We give and grant unto the said Bailli and Jurats, and to all and every other magistrates, ministers, and other persons whatsoever, constituted into any charge and office in said isle, authority, full, entire, and absolute, with power and faculty to take cognizance and of themselves to give justice in all sorts of pleas, suits, differences, actions, quarrels, and causes whatever, mooted in said isle and aforementioned places, whether personal, real and mixed, or criminal and capital, there and not elsewhere to plead, perfect, pursue, and defend all and every such, and to proceed with or abandon them, to examine, hear, terminate, absolve, condemn, decide them, and cause them to be executed according to the laws and customs of the aforesaid isle and maritime places as heretofore practised and approved, without evocation or appellation whatever, except in cases reserved for our Royal cognizance, according to the ancient custom of the island and places above named, or which, of our right and Royal prerogative, must be reserved unto us. Which authority except in the reserved case, we give for us and our aforesaid heirs and successors, commit, concede, and confirm, by these presents, unto the said Bailli and Jurats, and others so amply, freely, and entirely as the Bailli, Jurats, and others aforesaid, or any of them have ever heretofore formally and legitimately exercised, performed, or possessed, or must have exercised, performed, or possessed, or should or could legally, or could and did. We further will, and by these presents, for us, our heirs and successors, concede unto the said Bailli and Jurats and other manens and inhabitants of the said isle and maritime places aforementioned, that none of them in future, by any brief or process issuing from our courts in our kingdom of England, or any of them, be summoned, apprehended, called in judgment, drawn, or in any other manner compelled to appear or answer out of the isle and places aforementioned, before any of our judges, justices, magistrates, or officers, or others for or because of any thing, difference, matter or cause whatsoever, emanating from said island, so that each and every of the said insulars may have faculty and power to reside, dwell, and live in peace, legally and with impunity in the said isle, and await justice therein, all such writs, warrants of apprehension, briefs, and processes, notwithstanding; and that without penalty, corporeal or pecuniary, fine, ransom, or mulct, which for this cause they might incur or forfeit. And similarly that no offence, cause of contempt, or contumacy may therefore unto them be inflicted, imposed, or otherwise, adjudged by us, our heirs, or successors.'

"Seeing: that the code of laws issued by the States of this country, and confirmed by an order in council of his late Majesty King George III., of the 28th of March, 1771, saith, that—

"'The laws and privileges of the island are confirmed as of old, and no acts, warrants, or letters, of what nature soever they be, shall be executed in the island until they have been presented to the Royal Court, in order that they be registered and published; and in the event that such orders, warrants, or letters be found contrary to the charters and privileges, and hurtful to the said island, the registration, execution, and publication thereof may be suspended until the case shall have been represented to his Majesty, and his gracious will thereon be signified. As to the acts of parliament wherein the island is mentioned and interested, they must be exemplified in form under the great seal of England, sent to said isle, and there registered and published in order that the inhabitants may have knowledge thereof to conform and avoid the penalties for transgressions.'

"Seeing further, that in the year 1832 two acts of parliament touching the writ of habeas corpus—namely, that of the 31st year of the reign of Charles II., and that of the 56th year of the reign of George III., were transmitted to the Royal Courts of Jersey and Guernsey, with orders from Council ordering the registration thereof;

"That the said Royal Courts, viewing the provisions of these acts as aiming at the privileges of these islands, suspended the registration thereof, and referred the subject to the States of said islands, by whom deputies were appointed to go to London, with instructions to present to the King's Government humble remonstrances against the registration of those acts;

"That the said deputies, having addressed energetic representations to Lord Melbourne, then Home Secretary, as well as to other members of the administration, succeeded in convincing these Ministers that force of law could not be given to these acts without producing results for these islands of a disastrous nature, and that, in consequence, the Government, acceding to the just claim of the deputies, did not press for their registration;

"That since that period no attempt has been made to extend the provisions of these acts as to these islands, wherein they have remained powerless;

"That the execution of the writ of habeas corpus, or of any orders, summonses, or sentences of her Majesty's courts in England, would be a serious infraction of the charters and privileges granted to the inhabitants by their grateful princes as rewards for their unbounded devotedness and of their ancient and unalterable loyalty;

"That it would deal a fatal blow to the jurisdiction and prerogatives of the Royal Court, the power of which has been recognized as supreme by those same charters, in all matters civil, mixed, and criminal, which originate therein, whatever be their nature (save some cases specially reserved for the cognizance of royalty), the Sovereign in his council alone having the right to confirm, modify, or annul their decisions;

"Seeing that there is every reason to believe the judge who granted the said order was deceived by a dissimulation and concealment of this country's privileges, and of the jurisdiction and attributes of this Royal Court;

"That if the said Wilson was displeased with the judgment of the 23rd of September last, he might have caused a re-examination and cancelling thereof by means of a remonstrance before the full Court, or, as a last resource, by doleance (complaint) to her Majesty in Council:—

"The Court unanimously, and conformably with the conclusions of the Queen's Attorney-General, empowers the Viscomte to order the gaoler not to obey the said writ of habeas corpus.

(From the Jersey Gazette of Nov. 25.)

We have the pleasure of announcing that an offer from the Royal Court to Mr. Wilson, made through Advocate Hammond, to liberate him on his own bail, has been this afternoon unhesitatingly spurned. By no trick or device can Mr. Wilson be induced to damage the cause of which he is the representative.

TO THE BRITISH RESIDENTS IN JERSEY.

Gentlemen and Friends—Let not the apparently unfavourable news which arrived from London by this day's mail occasion you any anxiety. It has had no effect upon my spirits, nor upon my hopes, nor upon my conviction, that at the end of, perhaps, a long vista, more or less varied, we shall safely arrive at last at the Temple of Victory and of Peace. Before the week is closed I hope to offer to you for your perusal the affidavit of the Procureur de la Reine, on which his application to the Bail Court was based. In the meantime let us not prejudge its contents or its effects. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Remember how our foes chuckled day after day because the habeas corpus did not arrive. Remember their looks when it had arrived. Did I prophesy falsely that it would come? Judge me, then, for the future by the past. I prophesy again. I shall be discharged from this vile custody sooner than you expect. And I add to this prophecy, that I shall be discharged by habeas corpus, and by habeas corpus only—or in a coffin.

Fancy not that I hold my life so cheap that I would commit suicide. Fancy not that I hold law to be so despicable that I would accept my liberty upon any terms but lawful terms; or that I would for a weeks of disgraceful freedom enter into a recognisance at the instance of the corrupt Royal Court in Jersey, or at the command of any court in London.

It shall only be by a coffin or by habeas corpus that I will be removed from this custody.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen and friends, your faithful servant,

CHARLES CARUS WILSON,
A prisoner by lawless violence.

Jersey Gaol, Nov. 24, 1844.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The following incident occurred on Thursday.

Reg. v. Henry Miller and others for conspiracy.

On the prisoners being put to the bar, Henry Miller applied that the trial might be postponed until counsel was employed for him.

The COMMON SERJEANT.—Indeed I shall do no such thing.

Miller.—I have employed an attorney to protect me, and now I have no one here. I hope I shall have my money returned.

The COMMON SERJEANT.—How is this, Mr. Jonas?

Mr. Clarkson (who appeared for one of the prisoners).—The prisoner says that he has given money to Mr. Games, and Mr. Games says that he has never received any.

Mr. Jonas.—There is a sum of money entered to the account of the prisoner in the governor's book.

The COMMON SERJEANT.—Then you will have your money back; let it be returned to him.

The trial then proceeded, and eventually Miller and another were convicted. When the former was called up for judgment he exclaimed very emphatically, "This all comes of my being without any one to defend me! I am brought up like a sheep to be slaughtered without being able to help myself. And yet money has been left at the gate to defend me, and I have nobody."

The COMMON SERJEANT remarked that he thought the verdict was both legally and morally correct, and pronounced a sentence of transportation for seven years.

[Such was the sum and substance of what took place in this case, in regard to the employment of counsel and solicitor. No further explanation was given nor investigation made than what appears in the above obscure details. We should like to know what is the meaning of "leaving money at the gate," of which we have already heard a good deal. If a prisoner has means to employ a solicitor, why should he "leave them at the gate?" Why not hand them directly and personally to his legal adviser? The statement of the prisoner will certainly corroborate the suspicions already afloat as to the means taken to secure a monopoly of prisoners' defences. Will Mr. Games look to this?]

LINCOLN'S INN, Nov. 22.—A further call to the bar was made this evening of the undermentioned members of this honourable society, who were in the usual manner sworn in before several of the benchers, and admitted to the degree of barrister-at-law:—Mr. Thomas Henry Farrer, Mr. Thomas Blanshard, Mr. Unwin Heathcote, Mr. Francis Barrow, Mr. Matthew Baillie Begbie, and Mr. John Frederic Standford.

IMPORTANT POINT IN CHANCERY PRACTICE.—It is not perhaps generally known by many equity members of the legal profession, that a short time back an important point was settled by the Lord Chancellor in respect of the future practice as to "motions of course." It appears that much doubt and uncertainty existed whether motions of course could be made during the sittings after Term as well as in Term, on any day, whether a "seal" day or not; but on the question coming before Lord Lyndhurst, he, after consulting the Vice-Chancellor of England, the Master of the Rolls, and Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, said—"The question argued before me yesterday was, whether the motion for a four order, which is a motion of course, could be made out of Term, except on a seal day, although in Term it might be made on any day. The rule was so laid down by Lord Eldon, and, indeed, it was carried so far, that even when the seal was continued for three or four days, it was not competent to make such a motion, unless the counsel was instructed on the first day of the seal. The question is, whether the practice has since been departed from." His lordship then discussed the authorities, and observed, that "in Lord Chesterfield v. Bond, the Master of the Rolls allowed a common injunction to go on a day not a seal day. I think (said Lord Lyndhurst) that analogy may with propriety be extended further, and that the same principle of public convenience which guides the decision of the Master of the Rolls in that case, applies equally to the present, and warrants me in laying it down as a general rule of practice for the future, that motions of course may be made out of Term, as well as in Term, on any day, whether a seal day or not. I have communicated on the subject with the Vice-Chancellor of England, Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, and the Master of the Rolls, and they all agree with me in thinking the analogy to which I have referred ought to be extended to all cases."

PETITION TO PLEAD "IN FORMA PAUPERIS."—The Lord Chancellor has had a petition presented to his lordship to sanction the issuing of that "writ," "which unto poor people," as the Act (21st Edward III.) states, shall be given for God's sake, and upheld by the aid of counsel learned in the law," in favour of the Widow Ackerlay, now or about 80 years of age, the lineal descendant of the Lord Chief Baron Sir Robert Atkyns, Knight of the Bath, whose race is now in default (since her right accrued 14 years) of heirs male from the Chief Justice Sir Edward Atkyns, the Norfolk branch. The lady in question (represented by Mr. Charles Ackerlay, her younger son, being the right "entail" issue in the female line from Robert (son of the Right Hon. Sir Edward Atkyns, brother to Sir Robert) and Elizabeth Edgecumbe, sister of George, first Lord Mount Edgecumbe, from which marriage emanate the present Chamberlaynes of Maugersbury, the Leighs of High Lee and Jodarel Hall, in Cheshire; the distinguished admirals Sir Charles and Sir Edward Hamilton, and Sir Graham Hamond, Baronets, and also the present families of the Lord Viscount Hood and Baron Bridport. The Lord Chancellor condescended to send a satisfactory intimation, on the breaking up of his court, through his secretary, H. J. Perry, esq.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS SQUABBLE.—On Saturday morning last Mr. Le Breton, the Attorney-General, was despatched on a secret mission to London, for the purpose of using the best means he may be advised to adopt, to prevent the serious troubles which threaten to arise out of the obstruction which the Court has caused to the writ of habeas corpus. By a letter received from him on Thursday, it appears that his mission has not yet been attended with any favourable result. He has been acting on the defensive, and had retained a barrister with a watching brief to act on behalf of the gaoler when the motion shall be made in the Queen's Bench for an attachment against him. Mr. Le Breton was on Tuesday looking forward with great anxiety for an interview with the Home Secretary, which he had not been able to obtain, owing to Sir James Graham being with the Queen at Windsor. He was expected to be at his post on Wednesday, when, in all probability Mr. Le Breton would see him. We may, therefore, expect news on Sunday, not only respecting Mr. Le Breton's mission, but also as to what steps have been taken regarding the attachment. We have no doubt that the writ will be here on Wednesday or Thursday next. It will be seen that the States yesterday empowered Mr. Le Breton to act as their deputy, and that Mr. Godfray suggested that, as it might be some time before the question would be decided, the Court ought to liberate Mr. Wilson on bail, or discharge him entirely from custody.—Jersey and Guernsey News.

EVENING SITTINGS AT THE CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—At a committee of the Court of Aldermen held on Saturday, the proposition of Alderman Wood to abolish the evening sittings of the Central Criminal Court for the trial of prisoners at the Old Bailey was taken into consideration; and it was unanimously resolved, that the experiment should be tried, commencing with the sittings in the month of December next. The consideration of the second part of Alderman Wood's proposition, as to having a third court for the greater despatch of business and the accommodation of the public, was reserved until the result of the experiment of abolishing the evening sittings should be ascertained.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LEGAL ASSOCIATION.—At a full meeting of this Society, Sir George Stephen in the chair, it was determined that one of the many cases of professional misconduct brought under the consideration of the Society, should be selected for prosecution. Mr. G. Fitch, of Field-court, Gray's-inn, was formally appointed Secretary, and it was resolved that the offices of the Association be forthwith removed to some central and convenient situation. As full particulars will, we conclude, be formally announced next week, we forbear giving further particulars at present.

CORRESPONDENCE.

VEXATIOUS DEFENCES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I am very glad to observe, by your last number, that the respectable body composing "the Metropolitan and Provincial Legal Association" have expressed their disapprobation of the practice of pleading, where the attorney knows there is not any defence. Time is the chief object of most defendants, without which they are probably unable to pay. A defendant may be punished, and frequently is, for pleading where he has no defence, when his object is only to gain time; and I beg to suggest the propriety of a rule that where the defendant offers to give the plaintiff, without risk of costs (which frequently fall upon himself), every advantage he could obtain by incurring that risk, the plaintiff should not be entitled to costs of further proceedings, after tender of defendant's consent to judge's order for payment of debt and costs, at or before the time judgment could be obtained if plea filed, unless default made.

Yours, faithfully,

Rugeley, Nov. 26, 1844. JNO. SMITH.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

"QUID PRO QUO," directs attention to the growing evil of "CHEAP LAW-STATIONERS."

The judicious course you have pursued in exposing the tricks of sham attorneys, whose doings tend, not only to bring the Profession itself into disrepute, but also to infringe upon the legitimate emoluments of the respectable practitioner, induces me to hope that you will not fail to turn your attention to another class of men, not so dangerous indeed, but equally obnoxious,—I allude to cheap law-stationers. These fellows (and they are every day growing more numerous) are striving to do all the injury in their power to the respectable clerk, by offering to work for solicitors at about 50 per cent. under the ordinary and fair charges. The consequence is that the services of the hard-working underling in an office (already too badly remunerated) are still further undervalued, and his poor stipend reduced accordingly.

The Profession will stand convicted of gross selfishness if, after having endeavoured to root out the pestilent race of sham attorneys, it encourages, at the same time, cheap law-stationers. Solicitors' clerks are as much entitled to protection as solicitors themselves; and if principals desire their clerks to act honourably in their proper sphere, they should first set the example. These cheap stationers would not, I apprehend, be very nice about using the contents of any papers that a foolish lawyer might intrust to them, to his and his client's prejudice, if any thing could be gained by it. Let solicitors, as a body, set their faces against all encroachments upon fair and just remuneration, whether such encroachments are levelled against their own pockets, or the pockets of their dependants, and whilst they are really promoting their own interest by thus acting, cheap law-stationers will be compelled to resort to some honest mode of gaining a livelihood.

"A SUBSCRIBER" at Cheltenham thus comments on the vexata quæstio of "LETTER BEFORE ACTION:"—

In my letter to you, of the 18th ult. I expressed an opinion, that in cases where an actual demand of payment of the debt had been made of the defendant previously to the attorney's letter being written, defendant could not avail himself of a tender afterwards made, although before action commenced, because his plea must contain an averment, that he was always ready to pay, and plaintiff might reply a prior demand and shew that defendant was not always ready.

Your correspondent, Mr. Thorne, is of a different opinion; he states, "The plaintiff to a plea of tender could not reply a prior demand; but if a defendant were ready to pay, and tendered the debt, upon the last demand being made, or at any time subsequently before the issuing of the writ, the action might clearly be defeated by a plea of tender." Mr. Thorne has not quoted any authorities in favour of his opinion, but, with your permission, I will just quote one or two in favour of mine.

Chitty, in his General Practice, vol. 1, p. 508, says, "A tender cannot be effectually pleaded if at any instant after the debt became due the party was not ready to pay (and especially if, in the case of a bill or note, the debtor did not pay on presentment;) for if a tender be pleaded, the plaintiff may reply a prior or subsequent demand."

Holt, Chief Justice, in Giles v. Harlis (Ld. Raymond, 254), and Lord Ellenborough, in Hume v. Peploe (8 East, fully quoted in Chitty on Bills, 732) lays down the same law; and in Rivers v. Griffiths (5 B. & Ald. 630), also quoted fully in Chitty on Bills, 1134, plaintiff's replication to a plea of tender was, that defendant was not always ready and willing to pay, &c. which he endeavoured to support by proof of a prior demand; but proving that his prior demand was of a different sum to that tendered, he failed. No objection, however, was raised to his replication, and no doubt he would have supported it, if he had proved a demand of the right sum. Unless, therefore, these authorities are overruled, I must still adhere to my former opinion, that if a party tenders the debt, without the costs of the attorney's letter, where a previous demand has been made, the plaintiff may refuse to accept it, and proceed with his action. I am aware that where a tender has been properly made, and is capable of proof, it will effectually prevent the plaintiff from commencing or proceeding in any action; but the question is whether the defendant can ever properly make a tender, when he has not been at all times ready to pay.

TO READERS.

This number contains the first trial of the new system adopted from the commencement of the last Term, for reporting all written judgments verbatim, by the aid of short-hand writers. Many of the cases in the Reports of this week will be found thus to be rendered of permanent value and authenticity, as containing the very words of the Judges. We hope that their length will not be found too great for the space we can devote to them.

As we presume that this information will more interest our readers than aught beside, we have again curtailed the usual miscellaneous matters that we may give it place. Hence the omission of much correspondence, of many articles and notices of new legal publications that are in type, and for which we pray the patience of contributors, authors, and publishers.

ADVERTISING ATTORNEYS.

From Hill's and Playford's Almanac published at Soham, we extract the following advertisement, which, however creditable to the ingenuity and literary powers of a tailor, are infinitely discreditable to a member of a profession.

[A Card.]
MR. CLAXTON'S
LAW AND GENERAL CONVEYANCING OFFICE,
REMOVED TO HIGH STREET, ELY,
(Next door to Mr. Catling's, Druggist.)

Freehold, Copyhold and Leasehold Conveyances, Mortgages, Deeds, Wills, Leases, Agreements, Purchase Contracts, Indentures of Apprenticeship, Notices to Quit, and all Legal Documents prepared on the shortest notice.

Estates disposed of by Public Auction and Private Contract; Debts recovered; Rents collected; Possession of premises obtained under the new Tenements Act.

And the general business of a Solicitor and Attorney attended to with punctuality and dispatch.

J. C. begs to return his thanks to his Clients, and the public generally for the numerous favours conferred upon him for the last fifteen years, and hopes by strict attention to his Clients' Interests, to merit the continuance of a share of the public patronage so long extended to his late Father and himself.

Attendance from Nine in the morning until Nine at night.

High-street, Ely, November, 1844.

"Punctuality and despatch," "begs to return his thanks to his clients and the public generally," "for favours received," "merit the continuance of a share of the public patronage," are expressions for which Mr. Claxton is evidently indebted to some cheap linen-draper in Ely.

Advertising almanacs seem to be quite the fashion.

In Alderton's Commercial Almanac for 1845 appears the following. Although the anonymous is preserved, some of our readers may perhaps enable us to trace the identity, and he shall find no mercy. The first part is not so bad, but the latter is altogether unprofessional.

LEGAL INFORMATION.

A gentleman who has been many years engaged in the practice of the Law and Testamentary business in particular, avails himself, through the medium of an Advertisement, to acquaint Executors and persons resident in the country, who have reason to believe they are entitled to property or legacies from parties deceased, or desiring information respecting the same, that he, having daily occasion to attend at the Will Office, Doctors' Commons, offers to peruse any Will, and forward an extract with an explanatory letter, furnishing every necessary information for the moderate fee of seven shillings and sixpence.

Instances are of frequent occurrence where landed property and pecuniary legacies have been irretrievably lost, in consequence of the inability or disinclination of persons to incur the risk of heavy law expenses.

The above charge of seven shillings and sixpence is not required to be paid until after the information has been forwarded, if a London reference be previous furnished.

Country Executors and Administrators may also consult the Advertiser upon all matters relating to their duties, and arrangements may be made for proving Wills, or obtaining Letters of Administration, and also for the satisfactory settlement of Executorship. Accounts without risk of litigation, on equally moderate terms.

Address (pre-paid), L. L. D., 2, Down-street, Piccadilly.

Our attention having been directed to an advertisement in the Law Times, from Mr. Buchanan, we find, on inspection, that it is certainly within the class which we have been denouncing. Accordingly we have directed the Publisher to return to Mr. Buchanan his money, and to decline for the future any advertisement that might bear upon the face of it any unprofessional aspect. We thank our correspondents for directing our attention to it. The advertising columns are under the sole jurisdiction of the Publisher; hence it had escaped our notice.

VERULAM SOCIETY.

We are sorry that we cannot even now announce the publication of the first number of the Practice Cases, which appear to be so greatly in request.

The truth is, that the reporter of the Bail Court alone appears to have preserved his notes of Trinity Term; his cases have been in type for some months, but they do not fill a number. The cases of the Term just concluded are not yet prepared for the press, although they are in rapid progress. We trust that next week we shall be able positively to announce the day of publication for the first number of a series for which the inquiries have been more numerous than for either of the others.

The members will be pleased to learn that the Verulam Reports have been frequently cited at Westminster during the last Term, and warm expressions of approval have been bestowed upon them.

The following suggestion has been made to us, and we request the members to give it their attention.

It is proposed to publish a series of works containing all the cases upon particular subjects decided during the last ten or twelve years, arranged under the various branches of the subject, and accompanied with explanatory notes, &c., so that in the compass of a small volume the practitioner may find in a moment all the actual law on that topic, in the very words of the Judges. It is supposed that this would be found extremely useful for reference and in courts, and still more so for the purposes of study, the actual cases, with the facts, being more readily remembered than the barren abstracts of them, to which voluminous text-books are compelled to confine themselves. The subjects suggested are such as these: "Cases on Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes," "Cases in Mercantile Law," "Poor Law Cases," "Sessions Cases," "Cases on Evidence," "Cases on Pleading and Practice," "Real Property Cases," and so forth.

Should the design meet the approbation of the members, we should be inclined to make trial of one or two of these.

We hope it is understood that the prices of the publications of the Society are regulated according to the number of members who order them. The Reports would be reduced very nearly one-half if the number of subscribers were trebled. As yet the sale of each number does not repay the cost, and for this reason, that some members take some, and others take others; so that the total sale of each series is little more than half the number of members of the Society. Those who are able to do so, should take all the Reports for the first year or so, if only to aid the infancy of the Society. The cost to them individually will be very trifling, but the effect upon the prosperity of the undertaking of many such trifling aids would be enormous.

The following new members have been enrolled during the week:—

Sutton, W. S. Birmingham.
Pope, John, 2, New Milman Street, London.
Waters, R. Tredegar, Monmouthshire.
Forman, R. H. Greenwich.
Parker, P. S. Weobley.
Field, Edward, Norwich.
Burmester, John, 23, Old-sq. Lincoln's Inn.
Lucas and Powell, Newport Pagnell.

THE CRITIC.

New Books.

An Outline of the Practice in Lunacy under Commissions in the nature of Writs de Lunatico Inquirendo. With an Appendix, containing Forms and Costs of Proceedings. By Joseph Elmer, of the Office of the Commissioners in Lunacy. London, 1844. Stevens and Norton.

The subject of this volume is of sufficient importance, and the practice peculiar enough to demand a distinct treatise, and the call of the Profession could not have been better answered than by Mr. Elmer, who possesses opportunities for procuring practical information, which he has turned to good account and by judicious arrangement and industry produced a volume which will be the text-book and authority upon the law-practice of Lunacy.

The arrangement of the treatise is thus. Having shewn how the commission is to be applied for and obtained, he describes succinctly the proceedings under it, the verdict and inquisition, the reference of the subsequent proceedings to the commissioners, the inquiries as to heir-at-law, &c.; the petition for confirmation of the commissioner's report, and the order thereon. The author next proceeds to consider the security given by committees, their approval, then the grant of custody and the vacating of the same, the costs, the proceedings for provisional care and maintenance, as to the managing the estate or otherwise respecting the person or property of any lunatic; the passing of the committees and receivers' accounts, and the proceedings for determining which of the next of kin shall attend on the process before the commissioners. Thence he passes to the consideration of the discharge of a committee and appointment of a new one, to special orders of reference, the appointment of a receiver of the lunatic's estate, taking an account of the debts due from the lunatic, the deposit of and delivery of deeds. Lastly, he treats of a supersedeas of the commission, of commissions to examine witnesses, of proceedings on the death of a lunatic, of lunatic trustees, and the duties of committees.

An Appendix supplies an elaborate List of Forms, and Tables of Fees and Costs, the General Orders and Statutes, and the Lunatic Visitors' Instructions to Solicitors and Committees.

The best recommendation of such a work is this outline of its contents. No extract can convey a fair idea of its value; but, because the information may be useful to our readers, we will take the instructions as to the duties of solicitors up to the finding of the verdict, when the subsequent proceedings are referred to the commissioners.

1. The Application for the Commission.

To obtain a Commission de Lunatico Inquirendo, a petition is presented to the Lord Chancellor. The petition, which is usually by a member of the family of the supposed lunatic (though a person not related may present it), must be signed by the petitioner, and attested by a solicitor duly admitted in the Court of Chancery. The petition is left with the Secretary of Lunatics, with affidavits in support of it. These affidavits are generally made by two or three medical men (physicians or surgeons) and by members of the family, or by other persons to whom the alleged lunatic is known, stating the particulars of the unsoundness of mind, and of the conduct and conversation by which it is shewn. They should also shew in general terms what is the nature and the amount of the alleged lunatic's property, and who are his nearest relations. If the alleged lunatic be married, and the application for the commission is not made by the husband or wife, it must be shewn that he or she (as the case may be) either assents to the proceedings or is acquainted with them. This assent may be given by letter, but the signature thereto must be verified by affidavit.

These affidavits, which must not be sworn before the petitioner's solicitor, are filed at the office of the Secretary of Lunatics and office copies taken. If the Lord Chancellor is satisfied with the evidence, and there is no opposition, an order is indorsed on the petition and the commission issues as of course. But if a caveat has been lodged, or the petition is by a stranger, or by one of the kindred without the concurrence of the husband or wife (if the alleged lunatic be married), the petition is set down by the secretary for hearing before the Lord Chancellor. The petition if by a stranger must be served on the nearest relations, or if it be by one of the kindred without the consent of husband or wife, must be served on husband or wife. When the petition has been duly served (and the service verified by affidavit if necessary), the matter is heard in court by the Lord Chancellor and an order pronounced thereon.

2. Obtaining the Commission.

The Lord Chancellor being satisfied, and the commission directed to issue, it is prepared by the Secretary of Lunatics and passed under the Great Seal, and is delivered to the solicitor who made the original application. The commission is engrossed on parchment with a 5s. stamp.

3. Proceedings under the Commission.

The solicitor having obtained the commission should take it, and the office copies of the affidavits, on which it issued to the office of the Commissioners in Lunacy, who will make an appointment for opening it. The following instructions are given by the commissioners for the guidance of the solicitor in preparing to execute the commission (viz.):—

"The solicitor should be able from previous inquiry to inform the commissioners what it is considered will be the most convenient place for holding the inquiry. It may be at the present residence of the supposed lunatic, if there be a room large enough for the accommodation of the jury, and also rooms for witnesses; or at some neighbouring court, or inn, where the necessary accommodations can be obtained; but it must be so arranged that the supposed lunatic can attend if desirous of so doing, and at all events that the jury may have easy access to see him. In a town the commissioners prefer a court, if there be one, to an inn, as leading to less expense.

"On the solicitor attending them with the above information, the commissioners will appoint a convenient day and place for opening the commission.

"When the commissioners have made such appointment, one of them will sign the precept and such number of subpœnas for witnesses as the solicitor may deem requisite. The solicitor should then take the precept to the undersheriff of the county to which the commission is addressed.

"It is desirable that the solicitor should, some days before the inquisition is held, deliver and read to the alleged lunatic a notice in writing of the intended inquiry, stating the time and place of its being held, and also explain to such person the nature of inquiry, and be able, on the execution of the commission, to prove that he has so done. The object of this notice and explanation is to prevent an adjournment, in case the alleged lunatic should, on appearing before the jury, express a wish to be represented before them by solicitor or counsel.

"The solicitor should also, before the time of opening the commission, have informed himself who are the heir and next of kin, what is the property to which the alleged lunatic is entitled; and who ought to be appointed committees, and what ought to be allowed for the maintenance; for, in the event of the party being found a lunatic, or of unsound mind, the commissioners are always desirous, whilst the family are at hand, of going into the necessary subsequent inquiries on the spot, and by means of vivâ voce evidence.

When the time for executing the commission has been fixed, the precept to the sheriff is signed and sealed by the commissioner, and is left by the solicitor with the undersheriff.

A jury consisting usually of persons residing in the immediate neighbourhood of the supposed lunatic's residence is then summoned by the sheriff, and the persons who are so summoned are most commonly taken from the special jury list; but they may, and as the expense is less should, when the case is free from difficulty, and the property is small, be taken from the common jury list.

The jury, if special, usually receive for their attendance one guinea each per day, and if common, half-a-guinea each.

The attendance of a witness on the execution of the commission is obtained by a summons signed by the commissioner. Blank forms of summonses are furnished at the Commissioners' Office. The solicitor should procure from the Commissioners' Office as many of these summonses as he thinks he shall want, and the commissioner will sign them on their being filled up addressed to the several witnesses whom it is proposed to call in support of the commission.

A copy of the summons is served upon the witness, the original being produced and shewn to him at the time of service.

The allowances to witnesses vary according to their profession, rank in life, and the nature of the case. It is often important to have the first medical evidence, and the fees to the eminent physicians and surgeons in London are high; but the allowances to the witnesses are generally regulated by the same scale as at common law.

If there be any doubt of the alleged lunatic's not being forthcoming at the inquiry, the commissioner's summons to produce him must be obtained and served upon the party having him in charge.

Although the alleged lunatic is not entitled to notice of the proceedings, yet to prevent the possibility of having to adjourn the inquiry to enable him to instruct a solicitor or counsel on his behalf, the commissioners usually (as before mentioned) suggest to the solicitor having the carriage of the commission the propriety of serving the alleged lunatic personally with a notice in writing, of the nature and object of the inquiry, and the time and place of entering upon it.

On opening the commission the under sheriff calls over the panel of the jury. The commission is then read by the solicitor having the carriage of it, or by the under sheriff, and the jury are sworn. The commissioner then proceeds to explain the nature and object of the commission, the principles of law respecting it, and the several points to which the attention of the jury is to be directed. If counsel attend in support of the commission, he opens the case by stating what particulars he intends to prove, and calls his witnesses. If no counsel appear in support of the commission, the commissioner states, as far as he is able from the affidavits on which the commission issued, the kind of case which he presumes is likely to be proved, and himself examines the witnesses tendered by the solicitor to the commission, and having also personally examined the alleged lunatic, sums up the case, and directs the jury to consider their verdict.

No person but the alleged lunatic or some one on his behalf can, unless by special leave of the Lord Chancellor, be heard on the inquiries under the commission. If the commission be opposed, the party opposing cross-examines the witnesses produced in chief, and when the counsel for the inquiry has examined all his witnesses, the alleged lunatic is examined by the commissioner. The counsel sums up the case for the commission, and the counsel in opposition then stated to the jury his observations upon it, and, if he thinks fit, produces evidence to meet it, and to shew the sanity of the party. The counsel for the commission then replies, and the evidence is summed up by the commissioner.

Except in cases where the alleged lunatic is abroad, or it is utterly impracticable to get a view, the jury never come to a decision without a personal inspection. In these excepted cases the jury are of course very particular as to the existence of the party, and the application of the evidence. The jury see the alleged lunatic at such times as they and the commissioner think fit, generally at the end of the case for the commission.

The alleged lunatic is entitled to be present at the inquiry if he desire it, and the commissioner generally inquires of him personally, before evidence is given, whether he wishes to be present.

4. Verdict and Inquisition.

The jury (or twelve of them at least) having agreed upon their verdict, the inquisition, which must be previously prepared and written in duplicate, on paper and parchment, leaving the necessary blanks to be filled up at the time of the inquiry, is then completed by filling up such blanks. These documents are then read over by the solicitor, and if consistent with the verdict of the jury, the paper form is signed (but not sealed) by the jurymen agreeing to the verdict. The dissentient jurors do not sign it. The parchment form (to which the seals only of the jurors and seal of the commissioner are attached) with the signed paper are then handed by the foreman of the jury to the commissioner, who thereupon signs each form. The commissioner annexes the inquisition on parchment to the commission, and the following words, viz.: "The execution of this commission appears by the inquisition hereunto annexed," are indorsed on the commission and signed by him. The commission and inquisition being so annexed and indorsed are then filed by the commissioners' clerk in the Petty Bag Office, where an office copy of the inquisition is obtained.

The fee for filing the inquisition and for the office copy (including 2s. 6d. for a certificate of filing) is 22s. 6d. Of this amount 5s. is paid to the commissioners' clerk who pays it over to the Petty Bag Office on filing the inquisition, and receives a certificate of filing. The solicitor has, therefore, only 17s. 6d. to pay at the Petty Bag Office on taking the office copy inquisition.

There are no fees payable to the commissioners, or their clerks, upon the execution of the commission.

The Law of Joint-Stock Companies. Fourth edition. By CHARLES WORDSWORTH, Esq. of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London, 1845. Benning and Co.

WE have already reviewed, at great length, this very valuable work, on the occasion of the appearance of the third edition. But so numerous have been the additions and improvements introduced into this new edition, that we should yet have been tempted to have culled some further specimens from its pages did not the heavy claims of the Term demand the curtailment of all other information not of immediate urgency. As it is, we must refer to the former notice for a full account of the various topics discussed in this treatise. This fourth edition has been required by the changes which the recent statutes have made in the law regulating joint-stock companies, and Mr. WORDSWORTH has availed himself of the opportunity thus afforded to add to his work all the cases decided since the publication of the 1st edition. Some entirely new chapters have been introduced, and a somewhat different arrangement of the subject has been adopted. The new statutes and the forms prescribed by the Board of Trade are of course to be found here, and the index has been enlarged.

To all to whom the previous editions are known, this new one will need no recommendation. To strangers it will be enough to say that it is the best formal treatise upon the entire Law of Joint-Stock Companies which the Profession possesses.

The Justices' Pocket Manual; or, Guide to the ordinary Duties of Justice of the Peace. With an Appendix of Forms. Third Edition, corrected and enlarged. By SAMUEL STONE, Solicitor, Clerk to the Justices for the Borough of Leicester. London, 1845. Shaw and Sons.

THE previous edition of this very excellent work was reviewed at great length in the LAW TIMES. The call for a new edition in so few months is the best proof that the opinion we then expressed of its merits was a correct one, and that the volume has been found as useful in practice as it appeared to be upon perusal. It has, indeed, entirely answered the purpose for which, as Mr. STONE informs us, it was intended, namely,—"the furnishing, in a portable form, such information on statutory offences, points of practice, and magisterial duties, as may, in cases of ordinary occurrence, render it unnecessary to have recourse to more voluminous and comprehensive, but, on that account, less convenient publications."

In this edition many new titles have been introduced, and others are much enlarged. The statutes and the cases are brought down to the present time. In treating of an offence it is uniformly stated whether it is affected by the recent statute for regulating the jurisdiction of quarter sessions.

In our former notice, we had occasion to commend the division of the work devoted to the subject of Practice. This has been considerably enlarged, and the author has pointed out the effect of the late decision in Jones v. Gurdon, and the statutes to which it applies.

Another very useful feature of this volume is the table of "Periodical Business for Justices," and the like for town-clerks.

It will be unnecessary to add to this description a word of recommendation. A work which has attained the honour of a third edition needs only to be announced to insure attention.

THE REPORTS.

Equity Courts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Monday, Dec. 2.

Re NEACHELL.

Specific performance—Infant trustee—Statute of 1 Wm. 4, c. 60—Partition.

Where an action of ejectment had been compromised by an agreement between the parties to divide the estate, and one of such parties being an infant, the Master reported that it would be for his benefit to carry such compromise into effect, and that such infant was a trustee as to one moiety within the Act of 1 Wm. 4, c. 60, it was nevertheless held that such infant was not a trustee within the Act, and that the compromise could not be carried out in any other way than by filing a bill.

Whately appeared in support of a petition in this matter, praying that the report of the Master, finding an infant a trustee within the meaning of the Act 1 Wm. 4, c, 60, might be confirmed, and that a proper person might be appointed to convey.

The circumstances were these:—Real estate had descended upon one of two brothers, who were twins, but it was uncertain which of the two had been first born. One of them had entered into possession of the estate, and had died leaving an infant heir. The heir of the other, who was a lunatic, had commenced an action of ejectment to recover the estate, upon the ground that his ancestor was the eldest son. There were a great many witnesses on both sides, and the sole point being which of the twin sons had been the eldest, much doubt existed as to the result of the ejectment; and before the trial it was agreed, on the behalf of the lessor of the plaintiff and of the tenant in possession, that the estate, which was of considerable value, should be equally divided between them. An Act of Parliament had been obtained to authorize the committee of the estate of the lunatic lessor of the plaintiff to carry out the arrangement; and upon a reference to the Master he had reported that it would be beneficial for the infant tenant in possession that the proposed compromise should be effected; and the Master also reported that the infant was a trustee of one moiety within the meaning of the Act. This report had been confirmed.

The petition had come on before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, but his honour having some doubt upon the question, and feeling that there was a difficulty in respect of the lunatic's interest being bound, except by an order of the Lord Chancellor, directed the petition to be mentioned to his lordship.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is in substance only an agreement for a partition, and that does not make the party a trustee within the Act. The report consisted of several circumstances, such as that the compromise was for the benefit of the infant, and so forth. Even in the case of a specific performance the infant heir of the vendor is only a trustee after decree. The Act, sec. 16, enacts, "that where any land shall have been contracted to be sold, and the vendor shall have departed this life, either having received the purchase-money, or not having received any part thereof, and a specific performance of such contract, as far as the same by reason of the infancy can be executed, shall have been decreed by the Court of Chancery in the lifetime of such vendor, or after his decease, then the heir of such vendor shall be deemed to be a trustee for the purchaser within the meaning of this Act." And by the 18th section it is enacted, "that the several provisions hereinbefore contained shall extend to every other case of a constructive trust, or trust arising or resulting by implication of law; but in every such case, where the alleged trustee has or claims a beneficial interest adversely to the party seeking a conveyance or transfer, no order shall be made for the execution of a conveyance or transfer by such alleged trustee, until after it has been declared by the Court of Chancery, in a suit regularly instituted in such court, that such person is a trustee for the person so seeking a conveyance or transfer; but this Act shall not extend to cases upon partition, or cases arising out of the doctrine of election in equity, or to a vendor, except in any case hereinbefore expressly provided for." Thus it seems that cases of partition and election in equity are excepted out of the Act. I am sorry for it, but the parties must file a bill to obtain a decree for carrying out the compromise. Leave given to file a bill.

Wednesday, Dec. 4.

SAYER v. WAGSTAFFE.

Taxation of solicitor's bill under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 73—Delivery of bill of costs pending a suit—Pressure—Application to tax—Practice—Security for payment.

The allowance of a petition to tax a bill of costs within the year, although the petition be not heard until after the expiration of a year from the settlement, is the time of application within the meaning of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 73.

Where a client gives a security payable at a future day for a bill of costs, that is not a payment within the terms of that statute, but is a mere suspension of the remedy.

In order to obtain a reference of a settled bill of costs for taxation, not merely items which would have been taxed off must be shewn, but such as amount to imposition or fraud.

If payment of a bill of costs is made under undue pressure, the account will be opened: and though the continuance of the relation of solicitor and client is a circumstance to be considered when pressure is complained of, it will not alone justify a reference.

It is usual to allow two guineas a day for a clerk's attendance on a commission to examine witnesses.

This appeal was heard on the 3rd and 5th of last June, and his lordship having expressed his opinion upon most of the points raised by the petition, the facts, with the argument and his lordship's expressions of opinion, appeared in 3 LAW TIMES, pp. 121, 197, 238. The matter now stood for judgment.

JUDGMENT.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—This was a petition by the defendant for a reference to the Master to tax his solicitor's bill after it had been settled and paid, and which comes before me by appeal from the Master of the Rolls. The facts are these:—Mr. Saunders was the solicitor employed by Wagstaffe in the cause of Sayer v. Wagstaffe. The retainer took place in the earlier part of the year 1841; and in October 1842 Mr. Saunders delivered his bill, amounting to 135*l.* and asked for payment. Upon that a promissory note, dated the 3rd of November, was given by the petitioner to the solicitor. This note was payable fourteen days after date, and would therefore have arrived at maturity, allowing for the days of grace, on the 20th of November. But, in fact, it was paid on the 17th of November. The petition for a reference to tax the bill was lodged with the secretary of the Master of the Rolls on the 15th November, 1843, and was allowed and answered on the 16th; but it was not heard for several days afterwards. One objection to the petition insisted upon by the counsel for the appellant was, that a year had elapsed since the bill had been paid, and that by the late Act of Parliament, which provides that applications to refer a solicitor's bill for taxation must be made within a year from the time of payment of the bill, it is enacted, "that no bill shall be taxed unless application for that purpose be made within a year after the bill shall have been settled or paid." The question is, whether the time had expired before the presentment of the petition. It was contended that the delivery of the promissory note constituted payment of the bill of costs; and if that was a payment, the time had expired, and the objection would be sustained. I expressed an opinion during the argument, that where the debtor delivers a promissory note to his creditor, that is not payment. The effect of giving a note is merely to suspend the remedy; but if the note is not paid when at maturity, the receiving it does not prevent the creditor proceeding to enforce his original debt. The party is not bound until the money is actually paid. There is a case in the Exchequer, Ex parte Herrus, reported in the Jurist for 1844, which has occurred since the decision on this petition by the Master of the Rolls, where that opinion was adopted and acted on. I think there is nothing in that objection. The next point made was, that the time of petitioning must be taken to be the hearing of the petition, and that occurred after the 17th of November, 1843; but there is no foundation for that idea. The petition is presented to the Master of the Rolls, and when allowed and answered by him, must be deemed to be a petition. The time for hearing depends upon the discretion of the Court, and the state of business. Here the petition was presented on the 15th, and allowed on the 16th of November; there is not, therefore, the slightest doubt as to the petition having been in time. The next question is as to the items of the bill of costs. The rule is, that a party who seeks to refer a bill for taxation after it has been paid, must state some objectionable charges; not merely charges which would not be allowed on an ordinary taxation (probably few solicitors' bills could be found which do not contain such items); but the objections must be such as amount to something like fraud or imposition. In this case, when heard before me, the various items objected to were examined and sifted; I had no doubt as to any except one set of items. The only items I thought might be objectionable were these:—there had been a commission to examine witnesses in the country, which had been attended by the clerk of the defendant's solicitor, and the bill contained charges of two guineas a day for such clerk's attendance, and it had been urged that the solicitor is only entitled to charge one guinea a day when the examination of witnesses is attended by his clerk; and it was contended that, as the solicitor must have known this rule, it was something like imposition to make the higher charge for the clerk's attendance. I thought it proper to refer to the taxing officers of the Court upon this point, and I have received a certificate signed by the whole of those officers, in which they unanimously certify that when a clerk is employed to attend a commission for the examination of witnesses, the uniform practice is to allow two guineas a day. As to the merits, upon the items there do not appear to be any which render it incumbent on the Court to refer the bill for taxation after payment. There are objectionable items certainly, that is, items which would probably be struck out upon taxation, but they are not objectionable to an extent amounting to imposition or fraud. There is a remaining point; when the promissory note was given, the cause was depending, and the relation of solicitor and client still existed between the petitioner and Mr. Saunders, and it was said that the note had been given, and subsequently paid under pressure; and Mr. Russell argued that where the relation of solicitor and client exists, that is equivalent to actual pressure. Sir John Leach, in Howell v. Edmunds (4 Russell, 67), said, "The bill must certainly be taxed, not only because the suit in which it was incurred was pending when the bill was paid, from which circumstance influence and pressure upon the client will be assumed; but because there was, in fact, actual pressure by the threat of an arrest." So in Crossley v. Parker (1 Jac. & Walk. 460), Sir Thomas Plumer, Master of the Rolls, said, "The client was under pressure arising from fear of being deserted, and, therefore, preferred to submit to what he thought improper charges. Besides, I do not see that any vouchers were delivered up; how could that happen if it was meant as a complete settlement? In fact, he afterwards proceeds with the account, shewing that he had only received so much on account. For these reasons I think the settlement ought not to operate to prevent the bill from being taxed. This I say independently of the particular items in the bill; but it is impossible not to say that, for the credit of this gentleman, it is fit they should be examined into, at the same time that they ought to be looked at with attention to the circumstances of the case." Now it appears that in Howell v. Edmunds there was actual pressure, and therefore it was unnecessary to have expressed the opinion that the existence of the relation of solicitor and client did amount to pressure; and Sir Thos. Plumer, in Crossley v. Parker, said that the items were of such a nature that it was fit that they should be subjected to taxation. Undoubtedly, the existence of the relation of solicitor and client is a circumstance to be taken into consideration when a case of pressure is insisted on: but if there is no item to which such objection can be taken as would amount to imposition, I do not think the mere continuance of the relation is a sufficient ground for directing a taxation. Lord Eldon, in Cook v. Setree (1 Ves. & Bea. 126), observed, "I cannot go the length of holding that a bond given in 1810 is to be complained of in 1812, upon the mere ground that there was not at the time an end of all business depending between the client and the attorney, or of a particular suit in which they were engaged. It may be very fair as between them to say that the situation of the attorney was such that he could not go on, and therefore presented his bill, desiring either payment, or security in part." And he seems to have considered that, unless there were some other circumstances of fraud, imposition, or evidence of undue pressure or influence, there was no ground for inquiry. And in Penderleath v. Fraser (3 Ves. & Bea. 174), Lord Eldon again refused a reference to tax a solicitor's bill, where payment had been made, and long acquiesced in, unless very gross charges were distinctly pointed out. The whole subject came before my immediate predecessor, Lord Cottenham, in Horlock v. Smith (2 Myl. & Craig, 495); and that learned judge reviewed all the cases in detail; he referred to the opinion of Sir John Leach, in Howell v. Edmunds: it was not, however, necessary for him to decide that point; but he did express himself in a manner which, considering his habitual caution, plainly indicated that he did not coincide in that opinion. Afterwards, in Waters v. Taylor (2 Myl. & Cr. 526, 556), Lord Cottenham expressed himself in terms which satisfy me that he did not consider the mere continuance of the relation of solicitor and client in itself sufficient to open the account. He said, "No doubt, the settlement or payment of a solicitor's bills pending a suit, and whilst the relation continues, affords grounds upon which the account will be much more easily opened, and the bills referred for taxation, than in other cases; but if these circumstances alone were in all cases to be held sufficient ground for a taxation, no solicitor who continues to act for a client would be secure of any settlement during the life of his client; and the continuance of one of those suits which not unfrequently occur in this court would prevent the possibility of any settlement between the solicitor and the client." That shews what the opinion of that learned judge was, after long consideration, and great attention to the question. I concur in that opinion. After the law has been altered by the late Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 73, and a year made the limit for opening the account, some of the reasoning on which Lord Cottenham proceeded has been displaced. I am therefore of opinion, that in this case there is no ground for opening the account and referring this bill for taxation. So much of the decree of the Master of the Rolls as directs a taxation of the bill of 135*l.* must be discharged.

Dec. 5.—The Lord Chancellor again mentioned this case, and said—The Master of the Rolls refused to make a reference to tax generally, but directed particular items to be taxed. I have read the short-hand writer's notes of the argument at the Rolls, and they plainly shew that the parties consented that those items should be taxed. The Master of the Rolls acted upon the general principle that the bill ought not to be taxed; and then he, by the consent of the parties, directed that particular items should be taxed. If that be so, it would not be right to vary the Master of the Rolls' order as to the taxation of that bill. Some understanding must be come to by the parties upon this. The order must not be drawn up at present.

Cruikshank v. M'Vickar.

Three separate firms, A, B, and C, enter into a trading speculation in a commercial article of a definite description; A to buy the article with funds furnished by B, and transmit the same to C to sell. A accordingly draws two bills on B, and makes a consignment to C, which on its arrival is found not to answer the stipulated description, and is repudiated by C, and afterwards by B. It is, however, sold by C on account of A only, and the proceeds transmitted to B, who bring their bill against A, to have it declared that the consignment was not duly made in conformity with the agreement, and asking relief on that footing: but there was an alternative prayer that if the consignment was in conformity with the agreement, then that accounts should be taken, &c. A general demurrer to the bill for want of equity was overruled.

An alternative prayer must be founded directly or indirectly on, or be consistent with, some allegation or pretence in the bill.

In 1840 communications passed between Cruikshank and Co. of London, Ramsay and Co. of Sydney, Australia, and M'Vickar and Co. of Canton, as to a trading partnership in tea to be bought at Canton and shipped to Sydney, for that market. It was proposed that the tea should be of a particular description (chiefly hyson skin), that each firm should charge its own commission, and that the Canton firm should draw on the London firm, and should ship the tea to Sydney, there to be sold on the joint account. The proceeds, after paying expenses, were to be transmitted to London, to be applied first in payment of the advances there made, and then the surplus to be divided among the three firms equally. M'Vickar and Co. did not at first freely accede to the proposal; but in May 1841 they wrote to the London firm to say they had made a purchase on the joint account, and inclosing a bill, which, with one subsequently drawn, amounted to nearly 12,000*l.* These were accepted by Cruikshank and Co. and paid. The tea, however, was not sent at that time (the ship George the Fourth, which was to have carried it, being sent by M'Vickar and Co. on another voyage), nor till the November following. When the assignment arrived at Sydney, it was found to be not hyson skin, but Woping bohea, an article not only inferior, but scarcely tea at all. The Sydney firm immediately repudiated the consignment, and refused to accept it on the joint account, for themselves absolutely, and for the London firm conditionally. They, however, accepted it for M'Vickar and Co.'s account alone, and sold a large portion of it, and transmitted the proceeds thereof (7,000*l.*) to London, which the London firm received, and, after some delay, confirmed the repudiation of the Sydney firm. In this state of things, Cruikshank and Co. file their bill against M'Vickar and Co. to have a declaration that the consignment was not in conformity with the agreement, for an account of the bills and moneys advanced thereon, and of the sales of teas already made, and that they should have a lien on the teas remaining unsold for the balance of their bills over 7,000*l.* and also for damages for the amount of profit that would have accrued if the cargo had been duly sent, and issues to try that point, if necessary. There was an alternative prayer for an account, &c. if it should appear that the consignment was in conformity with the agreement, &c. One of the firm of M'Vickar and Co. resident in this country, but not acquainted with the transactions, put in his answer to the bill; and another, who had a thorough knowledge of them, put in a general demurrer, for want of equity, which now came on for argument.

Kindersley, Turner, Roupell, and Collins, for the defendants, and in support of the demurrer.—The grounds of demurrer are, first, that it is a case for relief in full at law; and secondly, that, it being stated in the bill that the plaintiffs repudiate the consignment, and deny it to be in accordance with the contract, they pray, in the alternative, that if the consignment should be held to be in conformity with the agreement, then that an account, &c. should be taken on that footing—a quite different thing, and inconsistent with the allegations in the bill. The first part of the prayer, viz. that framed on the notion of the repudiation, asks four things; 1st, that the Court shall declare the consignment not to be in accordance with the contract; 2nd, that an account be taken of the bills of exchange, and of the proceeds of the sales of the teas; 3rd, a lien on the unsold teas; and 4th, damages in respect of the profits that might have accrued from the contract, if properly carried out, and issues at law to try what may be proper damages, if necessary. As to the first, they have themselves declared that the consignment is not in pursuance of the contract, and the defendants, of course, on the demurrer, say nothing to the contrary. Why, then, ask the Court to make an election for them, which they have already made themselves? The court can only so ask in case the right to do so is disputed, or is doubtful. Here it is not so; they assume, and nobody denies their legal right to reject or accept the consignment. The next part of the prayer is for an account of moneys paid by Cruikshank and Co. on account of bills drawn upon them, and of the proceeds of the sales of teas shipped by M'Vickar and Co. to Sydney. This is, however, altogether unnecessary, for it is expressly stated on the bill that the former amount to 11,920*l.* and the latter to 7,000*l.* There is no uncertainty, therefore, nor any complication of accounts requiring equitable interposition: and in an action at law there would be merely a set-off. The third branch of the first alternative is, that it may be declared that the plaintiffs are entitled to a lien on the unsold part of the consignment, for the balance of the moneys advanced on the bills. Equitable lien is the result of contract; but in this case the goods are in the hands of their agents, Ramsay and Co. and they have therefore a legal lien, and it is unnecessary to come into a court of equity. The last branch of this head is damages. It is rather a novel course to ask a court of equity to declare damages for a breach of contract, and to send out issues to be tried at law, if necessary. They say the reason is, that the transaction is joint, but this is curious. We are here not on a joint contract, which they repudiate, because the purchase was not made within the scope of the authority, how then can damages arise? Damages suppose the existence of a contract, and the allegations of the bill deny it. It is an attempt to cloak a bill of discovery under a bill for relief. The second alternative of the prayer is for relief on the footing of the consignment being upheld. But what authority has the Court to form an opinion, and say whether the consignment was, or not, duly made? It has none; the plaintiffs have taken the case entirely out of the Court's hands, and decided it for themselves. The whole of this part, therefore, drops to the ground; but even if it were not so, no case is stated on this bill authorizing the plaintiffs to demand an account on the footing supposed, for they cannot come here, stating a transaction void, and pray relief on that supposition, and then pray relief in case of its being held good. They cited the following cases:—Sainsbury v. Jones (2 Beav. 462; 5 Myl. & Cr. 1); Kendall v. Beckett (2 Russ. & Myln. 88); Lindsay v. Lynch (2 Sch. & Lefr. 1); Frietas v. Dos Santos (1 Y. & Jer. 574); Hoare v. Contencin (1 B. & Cr. 27); Dinwiddie v. Bailey (6 Ves. 136); Moses v. Lewis (12 Price, 502); King v. Rossett (2 Y. & Jer. 33); Foley v. Hill (Phillips, 399); Darthez v. Clemens (6 Beav. 165).

Tinney and Rolt, for the plaintiffs, contended that they were entitled to relief on three grounds: fraud, account, and lien. It was in the option of the Canton firm whether the agreement for a partnership ever came to any thing; but by their letter of the 12th May, 1841, they intimated that in pursuance of the discretion reposed in them they had purchased on account of the partnership, and thereby fraudulently induced us to advance our money on the faith of the partnership we had a right to think was constituted. They were not our agents—they were our partners—and by their breach of faith they give us a right to be indemnified by them, not merely in respect of the money advanced on the bills, but for the profits that might have accrued from the adventure. Again, they say we have no lien on the goods, it is merely a question of set-off at law; but the goods are not in our hands, nor in those of our agents, and being bought with our money we have an equitable lien on them. There are technical objections to the form of the action at law, so that we cannot enforce our rights legally, because, the contract being joint, the jury cannot sever the damages. Besides, the account being between three firms, it would be difficult, nay, almost impossible, to adjust it at law. They cited Chesterfield v. Janssen (2 Ves. s. 129); M'Kenzie v. Johnson (4 Mad. 373); Bovill v. Hammond (6 B. & Cr. 149); Hill v. Tucker (1 Taunt. 7).

Kindersley, in reply, cited Coll. on Part.; Walker v. Harris (1 Anstr. 245); Nockells v. Crosby (3 B. & Cr. 814).

The Master of the Rolls.—This case has taken a long time to discuss. The transactions are simple enough as to the facts, but there may be some difficult questions of law arising out of them. [His lordship stated the facts fully.] Let us see, then, what was done. There was an agreement for a speculation which, if completed as intended, would be a trading partnership. On the faith of this bills are drawn, accepted, paid; on whose risk and for whose benefit? Did Cruikshank and Co. so act either at their sole risk or on the credit due to M'Vickar and Co.? No; on the credit of the partnership, not for the benefit of themselves. Many circumstances of fraud have been introduced as to the delay of the shipment, the charging the full value of a good consignment, &c.; but the trading in question was a trading on the joint account. Whether it was the most prudent course to repudiate the consignment it is unnecessary to say; but there is nothing in the letter of Ramsay and Co. to shew that the joint trading was thereby put an end to, but only that that particular consignment was rejected, or only received on account of M'Vickar and Co. alone. But it is said that each adventure was separate, and by rejecting the one in question you break up the partnership. That is not so. There are transactions preparatory to and in contemplation of partnership, which cannot be excluded from consideration in winding it up. There is, therefore, here a state of things in which joint obligations and joint liabilities are incurred, and there cannot be an account in the absence of any of the parties. There is, therefore, a case for relief, and if so to any, however small an extent, a general demurrer cannot be supported. This is so without referring to the alternative prayer which is said to be inconsistent with the bill; but it is only an omission in the statement, if at all, which makes it so. As it is unnecessary, however, I need not consider it. I overrule the demurrer.

Tuesday, Nov. 19.

West v. Currie.

The costs of a petition for the transfer of a part of an undivided fund to which the petitioners are entitled, are payable out of the general fund, and not the part to which they are entitled.

This was a petition for the transfer of 1,000*l.* part of a sum of stock in the cause to which the petitioners were entitled on their coming of age, &c. The Master reported them of age, &c. and the petition asked the confirmation of the Master's report. The only question was one of costs.

Giffard, for the petitioners, asked the costs of the application out of the general estate of the testator, and cited Shuttleworth v. Howarth (4 Myl. & Cr. 492).

Bailey, contrà, insisted that if the stock had been transferred to their names, they would have had to bear their own costs, and no further costs were incurred now than if the fund had been separate. [The Master of the Rolls.—Yes, in serving you.] Well, we shall allow them that part of the costs.

The Master of the Rolls.—The funds ought to have been severed; not having been so, the costs must be borne by the general estate.

Thellusson v. Woodford.

The fact that notice has not been served on an outlaw, who is a party interested, is no objection to a petition's being heard for laying proposals before the Master for the purchase of an estate on the trusts of a will.

This was the petition of Lord Rendlesham for leave to lay before the Master proposals for the purchase of an estate called Aldringham, in Suffolk, belonging to Francis Hale, agreeably to the trusts of Mr. Thellusson's will.

Kindersley was about to open the petition, when

Twells took a preliminary objection, on the ground that Charles Thellusson had not been served, to which Kindersley replied that Mr. Thellusson had been outlawed, and therefore could not appear. Besides, the Act did not make it imperative to serve him.

Beavan and others, for other parties.

The Master of the Rolls.—The business of the Court cannot be put a stop to because Mr. Thellusson, being an outlaw, cannot appear. The petition must, therefore, be granted.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

Tuesday, Dec. 3.

Barker v. Ford.

Practice—Amendments—Bill for discovery.

A bill for discovery cannot, before an answer is put in, be converted by amendment into a bill for relief without special leave.

An irregular order cannot be supported upon merits subsequently brought forward.

The defendant in this case had filed a bill for relief against the plaintiff, Barker, and upon that this bill, which was one for discovery, was filed. The defendant, Ford, subsequently dismissed his bill with costs, and notice was duly given to the opposite side that no answer would be required, and on the 26th of July an order of reference was made to the Master to tax the defendant's costs of suit. On the 28th of July, upon application to the Court by the plaintiff in this suit, the order of the 26th of July was rescinded, and it was ordered that the defendant, Ford, should have a certain time to plead, answer, or demur to this bill of discovery. At the date of this order Ford's answer was prepared, and awaited only his perusal. His absence from town at the time prevented the immediate filing of the answer; but before the answer was filed the bill of discovery was, by amendment, without special leave, converted into a bill for relief.

Swanston and Montague now moved that the amendments in the bill might be expunged.

Russell and Winstanley, for the plaintiff, cited Severn v. Fletcher (5 Sim. 457); Butterworth v. Bailey (15 Ves. 358); —— v. Smith (Coop. 141), and Hildyard v. Cressy (3 Atk. 303), and argued upon the merits of the case.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I considered the point so settled that I am surprised to hear it discussed. If this is arguable, as it seems to me every thing is. I consider the proceeding to have been irregular. The modern practice has been not to support an irregular order upon merits subsequently brought forward.

WALTERS v. COLLIER.
MILLBANK v. STEVENS.

Practice—Examination of documents in another suit.

On motion by plaintiffs in a supplemental suit for liberty to examine documents deposited in the original suit, the plaintiffs in the original suit should be served with notice.

Miller, on behalf of the plaintiffs in the first-mentioned suit, which was supplemental to the other, moved for liberty to examine documents deposited in the original suit. The notice of motion was headed in the two causes, but the plaintiffs in the original suit were not served with notice. Both causes were set down before Bruce, V. C. and in the original suit, which was for administration of a testator's estate, a decree had been made.

Bagshawe opposed the hearing of the motion, as all the parties interested had not been served, and

The VICE-CHANCELLOR directed the motion to stand over, with liberty to serve them.

BLAIR v. ORMOND.

Practice—Affidavits.

Upon an application for a commission to examine a witness to perpetuate his testimony, quære whether an affidavit that the deponent was informed and believed that the witness was above eighty years of age is sufficient?

In this case Heathfield moved for a commission to examine a witness in order to perpetuate his testimony. The motion was made upon an affidavit which stated that the deponent was informed and believed that the witness was above eighty years of age.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he had a doubt whether the affidavit was sufficient. The Registrar would inquire, and if it was sufficient the order might be made.

HAWKES v. HOWELL.

Practice—Payment of money into court—Executor.

In an administration suit where wilful default is charged against an executor, and he admits that a sum of money has been allowed by him to remain upon personal security, without any excuse being given, the defendant will be ordered to pay the money into court, and the Court will only consider the time within which the money should be paid.

Selwyn moved for the payment into court by the defendant, an executor, of a sum of 2,000*l*. and also for payment of a balance admitted by the defendant to be in his hands. The suit was an administration suit commenced against the executor, and charged him with wilful default. The sum of 2,000*l*. was due upon two bills payable four and five years respectively after date by Richard Howell. These bills became due in the testator's lifetime, and long before his decease. The money had been allowed by the defendant to remain upon the bills, he receiving five per cent. per annum upon the sums. The defendant admitted these facts by his answer, and that a balance of 300*l*. part of the testator's estate, was in his hands. By an affidavit subsequently filed, the defendant stated that, by reason of various payments, this balance in his hands was reduced to 24*l*.

Randall opposed the motion, and cited Richardson v. The Bank of England (4 Myl. & Craig, 165).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he considered it quite settled that where wilful default was charged against an executor, and he admitted, without excuse or apology, that he had allowed a debt due to the testator to remain upon personal security alone, the only question upon a motion for payment of the money into court was as to the time to be allowed for payment. He should direct the 2,000*l*. to be paid into court within three months. As to the payment of the balance, the motion should stand over for an explanation as to the reduction stated by the defendant in his affidavit, it not being sufficient to say that the balance was reduced without further explanation.

Friday, Dec. 6.
MUTLOW v. MUTLOW, Re STUBBS.

Solicitor and client—6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37.

Special circumstances under which the Court directed the taxation of a bill of costs when more than twelve months had elapsed since the delivery of the bill.

This was a petition presented in the above suit for the taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs under the recent Act. The suit was an administration suit of the estate of a testator, who died on the 21st of September, 1842. At the request of the executors, the solicitor's bills, for the payment of which the solicitor had a lien upon some deeds in his possession, were sent in in Nov. 1842. A decree was made in the suit on the 26th of April, 1843. The executors had no personal estate in possession, except a sum of 56*l*., and the debts proved against the estate amounted to 3,000*l*.

Pigott, for the petition.

Craig, for the respondent, contended that the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37, precluded the taxation of bills of costs after twelve months from the delivery, unless special circumstances were shewn, which in this case were not. Nothing was alleged in the petition as to the bills themselves; but

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he should direct the bills to be taxed.

VICE-CHANCELLOR WIGRAM'S COURT.

Nov. 20th, and Dec, 4.
DOBSON v. HOOPER.
Will, construction of.

This cause came on before his Honour on further directions and costs as to the construction of the will of Mary Dobson, the wife of Henry Dobson, formerly Mary Ragsdale, spinster. John Ragsdale, by his will dated 3rd April, 1789, gave and bequeathed to his trustees therein named, 1000*l*. 3 per cent. reduced Bank Annuities, upon trust to pay and apply the dividends and produce thereof towards the maintenance and education of Mary Ragsdale (his niece, who afterwards intermarried with Mr. Henry Dobson) until she should attain the age of twenty-five years, and after her attaining that age, then in trust to transfer and assign the said 1000*l*. unto the said Mary Ragsdale, to the intent that she might receive the dividends and produce thereof during her natural life, and to pay over to her any accumulation that might have arisen in respect thereof; and immediately after her decease the said testator gave and bequeathed the same unto such person and persons and in such parts, shares and proportions, manner and form as she the said Mary Ragsdale, whether covert or sole, should, by her last will and testament to be by her signed and published in the presence of and attested by two or more credible witnesses, give or bequeath the same. The said Mary Ragsdale intermarried with the said Henry Dobson, and died in 1837, leaving two children her surviving; Mary, married to Andrew Forrester, and George Joshua Dobson. Mary Forrester died in the life time of her father, the said Henry Dobson.

The said Mary Dobson made her will dated 27th June, 1815, duly signed and attested in the words following. "This paper writing contains the last will and testament of me, Mary Dobson, wife of Henry Dobson, taylor, Walham-green in the parish of Fulham, in the county of Middlesex; first, I do hereby revoke all former wills, codicils and other testamentary dispositions made by me at any time heretofore, and do publish and declare this to be my last will and testament in form and manner following: I direct that after my funeral expenses the charge of proving and establishing this my will and other debts be paid, I do hereby give and bequeath to my dear and lawful husband, Henry Dobson, all the annuity left to me by my uncle John Ragsdale, and whatsoever legacy or legacies, money or other property may be due to me at any future period of time, whatsoever and by whomsoever, I do hereby give to my husband, Henry Dobson, to enjoy during his natural life, and at his decease I direct that all such property shall be equally divided between my two children, George Joshua and Mary Dobson; but in case I should have any more offspring, then I direct that they may be made equal share and share alike; and in case that either of them should die before their father, then the share or shares of such deceased shall be equally divided between the survivors; and furthermore that each child shall not diminish their respective principal or shares from their children or next of kin after them; I furthermore direct that my daughter, Mary Dobson, may have all my wearing apparel, with watch, rings, &c. I nominate, constitute, and appoint my husband, Henry Dobson, to be my sole executor to this my last will and testament."

The bill was filed by the plaintiff, Harriett Dobson, as the widow, sole executrix and legatee of Henry Dobson, deceased and she prayed that she might be declared to be entitled to the said sum of one thousand pounds Three per Cent. Reduced Bank Annuities.

Welch (in the absence of Teed, Q. C.), for plaintiff, contended that that portion of the will commencing, "And I do hereby give and bequeath to my dear and lawful husband, Henry Dobson, all the annuity left to me by my uncle, John Ragsdale, and whatsoever legacy or legacies, money, or other property may be due to me at any future period of time whatsoever, and by whomsoever, I do hereby give to my husband, Henry Dobson, to enjoy during his natural life," &c. formed two distinct sentences, and that the first, down to the words "John Ragsdale," was complete in itself, and gave the 1,000*l*. absolutely to the plaintiff; that the will must be read as a deed, and stops not regarded; and he cited Doe dem. Ellam v. Westley (4 Barn. & Cress. 667).

Romilly and Hallett, for Andrew Forrester, as administrator of his late wife.

James, for George Joshua Dobson.

Piggott and White, for executors and other parties.

His HONOUR took time to consider, and on Dec. 4, 1844, gave judgment to the effect that the will must be read as one sentence from the commencement down to the words "next of kin after them;" and that therefore George Joshua Dobson was alone entitled to the 1,000*l*. the restriction at the latter part of the will, in favour of the children while their parents were alive, being too remote. Costs, charges, and expenses of all parties between solicitor and client out of fund.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Monday, Nov. 25.
LAKE v. THE DUKE OF ARGYLE.

When persons meet to prepare measures for calling a society into existence, attendance upon such meeting, and concurrence in such measures, may be strong evidence that any individual there present held himself out as paymaster to all who executed their orders. The acts of a nobleman, in declaring his intention to become president, and reading a resolution when presiding, afford material evidence that he authorized contracts for services required by the constituent body, although the general object was a public one.

Each case must depend on its own circumstances.

Kelly, Q.C. moved on the 5th inst. for a rule to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a nonsuit entered, or for a new trial.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Kelly argued that the defendant had acted in the capacity of a nobleman in promotion of a public and philanthropic purpose, and was not, and ought not to be held, responsible for the debts incurred in the mechanism of the society, simply because he presided at some of its meetings. The duke in this case had written to the Lord Mayor expressly informing him that he was induced to aid the society because he had poor persons on his own estates to whom he wished to give the means of emigrating. It was quite clear that the plaintiff never received any order from the defendant, but the chief ground was, that this was not a mercantile speculation at all, but purely a benevolent enterprise. Cur. adv. vult.

JUDGMENT

Lord DENMAN, C.J. now gave the judgment of the Court.—In this case the question was, whether the defendant had made himself liable for certain printer's work. I was desired to direct a nonsuit, because there was said to be no evidence to shew the defendant's liability. I thought I could not nonsuit, as there was some proof of acts done by the defendant, on the effect of which the plaintiff had a right to take the jury's opinion. There was a case of Wood v. The Duke of Argyle, in the Common Pleas, where the Lord Chief Justice laid down the law, and summed up for the defendant. I adopted the same course, and laid down the law in the very words there employed; observing, there appeared strong reasons for supposing the credit was given to other persons, previously the plaintiff's customers, and not to the defendant. The jury, in the Common Pleas, in the case I have referred to, found their verdict for the defendant. In this case, the jury found for the plaintiff; and a motion has now been made for a rule to shew cause why there should not be a nonsuit or a new trial. We expressed our opinion there was no ground for a nonsuit. It appears certain persons were determined to form an emigration society, with the idea of settlement. They held some meetings, and afterwards obtained the defendant's consent to be named president of the society, involving a consent that the fact should be made public. Some meetings were held afterwards, at one of which the defendant acted as president, by that name, and signed a resolution there agreed upon, that the papers should be printed; and he had been held out as the president, and had also informed the Lord Mayor, in a correspondence respecting some sailors, that he had at one time been a proprietor, but had withdrawn from the company. On these facts, I asked the jury whether the defendant had held himself out as entitled to pay for the work? and they thought he had, and fixed him with the debt. It does not appear that the company had ever been formed according to its intended constitution; but it is proper to distinguish acts done on the execution of that object from those preliminary acts which were necessary to carry that intention into effect. It was argued, he might have no right to support the statement in a prospectus or any similar publication; that the defendant meant to be a member, or that no company was to exist until a certain capital was raised, or any other condition. But when persons meet to prepare measures for calling a society into existence, attendance upon such meeting and concurrence in such measures, may be strong evidence that any individual there present held himself out as the paymaster to all who executed their orders; and although not liable as a member or shareholder, yet his declared intention to become president, or to take shares, may be material to shew he authorized contracts with those whose services were required by what may be called the constituent body. In this case the work done by the plaintiff was obviously necessary for the objects of the society. Part of it was ordered by a resolution read by the Duke from the chair. The proof was certainly not conclusive, as the plaintiff might have been informed, or he might believe, that others were to pay, and that the duke was merely giving his name to promote the general objects of the society. The circumstances which might have led to this inference were commented upon by the summing up, and we cannot say the jury have done wrong in thinking they did not outweigh the defendant's conduct. In Wood's action against the same defendant, the claim was not precisely of the same nature; for the maps were used in the execution of the company's scheme of emigration; hence the question was properly confined to proof that it was formed, and that the defendant became a member of it. There is no difference between the two summings up, nor is it certain the same jury might not have found both verdicts. Possibly this might lead to the opinion the verdict was for too large a sum; part of the work may have been properly charged, because due on preliminary purposes, and part improperly, because it was presumed it was for the company. But this division it is not easy to make, and it ought to have been pointed out on the trial, nor is it a ground of motion; we only advert to it to prevent the supposition that the jury have found their verdict so as to infer the defendant's liability to every contract by the supposed company; the anticipation of which consequence is stated to be the main reason for his resistance to this very demand. Each case must depend upon its own circumstances, and by reference to the defendant's language and conduct. The rule, therefore, must be discharged.

REG. v. THE INHABITANTS OF CASTERTON.

Where in an order of removal the jurisdiction of the justices to make it, appears by reference to the margin alone, it suffices, for the margin is part of the order.

Baines, Q. C. (with whom was Ramsay) shewed cause against a rule for quashing an order of sessions confirming the order for the removal of a pauper from Kirkby Lonsdale to Casterton, brought up by certiorari. There were several grounds, but that on which the judgment was given, related to the statement of the jurisdiction of the justices on the face of the order.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Baines argued, that the adjudication was sufficient, inasmuch as no exact form need be adopted, and the venue in the margin may be referred to to explain the order. R. v. St. Mary's, Leicester (1 B. & Ald. 327) shews that where the words, "in the county aforesaid," can alone have reference to the county in the margin, that suffices. (R. v. Morgan, 8 Barn. & Cr. 68; R. v. Holbeck (Leeds), Burr. S. C. 197.)

Pashley, contrà, cited R. v. Toke (8 Ad. & Ell. 227); — v. Christie (11 Ad. & Ell. 373); Re Clark. (2 Q. B. 619); —— v. Wilson (1 Rol. 435); Walker v. Treby (Salk. 1410); Reg. v. O'Connor (1843); Baker v. Baker (7 Moor. 455).

Cur. adv. vult.

The COURT now gave

JUDGMENT.

Lord DENMAN, C. J. The principal question was, whether the justices making the original order of removal appear upon the face of it to have jurisdiction; or, in other words, whether they are stated with sufficient certainty to be justices of and for the county in which the removing township is situated. The order, so far as this point is concerned, is in the following form:—"Westmoreland to wit.—To the overseers of the poor in the township of Kirby Lonsdale and the overseers of the poor in the township of Casterton." It then proceeds, "unto us whose names are hereunto set, signed, and affixed, being justices in and for the said county." The rest of the order being in the usual form is not objected to. It was contended that inasmuch as the justices failed to describe themselves as being justices in and for the county of Westmoreland, they had no jurisdiction, and therefore the order cannot be supported. Various cases were cited. It was admitted, however, by the learned counsel who argued against the validity of the order, that one case was not law. We are of opinion neither of the cases is applicable. In one, the county of Wilts was in the margin, but in the body the county of Dorset was mentioned, and the justices described themselves as justices in and for the said county; and the Court held it ought to appear the justices had jurisdiction to make the order, and two counties having been mentioned, they ought to have stated of what county they were justices. It is obvious, the order in the present case is free from that uncertainty which in both instances referred to, was fatal. The question was, whether the margin is a part of the order or not, because if it be, it was contended the townships are described as being in the county of Westmoreland. Now this point seems to have been long settled. (King v. Holbeck, (Leeds,) Burr. S. C.) is thus reported: "It was objected to the order of removal that the borough of Leeds is not mentioned in the body of the order, and, therefore, does not aver the two justices had jurisdiction." Leigh, J. said, "I take it to be settled that the margin is a part of the order, and therefore a plain reference to it is sufficient," and the Court decided accordingly. We are of opinion we must so construe the present order, and therefore this rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged confirming the order of Sessions.

Wednesday, Dec. 4.

Re PARTINGTON.

(Argued Nov. 23.)

Where a party, who was in custody under certain executions, petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, obtained his interim order, but whose petition before the Court was dismissed by the Commissioner: Held, that the Commissioner has power to remand the party to his former custody. Semble, that the Court would not reverse the decision of the Commissioner as to whether the party was entitled to the benefits of the Act.

This case arose on a question of the sufficiency of a return to a habeas corpus. The facts of the case were as follow:—In 1841, Mr. Partington was taken in execution under a ca. sa. on a judgment, and while in custody, two detainers on other judgments were lodged against him. The debts altogether amounted to about 600*l*. He was not a trader. In 1822 he petitioned the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, and his property vested in his assignees for the benefit of his creditors. He, however, was remanded to custody under the executions. Some time since he petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, was discharged out of custody, and obtained his interim order of protection. It however appearing to the Commissioner that Partington was not entitled to the benefits of the Act, he refused him his final order, and directed him to be remanded to his former custody. A writ of habeas corpus having been obtained, a return was made to it that Mr. Partington was in custody under certain executions.

Peacock now appeared on the part of Mr. Partington, and contended that the return was insufficient, and that Partington was entitled to be discharged from custody. The grounds on which he moved were, first, that Partington was entitled to his discharge, having been more than twelve months in custody under the execution. Second, that the commissioner had no power to remand the insolvent, for that his power merely extended to the refusal of the first order, and if the debtor could be retaken it must be by the execution creditors, which could not be done in this case. Thirdly, that as the debtor had brought himself within the jurisdiction of the Court, there was nothing in the case to justify the commissioner in refusing the first order. The ground of that refusal had been that the debtor had no goods to assign, everything having vested in the provisional assignee under the former petition to the Insolvent Court; for this, he contended, was no ground to deprive the debtor of the benefits of 7 & 8 Vict.

JUDGMENT.

DENMAN C. J. now delivered the judgment of the Court. The prisoner was brought before us on a habeas corpus, on an affidavit made by himself on moving for a writ and for a return. The facts appear to be, that in 1841 he was committed to the Fleet in execution for non-payment of between 500*l*. and 600*l*. pursuant to a writ of this court, and also detained in execution on two other writs of ca. sa. one of which, at least, certainly issued in an action for the recovery of the debt; the first endorsed to levy 50*l*. damages, with interest, on 36*l*. 11s.; the other 80*l*. 14s. with interest, on 37*l*. 17s. In August last he petitioned the Court of Bankruptcy under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, and on that day obtained his discharge from custody, with an interim order of protection from arrest, to expire on the 27th of September. On that day he appeared for examination before the Court, and Mr. Commissioner Evans made an order, whereby, after reciting that on the examination it appeared that he had recently petitioned the Insolvent Debtors' Court, and that all his effects were thereby vested in the provisional assignee of the court, under a vesting order, and that proceedings were then pending, he refused the final order that had been given in pursuance of the statute and directed that he should be remanded to his former custody as to such of his several executions as would have remained in force, as if that said interim order had not been made. The legality of this order of removal is now the matter in question. On the part of the prisoner it is first contended, that under any circumstances his present detention is illegal; for it appears he has, on each writ, been detained more than twelve months, but that by the proviso of the 28th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. it is thereby and in general terms enacted, that no debtor shall be imprisoned on any process for more than twelve calendar months for any debt contracted before filing the petition in case the final order should be refused; and in this case the final order has been refused; but we are of opinion that this case does not fall within this proviso, which cannot be construed with reference to the preceding parts of the clause to which it is appended. Three cases are put in the commencement. First, the naming of no day for making the final order under the terms specified in the 24th section. Secondly, the adjournment of the consideration of the final order sine die; and thirdly, the refusal of the final order. This case does not fall within the two first; but as to the third the section goes on to give the commissioner a power analogous to that of the insolvent commissioner, of making an order to protect the prisoner from arrest or detention, to take effect from a time to be named in such order. The proviso is a restraint of that power, limiting the period during which the petitioner shall be liable to imprisonment during the period of twelve months. This liability is in the nature of a punishment, and is clearly prospective, and if the commissioner had found, upon consideration, any circumstances to justify him in so doing, he might have made such order, and the petitioner not have obtained his discharge within that day twelve months from the date of the order. No such order having been made, the commissioner has proceeded evidently on that ground, and on examination the prisoner's case does not bring him within the benefit of the Act, and the first order for discharge and protection issued on it; and that, therefore, by a power incidental to the jurisdiction, though not in terms given by the Act the petitioner both might and ought to be remanded to his original custody. This raises the petitioner's two remaining points. He contends first, at all events, that there was no power to remand; that he was a prisoner in execution on a judgment for a debt; that he was not a trader; that he had, therefore, a primâ facie right to petition, and that such right brought him within the jurisdiction of the Court, not generally, but as limited by the Act; that the discharge from custody under the Act was absolute under it; that there is no power to imprison by the Court except under the 27th section of the Act, in all other cases generally, saving the right of creditors to retake in execution on a judgment, when the interim order has not expired and shall not be renewed. To them, he says, his case should have been left by a court which had ceased to have any power over him as soon as the interim order had expired, and he declined to proceed any further with his case. Secondly, he contends that having brought himself, in the first instance, within the jurisdiction of the Court under the sixth section, nothing but some one of the cases specified in the 24th section would justify the commissioner from proceeding in due course for naming a day for making the final order. We are clearly of opinion against the prisoner on the first point. The discharge and interim order are founded entirely on the petition, which suffices to bring the petitioner within the jurisdiction of the Court in the first instance; but being ex parte, when the day of examination comes, he must be liable to contradiction by the commissioners, if it turns out that the allegations in it, essential to the proceedings, are untrue; as, for example, it may turn out that he is a trader, and that his debts exceed 300*l*. and in this case the petitioner would be refused his order. It is incidental to the power of deciding on this, that the Court shall have the power of remanding the petitioner; otherwise it may be made an engine of great fraud on creditors, without the means of remedying the evil. It seems the power of remand is involved in the power of discharge, as soon as it appears that the order for the discharge has improperly issued. The answer to the petitioner's first point equally applies to the second. There still remains the question whether the commissioner has rightly decided. The commissioner has decided that the case is not within the Act,—that this is a case in which he has jurisdiction to decide. He has done so, and we are not authorized to review that decision. We by no means indicate a doubt of the propriety of it—we simply express no opinion on it. It may be, there is no court competent to review, or it may be that it may be reviewed by the Chief Judge, or that by the Lord Chancellor the merits may be reviewed. It is clear we have not that power, and the petitioner therefore must be remanded.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Monday, Nov. 25.

DOE dem. CALDECOTT v. JOHNSON.

A, having a power by will to appoint certain real estate to the use of such child or children in such shares, manner, and form, and for such estates and interests therein, and subject to such payments, conditions, and limitations as he should direct, &c. by his will, without any reference to the power, devised all his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever, to certain trustees upon trust, to apply the profits, as follows: one-third part to his wife during her life or widowhood, and the other two third parts unto and for the benefit of his three children equally. There was no evidence whether A had or not any other real property upon which the devise could operate, except that which was the subject of the power:—Held, that the will of A was not, under the circumstances, an execution of the power.

Where a party seeks, by extrinsic circumstances, to give an effect to an instrument, which, upon the face of it, it would not have, it is incumbent on him to prove the circumstances though involving the proof of a negative, or, in the absence of such proof, the deed must have its natural effect and operation given to it, and no other.

At the trial of this action of ejectment before Williams, J. at the last Lent Cheshire Assizes, it appeared that one Michael Mason, of Bickley, by his will, dated 13th of June, 1778, after directing a sum of 170*l.* to be raised by mortgage of a certain messuage and premises in Nantwich, in the county of Chester (being the premises in dispute), and after devising a rent-charge of 40s. on the same premises, devised the premises in question in the following manner: —"And subject and charged as aforesaid, I give and devise my said messuage or dwelling-house, hereditaments, and premises in Nantwich aforesaid unto my son Michael Mason and his assigns for and during his natural life, and from and after his decease, to the use and behoof of all or such one or more of the child or children of my said son Michael Mason lawfully to be begotten, to commence and take effect at such times and in such shares, manner, and form, and for such estates and interests therein, and subject to such payments, conditions, and limitations as my said son Michael, by any deed or deeds, writing or writings, or by his last will and testament in writing, to be by him duly signed, executed, and published in the presence of and attested by three or more credible witnesses, shall direct, limit, appoint, will, devise, settle, or charge the same, and for want of such settlement, will, or appointment to the use of all and every the son and sons, daughter and daughters, of my said son Michael lawfully to be begotten, equally to be divided between them (if more than one) as tenants in common, and to the heirs of the body and bodies of all and every such son and sons, daughter and daughters respectively lawfully issuing."

Then followed cross remainders among the children in tail, with remainders over.

Michael Mason, of Nantwich, the son of the above testator, made his will dated March 28, 1796, and duly executed and attested by three witnesses: in which will was the following devise: "I give, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate, whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever, unto my brother, John Mason of Nantwich aforesaid, and my nephew, Thomas Caldecott, and to the survivor of them, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns upon the several trusts, and to and for the several ends, intents, and purposes hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, in trust to pay and apply the clear yearly rents and profits of my real estate in manner following, that is to say, one third part thereof unto my wife, Sarah Mason, and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, if she shall so long continue my widow, and the other two third parts thereof unto and for the benefit of my three children, Thomas, John, and Michael Mason, in equal shares and proportions, and to be paid and applied to and for their benefit and advantage, or the benefit and advantage of the survivors and survivor of them, and the issue of such of them as shall happen to die leaving issue lawfully begotten in such manner as my said trustees, or the survivor of them, shall think proper; and in case two of my said sons shall happen to die without leaving any issue lawfully begotten, then I do hereby give and devise my said real estate unto the survivor of my said three sons, his heirs, and assigns for ever."

The question was whether this last will was a good execution of the power, the lessor of the plaintiff claiming the premises in default of the power being executed.

There was no evidence at the trial whether Michael Mason, the son, had or not any other real estate on which the will could operate, except what was the subject of the action. The defendant contended that the onus of such proof rested with the party who asserted the affirmation, and that in the absence of such proof the presumption was that the testator had no other property.

A verdict was found for the defendant, with leave for the lessor of the plaintiff to move to set it aside, and enter instead a verdict for the plaintiff. A rule nisi having been obtained to that effect—

Wilde, Sir T. and Channell, Serjt. on behalf of the defendant, this term, shewed cause, citing the following authorities: Campbell v. Leach (Ambler 740); Hamilton v. Royse (2 Scho. & Lef. 332); Fitzg. 157; 2 Sug. Powers, 82, 6th ed.

Talfourd, Serjt. (E. V. Williams with him) for the lessor of the plaintiff, cases cited: Bradby v. Westcott (13 Ves. 453); Jones v. Currie (1 Swanst. 66); Doe dem. Nowell v. Roake (2 Bing. 497); same case in error (5 B. & C. 720); and in the House of Lords Denn dem. Nowell v. Roake (6 Bing. 475).

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the Court was now delivered by Tindal, C. J.—This was a motion to set aside the verdict for the defendant, and to enter a verdict for the plaintiff, pursuant to leave given for that purpose, or for a new trial. The matter of law, in reference to which, the leave given to enter the verdict had been granted, turns upon the question whether a power given by the will of Michael Mason, of Bickley, had been duly executed by the will of Michael Mason of Nantwich. In determining whether the latter of these wills, that of Michael Mason of Nantwich, is to be considered as an execution of the power created by the will of Michael Mason of Bickley, the rule which ought to guide our decision, is that laid down by the judges in the House of Lords, in the case of Denn, on the demise of Nowell v. Roake. It is there said by the Lord Chief Baron Alexander, "There are many cases upon this subject, and there is hardly any subject upon which the principles appear to have been stated with more uniformity, or acted upon with more constancy. They begin with Sir Edward Clere's case, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, to be found in the 6th Report, and are continued down to the present time; and I may venture to say, that in no instance has a power or authority been considered as executed, unless by some reference to the power or authority, or to the property which was the subject of it, or unless the provision made by the person intrusted with the power would have been ineffectual—would have had nothing to operate upon, except it were considered as an execution of such power or authority." Now, applying this principle to the present case, there is certainly no express reference in the will of Michael Mason, of Nantwich, to the power; nor if we look into the nature of the devise, does it necessarily or even naturally imply that he had the power in his contemplation in framing this will; but the contrary is rather to be inferred, the power being to appoint to his children, and the devise being to trustees for the benefit as to one third part of the property to his wife; a mode of disposition, it appears to us, quite at variance with the power—intending to shew that his intention in that devise was to deal with property of which he was the absolute owner. Neither is there any express reference to the property which is the subject of the power, or any thing upon the face of the will that would raise any necessary implication that in penning the devise he had that property in contemplation; and the devise is perfectly general, and the disposition is such as he had no right to make of the property in question. Whether the testator had any other real property upon which the devise in question could operate is a matter upon which it is admitted there was no evidence given on either side. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that if Michael Mason, of Nantwich, had no other real property than that of a house in Nantwich, so that the devise as to the real property would be wholly inoperative, unless it could operate as an execution of the power, it must be held so to operate, and that the defendant ought not to be called on to prove negatively that Michael Mason had no other property, and that it lay upon the plaintiff to prove affirmatively that he had other property upon which the devise could operate, the existence of which, in the absence of any proof, was not to be presumed; but it appears to us that where a party seeks by extrinsic circumstances to give an effect to an instrument which upon the face of it, it would not have, it is incumbent on him to prove these circumstances, though involving the proof of a negative, or that in the absence of such extrinsic proof, the deed must have its natural effect, and operation given to it, and no other. In the present case the devise purports only to operate to convey the property of the devisor to devise the property of the devisor—not that over which he has a power of appointment. In the absence of the proof of any extrinsic circumstances it cannot be construed to operate in any other way than what its terms naturally import. Upon these grounds we are of opinion that under the circumstances disclosed in this case the will of Michael Mason, of Nantwich, cannot be considered as being an execution of the power, and the consequence will be that the verdict must be entered for the plaintiff.

Rule absolute for entering a verdict for the plaintiff.

Monday, Nov. 25.

GRINNELL v. WELLS.

In an action for seducing the plaintiff's daughter, the omission of the allegation per quod servitium amisit is not cured by stating that the plaintiff's daughter is a poor person maintaining herself by her own labour, and not sufficient to maintain herself otherwise; and that the defendant debauched her, and that she was delivered of a child; stating further, as the grievance of the charge, that the plaintiff, being her father, was forced and obliged to expend certain sums of money in the maintenance of his daughter.

Sir T. Wilde, Serjt. shewed cause against a rule nisi obtained by Channell, Serjt. in Michaelmas Term last.—The declaration alleges that the daughter of the plaintiff is a poor person who maintained herself by her own labour, having no other means of support, and being under the age of twenty-one years; that the defendant debauched her, that she became pregnant, and was afterwards delivered of a child; and, being wholly unable to pay the expenses of her delivery or to maintain herself, the plaintiff, being her father, did maintain her at his house. The motion was made in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the declaration does not disclose a good cause of action. The plea on the record was—Not guilty. Before the new rules, that would have put the plaintiff upon proof of all that was requisite to support the action; but by the new rules, only the wrongful act is put in issue. All averments of a declaration not traversed must be taken to be admitted in the sense in which these allegations would be required to be proved to maintain the action. The 43 Eliz. gives power to the justices to make an order to compel the father to support his poor children. In this case, the damage resulting to the plaintiff from the wilful act of the defendant is the cause of action. The injury is not direct, so as to be the subject of an action of trespass. The declaration alleges, after setting forth the wrongful act of the defendant, that, by means of the premises, the plaintiff was forced, obliged, and at his own charge did expend a certain sum of money in the maintenance of his daughter. Here the father was clearly liable under the statute. Where, as in this case, there is a moral obligation, it is not necessary for the party on whom a legal obligation is cast to wait until it is enforced by the forms of the law. Here the father is compelled to support his sick child, owing to the wrongful act of another, and the order of the justices is not necessary in order to support this action for expenses actually incurred. The defendant should have demurred. The cause of action arises from the words in the declaration, that the plaintiff was forced and obliged and necessarily did at his own charge, maintain his daughter, and by means of the premises did expend a certain sum of money in nursing, taking care, &c. Here the declaration sets forth every fact necessary to create a legal liability under the statute.

The learned Serjeant here cited and distinguished at great length, Hall v. Hollander (4 B. & C. 660); Satterthwaite v. Dewhurst (5 East, 47, n.); Russell v. Corne (2 Lord Raym.); Rex v. Cornish (2 B. & Ad. 498); Speares v. Parker (1 T. R. 141); Rippon v. Gorton (Croke Eliz. 849); Hunt v. Wotton (Sir T. Raymond, 259).

Channell, Serjt. on the same side.

Talfourd, Serjt. contrà.—This declaration discloses no legal ground of action. There are no precedents in the books to be found corresponding with the present form of declaration. The act complained of was not a wrongful act, in a strict legal sense; it was an immoral act, and an act which subjected the parties to the censure and punishment of the ecclesiastical courts; but it was not such a wrongful act as in contemplation of law would form the foundation of an action. The action can only arise where the relation of master and servant subsists at the time of the wrongful act, and the servant is under the master's roof; or, if absent, there was an animus revertendi. Harris v. Butler (2 M. & W. 39), and Blamire v. Hayley (6 M. & W. 55) shew that the mere relation of parent and child does not give the remedy. The relation of master and servant must be laid in the declaration. The case cited from Sir T. Raymond does not affect the main principle; the wrongful act there was an act of trespass to the person of the child. Here the act is done by assenting parties. (Mortimore v. Wright, 6 M. & W.)

Tindal, C. J. delivered the judgment of the Court. The question in this case arises on a motion in arrest of judgment, and is this—whether a father can maintain an action upon the case for the seduction of his daughter when he is unable to allege in the declaration the loss of his daughter's service by reason of the defendant's wrongful act. The declaration in this case contains no allegation of the loss of the service of the daughter, but instead of which it alleges that the daughter was a poor person, maintaining herself by her own personal services, and not of sufficient ability to maintain herself otherwise; and after stating that the defendant debauched her, and that she was delivered of a child, and her thereby becoming unable to work or maintain herself, alleges, as the gravamen of the charge, that the plaintiff, he being her father, and being of sufficient ability to maintain his said daughter, was, by means of the premises, forced and obliged to, and necessarily did, at his own charge, maintain his said daughter, and in that maintenance necessarily paid large sums of money in and about the nursing of his said daughter during the time she was unable to maintain herself. And the question becomes this, whether the want of an allegation of the loss of service is supplied by the substitution of the above-recited allegation. The foundation of an action by a father to recover damages against the wrong-doer for the seduction of his daughter has been uniformly based, from the earliest times hitherto, not upon the seduction itself—not upon the wrongful act of the defendant—but on the loss of service of the daughter, in which service he is supposed to have a legal right and interest. Such is the language of Lord Holt (2 Ld. Raymond, 1032), and such is the opinion of the Court in the case of Grey v. Jeffreys (Cro. Eliz. 55), which refers to an action by a father for the personal injury to the child, and stands precisely upon the same footing as the case in Doug. 1497. It has, therefore, always been held that the loss of service must be alleged in the declaration, and loss of service must be proved at the trial, or the plaintiff must fail. It is the invasion of the legal right of the master to the services of the servant that gives him a right of action for the beating of the servant, and it is the invasion of the same legal right, and no other, that gives the father a right of action against the seducer of his daughter; so that the original act is not the cause of the action; but the consequence upon it, namely, the loss of the service, is the cause of the action. No precedent for any action for seduction has been brought before us, except those of Harris v. Butler (2 M. & W.), and Blaymire v. Haley (6 M. & W.) (in both which cases the declarations were held bad), in which there has not been an allegation of the loss of service to the father; and the struggle has been always at the trial to give some proof of actual service, or the implied relationship of master and servant. In the case of Dean v. Peel (5 East, 45), where the loss of service was alleged in the declaration, but where the proof at the trial was only this, that the daughter was in the service of another person at the time of the seduction, without any intention of returning to her father's house, but that on her seduction, she came home, and was maintained by her father. It was there held that an action was, notwithstanding, maintainable. But as that case is in evidence precisely what the present case is in pleading on the record, it appears a direct authority for the position that if there is an absence of any allegation of the loss of service to the father, although there may be an allegation of his being compelled to pay the expenses arising from the wrongful act, an action is nevertheless not maintainable. Upon the ground, therefore, set forth on this record, we do not feel ourselves warranted in giving judgment for the plaintiff, as we think the declaration discloses no real wrong to the plaintiff—no invasion or violation of his legal rights. Indeed, many observations suggest themselves against the soundness of the arguments on which the plaintiff relies. In the first place, if the liability to support the daughter under the statute of Elizabeth would form a ground of action per se, independent of any service, it would seem scarcely credible, as the statute of Elizabeth was framed long before any of the cases above referred to, that the difficulty of any proof of service, actual or implied, might not have been answered by proving, on a declaration like the present one, the legal liability of the father to maintain his daughter under the statute. In the next place, if this ground of action is allowable in a case of seduction of a daughter, it is equally so in the case of every beating of a servant, whether his services were lost or not; and upon this supposition the beating of a son, of whatever advanced age, and although altogether emancipated from his father's family, would form a ground of action at the suit of the father, if called upon under the statute to maintain his son. And still further the anomaly would follow, as the father is only liable under the statute to maintain his daughter, if he has sufficient ability so to do; and as the damages recoverable by the father when he brings an action cannot simply be limited to the actual expenditure of his money, but he may recover damages according to the aggravation of the particular case, the right of action to recover compensation would be confined to persons of ability to maintain their daughters, and would be denied to the inferior orders of the community; a result that would be most unreasonable. We therefore think, for the reasons above given, the cause of action as stated in this record is insufficient, and the rule for arresting the judgment must therefore be absolute.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Monday, Nov. 25.

MALLAN v. MAY.

In an agreement by which a party binds himself "not to carry on the business of a surgeon-dentist in London, or in any of the towns or places in England or Scotland, where another party might have been practising during a certain term, the word "London" is to be understood strictly as the city of London only, and does not include Great Russell-street, Middlesex, or any of the suburban districts not within the city.

This was a special case sent from Chancery for the opinion of this Court. The question to be decided was whether the defendant, who had entered into an agreement with Messrs. Mallan and Co. dentists, in consideration of being taken into their service, not to practice as a dentist in London, or in any of the towns or places in England or Scotland where the plaintiffs might have been practising before the expiration of the servitude, was liable to an action at law for having practised in Great Russell-st. Bloomsbury under that part of the agreement which restrained him from practising in London. The case found that the word "London," strictly speaking, meant only the city of London, but that it had also "a popular and colloquial sense," under which it applied to a much larger district, in which Great Russell-st. was included.

The case had been mentioned once or twice before, but had been sent back by the Court, as they did not conceive the question to be one upon which they were called upon to give an opinion. It was, however, again sent from Chancery.

Whateley, Q. C. for the plaintiffs, contended that the intention of the parties to the agreement was obvious, and that the word "London" ought to be construed in the sense in which it was always popularly and generally understood, and that the fact, which was found by the case, that the establishment of the plaintiffs themselves shewed distinctly that the agreement was to be so construed.

Martin, Q.C. contra, contended that the only cases in which the Courts would construe a word to mean something other than its strict legal purport were either where there was something on the face of the agreement which necessarily pointed to such an intention, or where there was evidence that in the trade or business to which the contract referred the word had some peculiar acceptations.

JUDGMENT.

POLLOCK, C.B.—In the case of Mallan v. May, which was argued a few days ago before Barons Parke, Gurney, Rolfe, and myself, we shall certify our opinion to the Vice-Chancellor that the defendant, May, is not liable to an action for damages for having carried on his profession of surgeon-dentist in Great Russell-street, under the circumstances stated in the special case. The question turns upon the construction of the articles of agreement of December 1835, by which the defendant stipulated that he would not carry on the business of a surgeon-dentist in London, or in any of the towns or places in England or Scotland, where the plaintiff might have been practising before the expiration of the term of servitude; and the point to be decided is, whether "Great Russell-street, in the county of Middlesex," be within "London?" whether it is to be understood in that sense, and whether it was intended to be so understood in that indenture? We must apply the ordinary rule of construction to this instrument, and though by so doing we may, in some instances, be misled, and defeat the real intentions of the parties, yet the adoption of such a course has established a greater degree of certainty in the administration of the law; and one of the rules of construction is, that words are to be construed according to their strict and primary acceptation, unless from the context of the instrument, and the intention of the parties to be collected from it, they appear to be of a different sense, or unless in their strict sense they are incapable of being carried into effect; and subject always to the observation, that the meaning of a particular word may be shewn by parol evidence to be different in some particular place or trade from its proper and ordinary acceptation. In applying this rule to the present case, we find nothing in the context to prevent us construing the word "London" in its proper sense—that is, the city of London. The description, "Great Russell-street, Middlesex," rather justifies the argument that London is to be understood in its proper sense, by shewing that Middlesex and London were meant to be distinguished; and although it is probable, from the nature of the contract, the instrument may have meant to exclude the defendant from practising in Middlesex, that object might just as well be accomplished by the provision "that the defendant was not to practise in any place where the plaintiff might have practised during the term," as by the Court holding that the word "London" meant to include the larger district, and, therefore, that that word included Great Russell-street.

There is no difficulty in carrying this agreement into effect by understanding the word "London" in its strict sense. There is no parol evidence of any understanding of the word in a different sense in the trade or business to which this contract relates; the statement in the case, "that London has a popular or colloquial sense, in which 'Great Russell-street' would be understood to be within it," is by no means sufficient for the purpose of leading us to a different conclusion, and to the construction that the word "London," in this instrument, is to be taken to include the larger term.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the proper sense of the word "London" is that in which it is to be construed in this instrument, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to its adoption in any other sense.

Judgment for defendant.

THE MARQUIS OF BUTE v. THOMPSON.

In this case, which was argued several terms ago, and in which judgment was delivered at the close of last term, at the request of some other party who was interested in a cause in which proceedings had been stayed to abide the event of this judgment, the Court now delivered judgment as follows:—

JUDGMENT.

POLLOCK, C. B.—In the case of the Marquis of Bute v. Thompson, which was decided some time ago, we have been asked for the reasons upon which our judgment was founded, viz. that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The foundation of the opinion of the Court is extremely short. This is an action of covenant. The defendants have expressly covenanted that "they, their executors, administrators, and assigns, or some or one of them, should and would raise and work 13,000 tons of coal in each and every year during the said term, and pay at the rate of 8d. per ton royalty for the same, or pay that amount of money, viz. 433*l*. 6s. 8d. each year, as fixed rent, whether the coals should be wrought or not; and also 9d. for each ton over and above that quantity, to whatever extent the same might be wrought." We are of opinion that this stipulation for a fixed rent, coupled with a covenant that coals should be wrought to that extent, and, if beyond it, that there should be a payment of 9d. for each ton over and above that quantity, does not carry with it, by any implication, a condition that there shall be coals to that extent capable of being wrought. It appears to us to be a stipulation on the part of the defendants, that they would work and get that, and if they did not get it, that they would pay a fixed rent for the land; and we cannot import into that covenant a condition that there should be coals to be obtained to that extent. If that was the intention of the parties, they should so have expressed it. This is the short ground upon which we are of opinion that the plaintiff, the Marquis of Bute, is entitled to the judgment of the Court.

DOE dem. WM. 4, JNO. JONES and OTHERS v. THOS. ROBERTS.

In this case, which was tried before Coleridge, J. at the last Assizes at Chester, and a verdict found for the plaintiff, Evans, Q.C. moved, at the commencement of this term, for a new trial, upon the ground of misdirection. As there appeared, at the time of the motion, to be some doubt as to how the learned judge did direct the jury, the Court deferred their judgment until he should have been consulted. He appears to have differed from the counsel as to what did pass at the trial.

JUDGMENT.

POLLOCK, C. B.—In the case of Doe, on the demise of Wm. 4, John Jones v. Thomas Roberts, which was a case of a motion for a new trial, which ultimately came to a point of misdirection—all the other points were disposed of at the time the case was moved for at the bar—there was one point reserved as to which we were to communicate to the learned judge who tried the case, and that was as to acts on the part of the defendant Roberts—as to how far those acts amounted to acts of ownership, which would be evidence of title, so as to give to the defendant the right to exclude the Crown on account of an ownership or possession for a term of sixty years.

The learned judge reports to us that he put the questions to the jury whether the Crown had the right; and if it had, was there an adverse possession for more than sixty years? He reports to us, that he left all those facts and circumstances, which were mentioned at the bar as the foundation for a new trial, as having been by the judge deemed to be immaterial—that he left to the jury to consider whether they were acts of ownership asserting a right, or whether they were acts of trespass from time to time not acquiesced in by the Crown. He so left the case to the jury, and the jury decided that they were mere acts of trespass from time to time, and not acts of ownership; and he reports also to us, that he was perfectly satisfied with that verdict; therefore, in that case, there will be no rule.

Rule refused.

KING v. HOAR.

It is a good plea to an action ex contractu against one of several joint contractors, that a judgment has been already recovered against another of them.

Assumpsit.

Plea.—That the promises were made by the defendant jointly with others, and that judgment had been already recovered against one of the others by the plaintiff for the same identical cause of action. Verification.

Demurrer.

J. Henderson, for plaintiff.—The rule is laid down broadly, and without any qualifications in Com. Dig. tit. Action, that a recovery against one obligor of a bond will not bar an action against another. In support of that conclusion the case of Hooton v. Brown is cited from the Reports and from Yelverton, and the learned commentator seems to have come to the conclusion that the same rule was applicable to all contracts, whether under seal or not. Considering the question rather with reference to the rules of pleading than to decided cases, I will point your lordship's attention to the fact that for every purpose, except for one of form, that is for pleading in abatement, the joint debt is due from either or all of the joint debtors. (5 Coke, 118; Price v. Shute, 5 Burr. 2611.) So strictly have the Court held that a debt due from one jointly with another is due from each of them, that they have discouraged pleas in abatement in every way.

Parke, B.—Your argument would go to shew that it is for every purpose a several as well as a joint debt, and that every joint debt is so.

Henderson.—Except for purposes of form, which must be taken advantage of by plea in abatement, I apprehend it is so. Not only has the objection been reduced to one in abatement, but every restraint has been put upon its being taken in that form. A plaintiff is almost tempted by the Court to commence his action against one only. The law says to the debtors, You both owe the money. If one of you is sued alone, he may assert his right to have the other sued with him; but he must do so in a particular manner, otherwise each may be sued severally.

Alderson, B.—How could the defendant plead in abatement here? It is quite clear that he could not give a better writ. Before the judgment the present defendant might have given a better writ, but he cannot do so now.

Henderson.—My argument is, that whether there would have been a good answer to a plea in abatement or not does not matter now. What might have happened had such a course been taken is immaterial now.

Parke, B.—I think it very material. If it would be no answer to the plea in abatement you might go on against both—that is, against the one against whom you already have a judgment. If, on the other hand, it is an answer, you, by the course you have pursued, have taken away the power of pleading in abatement from the present defendant.

Henderson.—There is an American case decided by Marshall, C. J. which is precisely in point, and in my favour, Shaw v. Mandeville (1 Cranch (American) Reports, 253).

Parke, B.—We have a very great respect for any decision of Marshall, C. J. who was a very learned person, but the only authority cited there, and upon which the decision is founded, appears to be the one from Yelverton which you have cited, and in which there seems to be some doubt whether the obligation was not several as well as joint.

Alderson, B.—You may either have one suit against one, or one against both; but why should you have two actions? That is against the principle of the obligation.

Henderson.—At all events, this objection ought to have been taken by plea in abatement. Upon this point Mainwaring v. Newman (2 B. & P. 120) will be probably cited against me.

Parke, B.—How could the defendant have given a better writ?

Henderson.—A better writ does not mean an action which will lie. The plea ought also, as it contains matter of record to have concluded with hoc paratus est verificare per recordum. Upon all these grounds, I submit that the plea is bad.

Bramwell, contra.—The plea is good, both in substance and in form. My friend has made two admissions, which put him out of Court. He says the judgment would not have been an answer to a plea in abatement. He also admits that this plea would have been good if the action had been against both. Therefore there was a time when there was a complete answer to this action. But the other party may now be out of the country or dead, so that we cannot plead in abatement, 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 42, s. 10. (Drake v. Mitchell, 3 East, 251.) With respect to Com. Dig. it is very true that it is there laid down that judgment without execution is no bar, but the contrary appears upon the very next page, and it is quite clear that it is a joint and several obligation which is there pointed to, (Com. Dig. tit. Action, K. 4 & L. 4, Croke, Charles, 551; Scaton v. Henson, Levinz, 220; 8 Coke Rep. 136, a.) As to the last objection, there are several other averments in the plea, which are not matter of record, and it would have been necessary to have tendered a verification of them by record.

JUDGMENT.

Parke, B.—The plea, in this case, which was an action of debt, states "that the contract in the declaration mentioned, was made by the plaintiff with Smith and the defendant jointly, and not with the defendant alone; and that in the year 1843 the plaintiff recovered judgment against Smith for the same debt, and costs, as appears by the record made in the Queen's Bench, which judgment still remains in force." The case was argued a few days ago before myself and my brothers Gurney and Rolfe. To this plea there is a demurrer assigning several special causes. First, that it was a plea in abatement, and was not properly pleaded; to which the answer is, that the plea is not, and we think that is right, and that it is clearly a plea in bar. Secondly, that it amounts to the general issue—it admits a debt to have been originally due. Third, that it does not aver the debt was due from the defendant and Smith severally as well as jointly; to which it was properly answered that the plea sufficiently shews the identical contract, and it cannot be by the same contract joint and separate. And, lastly, they say that the plea ought to have concluded with a verification to the record. The Court have intimated their opinion that where a plea contains matter of record only, it is sufficient, but it is not proper where there is an averment of matters of record mixed with averments of matters of fact on which an issue on matters of fact can be taken; but the matter of record is the only matter put in issue by the plea; that the judgment was recovered for another cause that ought to be duly assigned. The matters of form being disposed of, the question is one of substance—whether a judgment recovered in an action against one of two joint contractors is a bar against another? It is remarkable that this question should never have been actually decided in the courts of this country; there have been apparently conflicting dicta upon it. Lord Tenterden, in Walters v. Smith (2 Barn. & Ad. 889), is reported to have said, "The mere recovery against one will not do." In a case in 1 Cromp. & Mees. Mr. Justice Bayley strongly intimates the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, "that a judgment against one was a bar against both of two joint debtors." In the absence of any positive authority upon the precise question before us, we must decide it upon principle, and by analogy to other authorities; and we feel no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the plea is good. If a breach of a contract or any wrong is done by another, and judgment recovered in a Court of Record, that judgment is a bar to an original cause of action, because it is thereby reduced to a certainty, and the object of the suit obtained, so far as it can be in that state; and it is useless and vexatious to subject the defendant to another suit to obtain the same result. And this appears to be equally true where there is but one cause of action, whether it be against one single person or many; the nature of the Court of Record changes the cause of action; it cannot afterwards be divided into two. Thus it has been held that where two commit a joint tort, the judgment against one is of itself, without execution, a sufficient bar.—See Calvert 67, and the same case in Croke, James, and in Moore's Reports, 62; and though in Yelverton, dubious expressions are used, yet, from a comparison of all the Reports, it seems clear that the judgment there was not that of damages. Chief Justice Popham says this, "that damages are certain (that is, converted into certainty by the judgment), although if he be not satisfied he shall not have a new action for the trespass," &c. Those are the words of Chief Justice Popham; and it is clear that the Chief Justice was referring to debt and occupation, both by the arguments of the counsel in that case, in which he refers to the two præcipes, and also by the same case in Young. We do not think the case of a joint contract can in this respect be distinguished from a joint tort; the party injured may sue all the parties to the tort, or the contractors. I sue you, subject to a right of plea in abatement in the one case, and not in the other. But for the purpose of this decision they stand on the same footing, whether the judgment be against one or two; it is for the same cause of action. The distinction between the case of a joint contract and a joint and several contract is quite clear. It is argued that each party to a joint contract is severally liable, and so he is in one sense; if he be sued severally, and do not plead in abatement, he is liable, but he is not severally liable in the way in which he is upon a joint and several bond—in that case the several bonds of each of the obligors give several different remedies to the obligee. Another mode of considering this case is, with reference to the case of Lechmere v. Fletcher, which was much discussed during the argument, and it leads us to the same conclusion. If there be a judgment against one of two joint contractors, and the other be sued afterwards, can he plead in abatement or not? If he cannot, he would be deprived of the right of one plaintiff to obtain judgment from the other: if he can, then he may plead in bar a judgment against himself; and if that is not in bar, the plaintiff might go on to obtain judgment against the co-contractors, or the plaintiff might obtain another judgment against the co-contractors, and so have two separate judgments for the same fact; for then the case would conform to the general rule that an action for a joint debt brought against one operates as a bar altogether. The only exception to that in the cases is where you plead a general discharge; it is quite clear, indeed, and hardly disputed, that if there were a plea in abatement both must be joined, and if they were joined, judgment pleaded by one would be a bar to both; and it is impossible to hold that the legal effect of a judgment against one should be that the one against whom the judgment is not obtained can be sued jointly, and not pleaded in abatement. During the argument, the decision of Chief Justice Merivale, of the United States, was cited. The case is that of Shaw v. Manderille (6 Hutchard's Reports, 263). We need not state that we have every respect for the decisions of that learned judge, but we are not satisfied with the reasoning attributed to him in the report of that case. For these reasons we are of opinion our judgment must be for the defendant.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

Tuesday, Nov. 26.

On error from the Court of Queen's Bench.

(Before Tindal, C. J.; Parke, Alderson, and Rolfe, Barons; and Maule and Erle, Justices,)

Reg. on the prosecution of George Wray, clerk. v. The Governors of the Darlington Free Grammar School.

Construction of charter—Office of schoolmaster—Validity of bye-law—Judgment on mandamus.

To a mandamus by the upper master of a grammar school to the governors to restore him to his office, the return set forth the charter of foundation, by which the governors were empowered to appoint and remove the master, "according to their sound discretion," and of appointing other in his stead. The return then alleged specific instances of misconduct in the prosecutor, who being called on to answer, and having a reasonable opportunity, and failing to do so, was, in the exercise of their best discretion, and they deeming him an unfit person, removed him from his office. The pleas severally traversed the alleged instances of misconduct, and set forth a power given by the charter to the governors, with the assent of the Earl of Westmoreland and the Bishop of Durham for the time being to make bye-laws for the government of the master, &c. and that by a bye-law of 1748, made by the governors, with the assent of the Bishop of Durham (the title of Earl of Westmoreland being then extinct), no master should be removed, unless a sufficient cause of complaint was made in writing against him, and allowed to be sufficient. The plea then averred that no such sufficient cause was made in writing against the prosecutor before his removal, and allowed as sufficient. On this allegation, as on the traverses of misconduct, issues were joined, and all the findings were in favour of the prosecutor. Held, that the defendants were entitled to judgment non obstante veredicto,

1. That the office of upper master at the school was not a freehold, but held ad libitum only, and as such that he was removeable without summons or hearing.
2. That as the return contained an express allegation that the governors, in the exercise of their best discretion, and deeming him unfit, did remove the prosecutor, which was not traversed; the issues raised were immaterial, and the return was substantially good.
3. That the bye-law was invalid, as restraining and limiting the powers originally conferred on the governors.
4. That the defendants were entitled to judgment under the statute of Anne, as the prosecutor had taken immaterial issues, and there was a substantially good return.

Whether judgment can be given for a defendant, non obstante veredicto in ordinary actions, quære? Whether the bye-law was valid, having been made after the extinction of the title of the Earl of Westmoreland, quære?

In this case a mandamus had been issued at the instance of the prosecutor to the governors of the Free Grammar School of Queen Elizabeth, within the town or village of Durham-Darlington, in the county palatine of Durham, which recited that George Wray, clerk, was duly qualified for, and duly elected, nominated, &c. and admitted to be upper master, or pedagogue of the said grammar school, established under letters patent of Queen Elizabeth, for the education of youth, in which said office the said George Wray had always behaved himself well, and according to the statutes made for the government of the upper master of such school; and that the governors of the said school, without any reasonable cause and contrary to the said letters patent and statutes, unjustly removed the said George Wray from the said office. The writ, therefore, commanded the said governors to restore him to the said office, with all the privileges, &c. thereunto belonging.

The return set forth the letters patent by which the four wardens of Darlington for the time being were constituted governors of the school, and were incorporated accordingly, and were to have full power of appointing a master, and of removing him according to their sound discretion, and of appointing other more fit in his stead.

The return then stated that Wray was appointed upper master, and did not behave himself well; but, 1, neglected to attend at the school during school-hours; 2, under colour of his office did inflict unreasonable severe corporal punishment on one Thomas Smith; 3, that on various occasions he exacted sums of money from William and Thomas Smith; and, 4, on various other occasions he attempted to exact other sums from Mary Smith, their parent, whereupon the governors having given notice of the same complaints to Wray, and having called upon him to answer the same, and he having had reasonable opportunity, but having, notwithstanding, failed so to do, and they being satisfied of the truth of the complaints, and that Wray was guilty of the misconduct so charged, in the exercise of their best discretion, and deeming him an improper person to fill the said office, did remove him from the said office, as it was lawful and right to do for the cause aforesaid.

The four first pleas severally traversed the alleged instances of misconduct, and the fifth plea stated that prior to his removal he was not allowed reasonable time or opportunity to answer. The sixth plea stated, that by the letters patent, Queen Elizabeth appointed that the governors and their successors, with the assent of the Earl of Westmoreland and Bishop of Durham for the time being, from time to time should make good statutes concerning the government of the master, &c. of the said school, which should be inviolably observed, and that in 1748 a by-law was made reciting that no statutes had been made by the governors, whereby frequent divisions had arisen about the placing and displacing of masters; therefore the governors, with the assent of the Bishop of Durham (the title of the Earl of Westmoreland being at that time extinct) did ordain several salutary statutes for the governing of the upper master, &c. viz. that he should be of the age of twenty-four, of sound learning, of sober and exemplary life, &c.; and for the further encouragement of persons of known abilities and sound learning, &c. to accept of the duty of upper master, they did declare that no such master, in the actual exercise of the said office, should at any time thereafter be removed from the said office, unless some sufficient cause of complaint should be exhibited in writing against him, and signed by them or their successors, and the same cause be first allowed to be a sufficient cause to remove such master, and not otherwise; and although the statutes at the time of the removal of Wray were in full force, and although he had been duly appointed, &c. and at the time of his removal was in actual exercise of the office, yet no sufficient cause of complaint being the same cause exhibited in writing against him, and signed by the governors for the time being, was before his removal, declared to be a sufficient cause to remove Wray from his office according to the said statutes.

The replication, after protesting against the sufficiency of the plea in law, restated the instances of Wray's misconduct before his removal, and proceeded that they, the governors, having had notice of the complaints, and before the removal of Wray, exhibited a complaint in writing signed by them, setting forth the said causes of complaint, and caused the same to be delivered to Wray, each of which was sufficient cause for removing him, and that he having failed to answer the said charges, although he had reasonable time and opportunity so to do, afterwards and before his removal, did declare the said causes of complaint sufficient causes to remove him, and did remove him from his said office as in the return alleged, and as it was lawful and right to do.

Rejoinder—That no complaint in writing, signed by the governors, and setting forth sufficient causes of complaint was delivered to Wray, and that the governors did not, before the removal, declare the same causes of complaint sufficient to remove him as in the replication mentioned. The record then set out the findings of the jury, which were in favour of the prosecutor on all the issues, and the judgment, which was as follows:—"Because it appears to the said Court here that the plea of the said George Wray, by him lastly pleaded to the aforesaid return of the Governors of the Free Grammar School aforesaid to the said writ of mandamus, are bad and insufficient in law to entitle the said George Wray to a peremptory writ of mandamus in this behalf; therefore it is considered and adjudged that notwithstanding the verdict found for the said George Wray on the several issues above joined as aforesaid: yet that no peremptory writ of mandamus do issue in this behalf, and that the governors, &c. do recover against the said George Wray 138*l.* 10s. 9d. for their costs and charges," &c.

Upon this judgment error was assigned that the judgment ought to have been given for Wray.

The causes of error stated by the plaintiff were—

1. That Mr. Wray was entitled to judgment on the single finding of the jury that he was not prior to his removal allowed reasonable time and opportunity to answer the complaint and charges.

2. That the defendants having stated the actual grounds of the removal, and those grounds having been negatived by the jury, the removal is shewn not to have been according to sound discretion.

3. That even if the issues on the traversed allegations of the return are all immaterial, still the bye-law is valid, and not having been complied with, Mr. Wray is entitled to judgment.

4. That judgment non obstante veredicto could not be given for the defendants.

5. That if all the issues joined were immaterial, the Court was bound to award a repleader.

Pashley (Hugh Hill with him) appeared for the plaintiff in error.

Wortley and Addison, contrà.

This case had been part heard previously, but as the Court was differently constituted on the former occasion, Tindal, C. J. called on Pashley to restate his argument.

Pashley referred to the Law Journal, vol. 21, p. 124, as containing the report of the case in the Court below, and proceeded to state the substance of the return and pleadings. 1. The jury have negatived the causes assigned by the governors in their return for the removal of the prosecutor, and therefore he is entitled to the judgment of the Court. The governors do not justify the amotion by the exercise of their discretion, but they assign specific reasons for their conduct, which now appear not to have been justifiable. After stating the various causes of complaint against Mr. Wray, they say that they "thereupon having given notice of the same to him, and having called upon him to answer the same, and he having had reasonable time and opportunity in that behalf, but having nevertheless failed so to do, and they being satisfied of the truth of the complaints, and that Wray was guilty of the said several offences and misconduct, in the exercise of their best discretion, and deeming him to be an unfit person to fill the said office did remove him for the cause aforesaid." The governors, therefore, have stated to the Court, as the ground of their amotion, that the prosecutor did not answer after notice of the charges. Such conduct might amount to a disrespect sufficient to justify the governors in removing him; but the allegation has been negatived by the jury in fact. [Tindal, C. J.—Suppose they had said they had exercised a sound discretion? Parke, B.—They have returned that and other matters.] They have not stated the exercise of their discretion to have been made on his fitness or unfitness for office; but on certain facts, on which it appears to the Court, by the judgments on the findings, that they were mistaken. [Tindal, C. J.—They have said that he is guilty of the offences, "and deeming him an unfit person" they removed him. The latter part is sufficient: utile per inutile non vitiatur.] Then, 2ndly, the bye-law is valid, and the prosecutor entitled to judgment, as its requisites have not been complied with. It would be a good bye-law under the charter, notwithstanding the extinction of the title of the Earldom of Westmoreland, (a) and, 2ndly, if it be gone under the charter, it is incident to any corporation by the common law. As the decision of the Court on the second point in favour of the bye-law will render the first unnecessary, that point may at present be left. It is good, as being a mere regulation of the mode of exercising an admitted power, and this is a reasonable regulation. It was justly stated by Lord Denman, when trying this case at Nisi Prius, to be a "bye-law of a very judicious character," to require the reasons of complaint and amotion to be in writing. In Wagoner's case (8 Co. 1), the qualities of a bye law are enumerated, which quite comprehend the present. It should be "bonæ fidei consonum, rationi consonum pro utilitate civium et aliorum, utile Regi et populo." It is a reasonable regulation to require a minute in writing, which gives due information to all parties interested, and avoids mistake. It tends to prevent fraud. This bye-law does not require any Act to be done by any other power; the corporation may do all it renders necessary. Many things may be done by a corporation without their corporate seal—such as hiring a servant, &c.—yet it would be very reasonable to have a minute in such cases. Surely such an important matter as the appointment or the removal of the upper master of this school, should not be transacted without at least a minute in writing. The bye-law does not profess to limit the amount of the discretion of the governors; it only requires certain reasonable accompaniments in its exercise. The judgment below is founded on an error in this respect, in supposing the discretion to be limited and controlled, when it is in truth only regulated. Suppose a minute-book had been ordered to be kept of acts done at each meeting, surely such regulation would be good; and this, in effect, is nothing more. In the Mayor of Ludlow v. Charlton (6 M. & W. 815), Rolfe, B. giving the judgment of the Court, vindicated the utility of the principle at common law of requiring contracts by corporations to be under their seal; and in Arnold v. Mayor of Poole (4 Mann. & Grang.; 5 Scott's New Rep. 741), the Court of Common Pleas adopted the views of the Court of Exchequer, Tindal, C.J. saying—"Several instances were pointed out, in which it has been held, that corporations aggregate, having a head, may by parol appoint servants for the performance of certain acts in their behalf. But the acts which may be so done have been always considered as exceptions out of the general rule of law, and relate either to trivial matters of frequent occurrence, or such as from their nature do not admit of delay." So sensible have the Legislature been of the advantages of minutes in writing, that they have frequently required them, as in the well known instances of the Statute of Frauds, and Lord Tenterden's Act, 9 Geo. 4, c. 14. A corporation, indeed, constituted as this is, ought not to act by parol. In Bonham's case (8 Co. 120, at 5th resol.) it is laid down, that "Forasmuch as the censors had their authority by the letters patent and Act of Parliament, which are high matters of record, their proceedings ought not to be by parol." The bye-law, therefore, only pursues the common law, and demands what is reasonable. It was clearly within the scope of the authority of the governors, as being merely a regulation of the power conferred on them by the charter. In Green v. Mayor of Durham (1 Burr. 127), a bye-law by the corporation of Durham, requiring all persons before their admission to freedom to appear at three corporation meetings at the Guildhall, was held good, as not being a restraint of trade, but a reasonable regulation to prevent persons being unduly made free. In Pearce v. Bartram (Cowp. 269), a bye-law of the corporation of Exeter was held good, forbidding the slaughter of any beast within the walls of the city; such a law merely being a regulation of trade. So in Wannall v. The City of London (1 Stra. 675), a bye-law requiring all joiners to be free of the Joiners' Company was held good; the Court saying, "It was only a regulation of trade, and did not take away his right to his freedom, but only his election of what company he should be free; it was only to direct him to go to the proper company." So here the bye-law does not take away the power to remove; it only regulates it, and makes it a deliberate act of the governing body. In Harrison v. Goodman (1 Burr. 12), a similar bye-law was held good. Pashley also referred to Player v. Vere (Sir T. Ray. 290, 328); Rex v. Company of Surgeons (2 Burr. 892), where a bye-law was held good, which required the students in the art of surgery (before being apprenticed to a surgeon) to understand Latin Com. Dig. Bye-law, B. 2, and Rex v. Westwood (7 Bing. 1), within the principle of which latter great case the present bye-law was quite included. Then, secondly, according to the general principle of law, the prosecutor was entitled to reasonable notice. (Rex v. Gaskin (8 T. R. 209.) [Wortley.—Notice is admitted on the record: the only issues taken are on opportunity and time.] The finding of the jury is, that he had not, before his removal, reasonable opportunity to answer the charges, and that a complaint in writing was not delivered to him. On that issue the prosecutor is entitled to judgment, according to Bagg's case (11 Co. 99 b.), when it was resolved that "it appears by the return that the corporation have proceeded against him without hearing him answer to what was objected, or that he was not reasonably warned, and such removal is void, and shall not bind the party, as it is against justice and right." The answer suggested is, that this is not a freehold office. [Parke, B.—My servant has no freehold. To be turned away "at the discretion" of another is not a freehold. Alderson, B.—What is the difference between "discretion" and "sound discretion?"] Lord Coke thus defines discretion:—"Discretio est discernere per legem quid sit justum" (4 Inst. 41); and in Rooke's case (5 Co. 100 a), it was resolved, that although the commissions of sewers give authority to the commissioners to do according to their discretion, yet their proceedings ought to be bound within the rule of reason and law. For discretion is a science to discern between wrong and right, &c. and not to do according to their private wills and affections. [Maule, J.—Surrendering at discretion gives the captive no rights. Parke, B.—The question is, whether, if they think proper to remove, they may not do so? Tindal, C.J.—Bagg's case applies only to a freehold office, or an inheritance in lands.] The record merely states that Wray was appointed to the office. The governors cannot act without any reason—only at their will and pleasure. Bracton thus defines a freehold (207 a, b. 4, c. 28):—"Item, ut liberum tenementum, sicut ad vitam tantum, vel eodem modo ad tempus indeterminatum, absque aliquâ certi temporis præfinitione; donec quid fiat vel non fiat, ut si dicatur, de tali donec ei providæo. Liberum non potest dici tenementum alicujus, quod quis tenet ad voluntatem dominorum precario, quod tempestive et intempestive poterit revocari, sicut de anno in annum et de die in diem." [Parke, B.—What estate have I in an office so long as I merely hold it at the sound discretion of another?] It is within Bracton's definition of a freehold. [Tindal, C. J.—Those were cases of land. Parke, B.—Could the words used have been stronger, if it had been intended to give the power to remove when they like? Tindal, C.J.—What difference is there between will and discretion?] They can only exercise it when extrinsic circumstances call for and justify it. In Capel v. Child (2 C. & J. 558), a requisition by the bishop to a vicar was held void, from which it did not appear that the party charged with misconduct had had an opportunity of being heard, and it was also decided that the requisition ought to state particular instances of negligence, and shew how the incumbent was negligent. Pashley referred especially to the elaborate judgment of Lord Lyndhurst (571 to 577): R. v. Wilson (3 Ad. & Ell. 817), is to the same effect. [Alderson, B.—Suppose the governors had returned that they removed the prosecutor because they had found a more fit man, whom they had appointed; would it be reasonable to send such a case to the jury?] The return here suggests no such case; it does not even profess to ground itself on the exercise of sound discretion by the governors, but states that they removed Wray for the cause aforesaid, viz. that he did not answer the complaint within a time which the jury have found not to have been a reasonable one. According, therefore, to the rules of natural justice, to the principles of law, and the authorities before cited, the prosecutor is entitled to judgment on this finding. Nor was he bound to traverse the general allegation that he had not conducted himself properly. (Newman v. Bailey, 2 Chitty Rep.; Jansen v. Stuart, 1 T. R. 748; Hickinbotham v. Leach, 10 M. & W. 361; and the recent case of Burgess v. Beaumont, in the Common Pleas.) Specific instances of misconduct must be stated; and he was equally free from any obligation to traverse the exercise of sound discretion. Several cases had been cited on the other side(a) which were distinguishable; Rex v. Mayor and Corporation of Andover (1 Lord Ray. 710), where a return was made, that by the charter they might remove per discretiones suas toties et quoties quandocunque illis placuerit, and that they removed by their discretion. It was objected that they ought to have shewn some reason why they removed; but it was held a good return. There, however, an express distinction was drawn in the charter itself between "discretion" and "will,"—discretiones suas et quandocunque placuerit. In Rex v. Bishop of Gloucester (2 B. & Ad.) a mandamus was refused, calling on the Bishop to admit a person to the office of deputy-registrar of that diocese. The bishop had refused to appoint him, saying he "had good and sufficient reasons," but would not assign them. In that case, however, there could be no mandamus—as it was only granted in ordine ad, never to command a particular thing, e. g. to confirm an order. In 4 Comyn Dig. Franchise, f. 32, it was distinctly laid down that "generally an officer cannot be removed without cause." But that position, it was said on the other side, was grounded avowedly on a case in Dyer, 332, b. Middleton's case, which by no means warranted it. [Wortley said, that there the officer was under the Crown, the marginal note of C. J. Treby saying, that, "being an officer of the King, as the bailiff is, he cannot be removed without cause."] This is an office under the Crown, as Wray is appointed by virtue of the charter emanating from the Crown. In Rex v. Mersham (7 East 171), it is expressly laid down that an office must be derived either immediately or mediately from the Crown. (Ridgway v. Hungerford Market Company (3 Ad. & El. 171); Baillie v. Kell (4 N. C. 638); and Cassons v. Skinner (11 M. & W. 161), only shewed that a master in justification of his discharge of a servant may assign one cause at the time, and afterwards rely on another cause which really existed at that time. Wilkinson v. Malin (2 C. & J. 636), shews that Wray was not a mere servant. Lord Lyndhurst describes the appointment of a schoolmaster by trustees of funds for building a schoolhouse and educating poor children, as a trust of a public nature. The return throughout treats him as an officer, and as such he was, by justice and law, entitled to notice, whether his office was freehold or not. 3. But then judgment non obstante veredicto cannot be given for a defendant. No such instance can be found, says Tindal, C. J. in delivering the judgment of the Court in Rand v. Vaughan (1 Bing. N. C. 769). As the judgment of the Court rendered it unnecessary to decide this point, as well as the effect of the extinction of the Earl of Westmoreland's title, we shall merely state that Pashley referred to Tidd, 1141, 2 Roll, 99 D., Coke's En. 42, 152, 677; 8 Co. Rep. 120 b; Blackamoors' Case (8 Co. 156 a, 163 a); Gwynne v. Burrell (4 Bing. N. C.); Jenkins' Case (99 Yelv. 169); and Wortley, contrà, to 1 Plowden, 56 (b).

(a) It had been contended, in the Court below, that this extinction, being of an integral part of the body to make the law, had caused a cesser of the power. Both the judgment below and in this Court made it unnecessary to determine this point. See L. J. v. 21, p. 126.

The COURT said they would consider till the next day whether they should think it necessary to hear Wortley, and on the following morning the judgment was delivered.

JUDGMENT.

TINDAL, C. J.—In the case of the Queen against the Governors of Darlington School, the first and principal ground of objection taken by the plaintiff in error against the validity of the judgment given by the court below is this, that the return to the writ of mandamus, when taken in connection with the findings of the jury set out upon the record, furnishes no legal ground for the removal of the plaintiff from his office of schoolmaster, and, consequently, that the judgment of the court below ought to have been given for the Crown. The plaintiff in error contends that, upon the proper construction of the letters patent of Elizabeth the schoolmaster was appointed during good behaviour at least, so that he had in contemplation of law a freehold in his office; and that upon the authority of Bagg's case, Dr. Gascoyne's case, and others which were cited by him, the plaintiff could not be legally amoved without being summoned to answer the charge, nor without having a reasonable time to answer, nor, lastly, without proof of the truth of the charges brought against him,—all which necessary steps are found by the jury not to have existed in this case. And if this is the true construction of the charter of foundation, if the office of schoolmaster resembled that of a freeman of a borough, which was Bagg's case (who according to the report in Lord Coke, had a freehold for his life in his freehold, and in others, in their political capacity, an inheritance in the lands of the corporation), or if the office of schoolmaster resembled that of a parish clerk, which was the subject of discussion in Dr. Gascoyne's case, the inference drawn from those cases would be correct; but, looking at the terms of the letters patent of Queen Elizabeth, we think the office in question is, in its original creation, determinable at the sound discretion of the governors, whenever such sound discretion is expressed, and that it is in all its legal requirements and consequences not a freehold but an office ad libitum only. The governors would be guilty of misconduct, and might, perhaps, render themselves liable to a criminal prosecution, if they exercised their discretion of removal in an oppressive manner, or from any corrupt or interested motives; but we see nothing that is to restrain them from exercising such discretionary power whenever they honestly think it proper so to do. The letters patent, after incorporating the governors, expressly give them the power of nominating from time to time a master of the said school so often as to them or their successors, or the major part of them, occasion moving them thereto, should appear, and of removing the same master from the said school according to their sound discretion, and of placing or appointing another more fitting in his stead. The founder had an undoubted right to repose this large confidence in the governors, if the Crown thought proper to sanction it, and he appears to have intended so to do without subjecting the exercise of this discretion either to the judgment of any vestry or of any jury, and if the master was appointed ad libitum, as we think he was, it is clear he was removeable without any summons or hearing. See Levintz. 291, and Rex v. Mayor of Stratford-on Avon. There seems nothing unreasonable in the founder giving such authority to the governors, for there may be many cases which render a man altogether unfit to continue to be a schoolmaster, which cannot be made the subject of a charge before a jury or otherwise, or one of actual proof. A general want of reputation in the neighbourhood, the very suspicion that he has been guilty of the offence stated against him in the return, the common belief of the truth of the charges among the neighbours, would ruin the well-being of the school, if the master was continued in it, although the charge itself might be untrue, and, at all events, the proof of the facts themselves insufficient before the jury. There are many other grounds of amoval fully sufficient which, in the exercise of a sound discretion, might be suggested. Such therefore appearing to us to be the meaning of the letters patent, and there being an express allegation in the return that the governors did, in the exercise of their best discretion, and deeming the plaintiff to be an unfit and improper person to fill the said office of master, displace and amove him therefrom, which allegation is not traversed or denied in the plea, we think the several issues raised were altogether upon immaterial points, and that, notwithstanding the finding of the jury upon those issues, the return is virtually and substantially a good return. It was, in the second place, argued by the plaintiff in error, that, however the case might have stood upon the original letters patent, yet, that as the governors had, in fact, passed a bye-law regulating the mode of appointment to the office of master of the grammar school, and of displacing him from that office—as the jury have found that the requisites prescribed by such bye-law to be observed before the master could be displaced, have not been complied with in this instance—therefore at all events, the plaintiff was entitled to his peremptory mandamus; but we think the governors for the time being had no authority under the letters patent to make such a bye-law, so as to bind their successors in the execution of their duty. Nothing can be better established than that a bye-law by a corporation which alters the constitution of the corporation is void; and, upon the same principle, a bye-law which restrains and limits the powers originally given to the governors by the founder himself we think must be bad. Here the governors had the power given them by the founder of removing the master from the said school, according to their sound discretion, and of placing and appointing another more fit in his place; and we think this power is manifestly impaired and diminished in a degree that may be materially detrimental to its exercise for the interest of the school, by introducing, two centuries afterwards, the necessity of exhibiting a complaint in writing against the master signed by the governors, and the further necessity that the same cause of complaint should be first allowed, and declared by the governors a sufficient cause for displacing the said master; and we therefore think the second ground of objection taken, namely, that by reason of the requisites of the bye-law having not been complied with, the return to the mandamus must be held a bad return, altogether fails. The last ground of objection is, that the judgment of the Court below is bad in law, inasmuch as it is a judgment for the defendant non obstante veredicto, which it is contended is not good in law in favour of a defendant. In order to ascertain the validity of that objection, we must look at the statute of Anne, which is made to apply to the present case by the statute of 1 Wm. 4, c. 21, s. 3; for the proceedings upon a mandamus are first gi[illegible] letter cannot be read Anne, and are the creatures of th[illegible] each of the counts section of that statute provides, first[illegible] G. B. Coutts person suing for such a writ, and the ne[illegible] and style of J. a person making the return. It autho[illegible] in fact, suing the writ to plead to or traverse all or [illegible] and material facts contained within the return[illegible] provides that, in case a verdict shall be found [illegible] person suing such writ, or judgment given for him [illegible] a demurrer, or by nil dicit, or for want of a replication or other pleading, he shall recover his damages and costs in such manner as he might have done in an action on the case for a false return; and that a peremptory writ of mandamus shall be granted without delay for him for whom judgment might have been given, which might have been done if such return had been adjudged insufficient. The clause next provides for the person making the return; and it adds, that in case judgment shall be given for him, he shall recover his costs of the suit. The statute, therefore, evidently contemplates that judgment must be given for one or the other. In the present case, we have already expressed our opinion that the plaintiff has taken his issues, not upon the material facts contained within the return, but on facts that are altogether immaterial, and by reason thereof we think he is not entitled to a judgment upon a verdict found for him upon such issues, nor to a peremptory writ of mandamus, which is the consequence of such judgment; and the person suing the writ not being entitled to the judgment, and the return to the writ being sufficient by reason of its containing the material allegation before adverted to, which is not denied, we think the latter part of the second section of the Act applies to this case, and that the persons making such return are entitled to judgment, and to recover their costs of the suit; and for this reason it becomes unnecessary to consider the question whether, in ordinary actions, a defendant is entitled to judgment in his favour non obstante veredicto. We agree, therefore, with the Court of Queen's Bench, that the defendants are entitled to the judgment, and the costs, under the circumstances disclosed on this record, and that the judgment given by the Court below must be affirmed.

ROWLEY v. THE QUEEN,(a) at the relation of SMITH.

Quære, whether, under the Municipal Corporations Act, ordinary and extraordinary vacancies in the office of councillors can be supplied at the same election?

But held, at all events, that where one election took place for three ordinary vacancies of councillors, and also for an extraordinary vacancy, and the voting-papers did not distinguish the candidate whom the voter intended to supply the extraordinary vacancy, such election, for want of such distinction, was void.

This was a bill of exceptions tendered by the direction of Tindal, C. J. at the trial at Stafford of a quo warranto information, in July, 1842.

The information was filed at the relation of William Smith, of the borough and city of Lichfield, wine merchant, and charged the defendant, Thomas Rowley, with usurping the office of a councillor of the said borough and city, and the liberties, privileges, and franchises thereto appertaining; and it set forth, inter alia, that within the said borough, according to the Municipal Corporations Act, there ought to be one mayor, six aldermen, and eighteen councillors.

The plea stated, that before the first election under the Municipal Corporations Act, viz. on the 7th of November, the borough was duly divided into two wards, one the north and the other the south, and that of the 18 councillors of the borough, 9 were duly assigned to each ward; and that on the 1st of November, 1838, one-third part of the councillors assigned to the south ward went out of office, and a fresh election was duly held; and the presiding alderman and the assessors did duly examine the voting-papers, and declare the said Thomas Rowley duly elected according to the said Act, and Rowley took on himself the said office, and so continued till the 1st November, 1841, when he went out of office, and was re-elected as after mentioned; and on the 2nd November, 1840, three of the councillors of the south ward went out of office, and William Taylor was duly elected, and took on himself the office, but afterwards, viz. on the 30th March, 1841, he left the borough, and continued absent for more than six months at one time; whereupon, on the 30th Oct. his office was declared void; and that an extraordinary vacancy having so occurred, the presiding alderman fixed a day for an election to supply it, viz. the same day on which the ordinary vacancies were to be supplied; and that on the 1st November, 1841, one-third part of the councillors, &c. went out, Rowley being one, and an election was held of three to supply those vacancies, and of one to supply the extraordinary vacancy. The plea then averred that Rowley was duly qualified, and was a candidate to be re-elected to supply the office of councillor; and that at such election the burgesses, well knowing Rowley to be a candidate, did re-elect him to be a councillor; and a majority of the burgesses entitled to vote did then deliver to the presiding alderman and assessor their respective voting-papers, containing the names and places of abode of the persons for whom they voted, and signed with the name of the burgess voting, &c.; and the said voting-papers were duly examined, and Rowley declared duly elected, who accordingly took on himself the office, as it was lawful to do; wherefore, &c.

(a) Wortley had been partly heard in the former argument in June last.

(a) See 3 Q. B. 113, and Law J. vol. 20, p. 198, for the judgment on the motion for the information.

The Replication, in answer, averred, 1st, that the burgesses of the south ward did not duly re-elect Rowley a councillor, as in the plea alleged; 2nd, that a majority entitled to vote did not deliver their voting-papers according to the Act; 3rd, that the presiding officers did not declare Rowley one having the greatest number of votes, and duly elected. The record then stated the evidence adduced at the trial of these issues; that a public meeting of the burgesses was held some days before the election to ascertain the candidates, when three were proposed to fill the ordinary vacancies, and in half an hour after a fourth was named to fill the extraordinary vacancy left by Taylor; that the elections for the four vacancies were held, and voting-papers delivered as in the plea mentioned; and that each paper contained the names of four candidates as the persons voted for—viz. in the form following:—

1841 South ward.

I vote for {
Frederic Bond, Butcher-row, attorney-at-law.
Thomas Rowley, Tamworth-road, physician.
William Edward Vale, Bow-street, clock-manufacturer.
William Gorton, Lombard-street, builder.

The record then stated that the Lord Chief Justice Tindal told the jury that the presiding officers ought to have obtained the information which enabled them to declare that the defendant was re-elected to his own place, and not to supply the place of Taylor, from the voting-papers alone, and thereupon the counsel for the defendant excepted to the direction of the Chief Justice, insisting that if they had informed themselves by any other means that the defendant was a candidate for re-election to the office vacated by himself, and not to supply the place of Taylor, and that the burgesses knew that fact, and delivered their voting-papers with that knowledge, the papers were sufficient. The record concluded by stating the findings of the jury, which were all in favour of the Crown, under the aforesaid direction of the Lord Chief Justice.

Gray now appeared in support of the bill of exceptions.

J. W. Smith, contrà.—He contended that the ruling of the Lord Chief Justice was wrong, as it was not necessary to distinguish in the voting-papers which candidate was to fill the office of Taylor. It was sufficiently certain to the returning officers by the proposal of the candidate; and according to Reg. v. Brightwell (10 Ad. & Ell. 171) that would be sufficient at the common law. The 32nd section of the Municipal Corporations Act, 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 76, prescribed particularly the mode in which the voting-papers should be made out and delivered, and all those requisites had been complied with. Unless the law would imperatively require the distinction now contended for as essential, it could not be added to the express language of the Act. But no such imperious necessity existed. It was competent to the voters to prepare a list of candidates; and then the voting-papers would be rendered sufficiently certain by reference to the list. The 1 Vict. c. 78, s. 11, repealed the previous provisions of the Municipal Act, s. 47, by which no extraordinary vacancy was to be filled up when there are two-thirds of the councillors remaining at the time; and the 11th section proceeded to enact that "every election to any extraordinary vacancy, either alone or together with other councillors, which shall have been had on the 1st of November last, shall be valid, although the number of councillors did then exceed two-thirds of the whole council, and although such vacancy may have happened more than ten days previously to such day, if in other respects such election had been duly had." This branch of the clause was, of course, retrospective, but what immediately followed must be taken as prospective, and giving a rule for all future elections in municipal corporations under the circumstances therein mentioned. "And the councillor elected by the smallest number of votes at such election, if elected with other councillors, shall be the councillor elected to supply such extraordinary vacancy; and in every case in which more than one such extraordinary vacancy shall be so supplied, the councillor elected by the smallest number of votes shall be taken to be elected in the room of him who would regularly have first gone out of office, and the councillor elected by the next smallest number of votes shall be taken to be elected in the room of him who would regularly have next gone out of office, and so with respect to the other." This provision gets rid of all difficulty; it assigns the place of the candidate who is to fill the extraordinary vacancy, and makes the necessary result of his position at the bottom of the poll; therefore there was no occasion to distinguish the names of the candidates for each office, as the votes would only have to be counted.

But the COURT, without calling on J. W. Smith, on the other side, immediately affirmed the judgment below, holding, that the 11th section of the 1 Vict. c. 78, was clearly retrospective altogether; and that the voting-papers must distinguish, as in verbal voting, which office each candidate is intended by the voter to fill; and a strong doubt was expressed by some of the judges, in the course of the argument, whether such extraordinary and ordinary vacancies could legally be supplied by an election.

Judgment affirmed.

Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts.

COUNTRY COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

BRISTOL DISTRICT BANKRUPTCY COURT.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Serjt. STEPHEN.)

Tuesday, Dec. 3.

Re ARCHIBALD.

Whether the Court has power to allow names of creditors to be added to the schedule—Practice where creditors do not desire to dismiss petition.

At a former hearing (reported ante, p. 101), the Court had given permission to the insolvent to amend his schedule, by adding the names of omitted creditors, on an affidavit that the omission arose from forgetfulness and without any evil intention. It now appeared that the insolvent had added the names of forty-seven creditors, whose united debts amounted to 3,990*l.*

His HONOUR doubted whether, under these circumstances, he was not bound to dismiss the petition, and whether he had the power to allow such a wholesale alteration of the schedule. He referred to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 30. From that section, the Court has power only to permit the insertion of the actual amount of a debt or claim, where such debt or claim is specified in the schedule at an amount which is not exactly the actual amount thereof. In the present case, the insolvent has not merely incorrectly entered debts, but he has added debts to a large amount, and due to forty-seven different creditors. It is impossible that those debts could have been omitted without culpable negligence.

Homes, for the assignees, did not desire a dismissal of the petition, because that course would revest the property in the insolvent without visiting him with any punishment; the assignees wished to divide the property amongst the creditors, and had no objection to allow of the proposed amendment. He then referred to the 3rd section of the Act, permitting amendments generally to be made at the discretion of the Commissioner; and to the 31st section, which permits a dividend to be made to creditors named in the schedule, "and to such other creditors" proving under a commissioner's order, and authorizes proceedings for correcting and ascertaining the list of creditors.

Packwood, the insolvent's attorney, stated that 3,900*l.* of the amount omitted was for mortgages that were mentioned in the former schedule, although the mortgagees' names did not appear in the list of creditors; the other omitted debts were all for very small sums, and did not amount altogether to 100*l.*

His HONOUR.—If any creditor objected to the proposed amendment, I would most certainly dismiss the petition. The power given in sec. 3 of amending the schedule must, I think, be read with sec. 30, and is therefore only a power to amend in the manner pointed out in sec. 30. But where the creditor's assignees consent, it cannot be doubted but that the Court may allow the amendment, and as it seems desirable, and for the interest of the creditors, that the petition should be proceeded with, the names may be added.

After a long examination, in which it appeared that some plate of the insolvent had been deposited with a friend, and that the insolvent still withheld much information concerning his property,

Homes asked his Honour to adjourn the case sine die, with the understanding that the insolvent should not be permitted to come up again until he could produce a certificate from the assignees that he had furnished them with all necessary information.

Packwood said that he would prefer having the petition dismissed.

Homes.—Then the insolvent, who has obtained a curacy at Shrewsbury, out of this district, will petition another Court, and the creditors will incur all the expense of a fresh opposition.

His HONOUR.—I shall not dismiss a petition on the application of an insolvent, where the creditors desire to proceed with it; but I cannot adjourn the first examination sine die: that power, under sec. 27, is confined to the final order. I order the plate to be sent to the official assignees within two days, copies of the deeds required to be filed within a fortnight, and the other information as to the parties in whose names the Long Annuities, in which insolvent has a reversionary interest, are invested, to be given to the assignees; and I adjourn the case to the 23rd inst. when, if the insolvent has not obeyed my order as to the other matters, I shall refuse to name any day for the final order. Adjournment accordingly.

Packwood, for insolvent.

Poole, for creditors.

Re DALLYMORE.

The omission of dates, if unaccounted for, is a fatal objection to an insolvent's petition.

This insolvent came up for his first hearing, when it appeared that he had omitted in his schedule the dates of the month of a great many debts, and merely inserted the year.

Homes, in support of the insolvent, elicited from him that he was unable to read or write, and kept no books, that his schedule was made up entirely from memory, that all lately contracted debts were properly entered with full dates, and that all the debts where the dates were omitted were old debts contracted at times of which insolvent could not recollect the precise day.

His HONOUR.—Our rule requires the dates of the month as well as the year to be given, and we are determined to enforce that rule strictly. I should certainly have dismissed this petition, if the omission had not been satisfactorily accounted for.

Day, for insolvent.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.

WINCHESTER WINTER ASSIZES, 1844.

(Before Mr. Baron ALDERSON.)

REG. v. HAMMOND and SCOVELL.

Robbery with violence.

The stat. 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 87, s. 2, enacts "that whoever shall rob any person, and at the time of, or immediately before, or immediately after, such robbery, shall stab," &c.

An indictment laying the wounding "at the time" is not sustained by evidence of wounding "immediately before."

Future indictments should have three counts, laying the offence in each way.

Prisoners were indicted for together feloniously assaulting William Littlecott, robbing him of money, and "at the time" of the robbery wounding him, &c.

It appeared that the prosecutor, who was a labouring man, and a person of the name of Moore, were at Romsey market on the 31st of October. In the course of the afternoon they sold a pig to a small shopkeeper in Romsey, and Littlecott received the money for it in a half-sovereign, 2*l.* in half-crowns, and 19s. Hammond, and two men who had absconded, were near the spot when Littlecott received the money. Littlecott and Moore remained at that house for some time drinking, until they became intoxicated. Their cart was brought to the door, and Hammond and the two absent men were seen close to it. Hammond said, "The man is drunk, and I'll crack his b—— old head." They looked in at the window where Littlecott and Moore were, and said, "It's all right." Littlecott and Moore then got into the cart and drove away. When they had got about a mile on the road home they were attacked by three or four men, one of whom struck Littlecott a blow on the head with a stick, and several other blows on the head and body, one of which broke a rib. He became insensible, and when he came to himself he found he was on the ground, and felt some one tearing his pocket. He bled very much. All his money was taken, with the exception of sixpence. Some one lifted him into the cart again. He had been confined ever since. Moore was also knocked out of the cart. In the course of the afternoon Scovell had been seen near Hammond. Information of the circumstance having been given to the police, Hammond was apprehended in Romsey; there was a good deal of blood on his trousers. Scovell was also taken into custody. Hammond, when apprehended, stated that he had held the horse's head while the other men drew the men out of the cart and robbed them. He had four half-crowns, one of which he paid away the same night at the very house where Littlecott had been drinking, which happened to be marked, so that the landlady was able to swear to it.

His LORDSHIP called the attention of the counsel for the prosecution to the following point. The words of the stat. 7 Wm. 4, and 1 Vict. c. 87, s. 2, are, "That whoever shall rob any person, and at the time of, or immediately before, or immediately after, such robbery, shall stab, cut, or wound," &c. The first count in this indictment charges that the prisoner wounded "at the time" he committed the robbery. The evidence was, that the wound was inflicted before the robbery. The legislature having made the distinction between "at," "before," and "after," if it be necessary to lay it correctly, the evidence in this case failed.

Edwards, for the prosecution, submitted that the point was new, but that the word "at" must be construed to mean the whole period from the commencement to the close of the transaction, from the moment of the assault to the end of the robbery, and included the immediately before and after mentioned in the statute.

ALDERSON, B.—That would have been the construction I should have put upon the word "at," but for the express words used by the Legislature; but as in the statute those different words were used, it is necessary to prove the act in the precise way in which it had been laid, but in all future cases I would advise that there should be three counts, laying the offence in each way.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

OCTOBER SESSIONS.

REG. v. CARRUTHERS.

Indictment for sending a threatening letter with intent to extort money.

Where there is no person in existence of the precise name which the letter bears as its address, it is a question for the jury whether the party into whose hands it falls was really the one for whom it was intended. It is for the jury, and not for the Court, to determine whether or not the letter is a threatening one, within the Act, and the judge will not withdraw it from their consideration, unless by no possible construction can it be held to involve a threat. Where a party has pleaded, and not demurred, to an indictment, an alleged defect upon the face of it cannot be taken advantage of before verdict, even where the objection is such that a verdict would cure it.

The prisoner was indicted for sending a threatening letter to Messrs. Coutts and Co. with intent to extort money. The indictment charged, That before and at the time of the committing of the felony and offence hereinafter next mentioned, certain persons, that is to say, Angela Georgiana Burdett Coutts and others, were copartners in the trade or business of bankers, and carried on the said trade and business under the name, style, and firm of Coutts and Company, in a house and premises in a certain street called the Strand, in the parish of St. Mary-le-Strand, in the county of Middlesex, and within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court:

That James Carruthers, late of the same parish, labourer, heretofore, to wit, on the 28th day of August, in the 8th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady the Queen Victoria, with force and arms, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the said Court, knowingly and feloniously did send to the said A. G. B. Coutts and others, her copartners, a certain letter directed to the said A. G. B. Coutts and others, by the name and description of J. Coutts, esq. banker, Strand, demanding money from the said A. G. B. Coutts and others, with menaces, and without any reasonable or probable cause, and which said letter is as follows, that is to say (as infra), against the form of the statute, &c.

The 2nd count recited that the said A. G. B. Coutts and others, being copartners in the trade of bankers, were joint proprietors of, and did carry on their business in, a certain house, &c.

The 3rd count recited, that said A. G. B. Coutts did use, exercise, and carry on trade and business of a banker, in a certain house called and known as Coutts' banking-house, &c.

The 4th, 5th, and 6th counts each recited that a certain other partner carried on trade and business as in the 3rd count.

7th count.—That the prisoner feloniously did send to A. G. B. Coutts a letter demanding money, with menaces, then and yet being one of the members of the copartnership and firm aforesaid.

8th, 9th, and 10th counts, the same as the 7th, except that the name of another partner was substituted for that of A. G. B. Coutts.

The letter, of which the following is a copy, was set out in each count:—

"SIR,—The most desperate gang in the metropolis have resolved to obtain possession, by whatever means, of a certain portion of your property; it is composed of starving men, and no efforts will be spared in effecting their firm resolves; if any of their numbers fail in the requirement of sustenance from those they have marked out for prey, the remainder have sworn full revenge. Desperation is in their hearts. Not from design, but from accident, I was led into their society—curiosity—being desirous of contemplating human nature in all degrees of life, caused me to seek initiation into all their secrets. I now rue my act. I had previously to take a solemn oath, which nothing, however, will induce me to break, that I would preserve eternal secrecy concerning their names and places of abode. Learning their design upon you, as one of the proscribed number, and having further a strong consideration for you, I made every effort to dissuade them, at the risk of personal suspicion and consequent danger, to abolish their intentions as respects yourself; further than this I dared not go, but intense suffering closes the ear of mercy. To remove that suffering is the only way to give success into its natural dictates; they, however, mutually agree that if I will give them one hundred pounds in solid gold, they will relinquish their design upon you; nothing less will satisfy. I communicate to you their demand; and personal safety will, I hope, induce compliance. It is hard that you should thus suffer, but I have done my utmost in vain to ward off the inevitable catastrophe. Had this been an ordinary conspiracy, it would have been sufficient for me merely to give you warning, to cause you to be on your guard. But so resolute and determined are these men, that no vigilance however acute, no defences however strong, will shield from their hands. Fearing the inevitable results of their decisions in this case, that I have been providentially made aware of, I have almost promised compliance with their demand, satisfied that could I but communicate with you, you would for obvious reasons consent. If they receive the sum in question, I am firmly convinced you will never have any cause of fear from them; but if not, non-compliance will hereafter be repented of too late. My oath prevents me from detailing their plans, which also, if revealed, would subject me to the most imminent danger. I have already stated that I am in no way an accomplice; though poor, I am honest. If you comply with my recommendation, you are safe. If you preserve secrecy, I am safe. But too often the innocent suffer for the guilty. Circumstantial evidence is too much honoured: purity of motive, however generous the deed enacted, uniformly denied. Therefore as I have consented, through the hope of securing good and averting wrong, to be a mediator, I require, to avoid treachery, that inviolable secrecy be preserved; that you take a solemn oath that you will make no attempt, through yourself or by others, directly or indirectly, to discover who I am, or cause me in any way to be molested. That on Friday night next, at half-past nine o'clock, you will cause a little boy to be stationed at the base of the fire Monument near lower Thames-street, who shall have in his possession the sum of one hundred pounds in solid gold, encased by boards, so that he shall not be aware of the contents, and deliver the same to the individual who asks for a parcel. That this boy be alone, and in no communication by sign or word, with any other individual whatsoever. That on Friday morning next you cause the following advertisement to appear in the Times newspaper:—

"'C. C. desires to inform T. T. that his request has been fully complied with.'

"If, notwithstanding this information and offer, you should fail to comply with my recommendation, the consequences will be fearful. My oath prevents me from saying more.

"Private. Adieu, yours, T. T.

"J. Coutts, Esq. Banker, Strand. (Important.)"

Bodkin (with whom was Doane), for the prosecution, having stated the case,

Clarkson, for the prisoner, said, that as it was impossible for him to struggle against the facts of the case, he would submit to the Court his objections, in point of law, to the indictment. The letter was not a threatening letter within the Act. For the purpose of making out the offence, it was necessary to shew that there was a threat and demand of money from the writer to the parties to whom it was addressed. By the common law this was no offence, but made one by statute, the very terms of which must be complied with. The 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 8, that on which this indictment was framed, enacted "that if any person should knowingly send or deliver any letter or writing, demanding of any person, with menaces, and without any reasonable or probable cause, any chattel, money, or valuable security, &c." It would be clearly proved here that J. Coutts, esq. was a non-existing person, and, therefore, the offence could not be brought within the Act. It speaks of a person, which evidently means an existing person. Moreover the prosecutors must be bound by the terms of the letter, and could not draw inferences beyond its literal interpretation. The letter, on the face of it, was no more than a suggestion to a non-existing being that the writer had become acquainted, either casually or from curiosity, with an enterprise which other parties had undertaken, and it went on to recommend that certain demands of these parties, and not of the writer himself, should be complied with.

MAULE, J.—I do not quite understand the course you are pursuing. You seem to be insisting that the indictment, on the face of it, is insufficient, but you can surely only raise that question by moving in arrest of judgment, or by writ of error. It would have been otherwise if you had demurred, but here you have pleaded.

Clarkson.—I put this as something more than an objection appearing on the face of the record,—viz. that there is nothing in the letter which makes it a matter for the jury's consideration. In the case of R. v. Pickford (4 C. & P. 227), the Court held, that a letter, charged as a threatening letter, was not within the Act.

MAULE, J.—I must decline to entertain this question now. I should hesitate to decide it even on a motion to arrest the judgment, and should probably leave you to your writ of error.

The case then proceeded, and the letter was about to be read.

Clarkson.—I submit that the letter cannot be read in evidence for the prosecution. In each of the counts it is set out as being addressed to A. G. B. Coutts and others, respectively, by the name and style of J. Coutts, esq. banker, Strand. The letter is, in fact, addressed to J. Coutts, esq. banker, Strand, and there is no proof of its being intended by the prisoner to fall into the hands of A. G. B. Coutts, or others.

MAULE, J.—It is a question for the jury, whether it was addressed to them by the name the superscription bears.

The case being closed,—

Clarkson renewed his objection, that the letter was not a threatening one within the Act, and that it was a matter for the decision of the Court rather than of the jury. He cited R. v. Tyler (Mood. Cr. Ca. 428), in which Denman, C.J. stated he had some doubts whether the question ought to have been left to the jury. And all that the Court subsequently decided was, that the objection could not be sustained after verdict. In the case first cited, the point was raised before verdict, although there was no demurrer. The difficulty in which the prisoner is placed is this, that unless the matter is determined now, it cannot be rendered available hereafter.

MAULE, J.—That is no ground for my acting contrary to the law. There can be no possible doubt that an objection which is not taken by demurrer, if it be on the record, cannot be taken before verdict. If the party has pleaded, he must abide the consequences. [His lordship then proceeded to sum up the case to the jury.] In the first place the prosecutor must make out to your satisfaction that this is a letter addressed to A. G. B. Coutts or others, individually or collectively, by the name of J. Coutts, Esq. banker, Strand. The question is, is it in substance directed to them? I do not think it necessary that the direction should contain the actual name of the partners in the firm, because nothing could then be more easy than to send a threatening letter with perfect impunity. Such a direction might be used as would insure the paper reaching the parties for whom it was intended, whilst at the same time such a variation might be adopted as would insure to the writer an acquittal, or the ground of such a variance as is here urged. Evidence has been given by the partners in this banking-house, that the firm was once T. Coutts and Co. and that none but themselves carry on such a business in the Strand, or in London, by such a style now. It is for you, then, to say whether the parties stated in the indictment are not those for whom the letter was intended. Secondly, is this a letter demanding money with menaces, without any reasonable or probable cause? To ascertain this, you must of course look to the letter itself, and to the situation of the parties. It may be, that under certain circumstances, an apparently innocent letter may convey a threat. It may be, that no letter could be written which it might not be possible to prove, by extraneous matter, did not contain a threat. Now, I can conceive a case where such a letter as this might be written: "Sir, I trust you are well, and I shall be happy to meet you to-morrow." There, I should consider myself called upon to withdraw such a letter from the jury, because it would be absurd to say it involved a threat. But as it is impossible, I can tell you that this letter may not contain a threat, I cannot decide that it is not a question for the jury. Two cases have been cited. In R. v. Pickford the jury were told that the letter was not a threatening one. They found, therefore, nothing more than that it had been sent by the prisoner, and the Court held that they ought to have decided the whole question. This principle is still further illustrated by R. v. Tyler, where a different course was, in the first instance, pursued. The jury were not there told that the letter did or did not contain threats, but its interpretation was left to them. They came to a certain conclusion, and it was upheld by the Court. These two cases, then, shew what is the proper course in trials of this kind. Evidence is to be given of the letter sent, and it is for the jury to say whether or not it contains a sufficient threat. At any rate, if that is not the proper mode of proceeding, and the Court are competent to decide that this letter cannot, on any construction, be held to contain menaces, the objection will be on the face of the record, and will be open to the prisoner in arrest of judgment, or by writ of error.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

THERE is no news of legislation projected.

SMUGGLING RETURNS.—On Saturday a Parliamentary return was issued, affording a good deal of information on smuggling. Mr. Hume moved for a return of the several establishments maintained for the prevention of smuggling in the United Kingdom in each of the years 1842 and 1843, the expenses of prosecutions by the Customs and Excise, the produce of seizures, the rewards paid to officers, &c. Among the expenses in the first portion of the return appears the sum of 344,136*l*. 13s. 11d. for wages and salaries of persons employed for the prevention of smuggling in 1842, and 347,809*l*. 1s. 4d. in 1843. The expense of the equipment of the persons so employed, and for repairs, was, in 1842, 168,608*l*. 4s. 10d.; and in 1843, 164,358*l*. 14s. 1d. The amount of the produce of goods seized and sold was, in 1842, by the Customs, 2,201*l*. 19s. 7d.; and by the Excise, 785*l*. 1s. 6d.: and in 1843 the produce was, by the Customs, 7,636*l*. 11s. 1d.; and by the Excise, 520*l*. 12s. 3d. The rewards paid to persons employed for the prevention of smuggling were, in 1842, 6,817*l*. 3s. 10d.; and in the following year, 11,281*l*. 45s. 9d. There are other expenses detailed of a trifling character. The spirits seized afloat are delivered over to the Excise for re-distillation and public disposal. Tobacco is the next principal article; but realizes a small sum, as frequently it will not fetch the duty, and is destroyed. In 1842, 11,048 gallons of spirits, and 19,667lb. of tobacco, were seized; and in 1843, 10,676 gallons of spirits, and 62,888lb. of tobacco. The proceeds not being sufficient to pay the rewards, the difference was taken from the consolidated customs. The expenses of prosecutions by the Excise in 1842 were 5,687*l*. 14s. 3d.; and in 1843, 8,760*l*. 9s. 2d. The produce of fines and seizures by the same department was, in 1842, 27,003*l*. 6s. 11d.; and in 1843, 36,839*l*. 19s. The share paid to excise officers in 1842 was 11,256*l*. 10s. 10d.; and in 1843, 15,034*l*. 7s. 4d.; the amount remaining to the Crown was, in 1842, 11,031*l*. 4s. 4d.; and in 1843, 15,157*l*. 10s. 6d. The other expenses of establishments belonging to the Excise amounted, in 1842, to 5,760*l*. 12s. 3d.; and in 1843, to 8,757*l*. 16s. 8d.; and with respect to the border service, cruisers, and revenue police, the expenses are considerable. The revenue police of the Excise, in 1842, cost, in wages and victualling, 33,216*l*. 18s. 1d.; for salaries and allowances, 1,640*l*.; in vessels, 989*l*. 7s. 7d.; and in horses and barracks, 1,029*l*. 18s. 2d.; and in 1843, the police cost in the various departments mentioned 35,422*l*., 1,640*l*., 1,760*l*. 19s., and 1,233*l*. 0s. 10d. The first branch of the return relates to the Customs, and the three others to the Excise.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

We direct the attention of the magistracy throughout the country to the following occurrence at Winchester, and Mr. Baron Alderson's commentary thereon. The rule is equally applicable to the sessions as to the assizes. If judges should not be put to prosecute in the one, much less should they be so in the other:—

Very great delay and inconvenience have been occasioned at this assize from the following circumstance:—The magistrates in this county have refused to allow the expenses of briefs for the prosecution and the fees to counsel in all cases where the bills are ignored; the consequence is, that counsel are not instructed till the bill is brought into court, and are unprepared to proceed with the case when it is called on, and much time is lost. Alderson, B. said this was a most improper thing; the Government had thought it right to put the people of England to the expense of sending a judge down to try the prisoners, and the magistrates refused to put the county to the expense of employing counsel to prosecute them. He thought the magistrates would find such paltry economy a disadvantage, as the assize would probably last a day longer than it otherwise would, to say nothing of decency in the administration of justice. In addition to this, it was almost expressing an expectation that bills would be ignored, which was a libel on the committing magistrates, for prisoners ought not to be committed except upon a reasonable expectation that true bills would be found.

Military Officers exempt from Turnpike Toll.—A case was recently brought before the Leeds magistrates, by Captain John St. Alban, of the 83rd, who claimed exemption from the payment of toll at one of the toll-bars. The exemption of officers of infantry regiments from the payment of toll for passing through turnpike-bars on horseback being a question of some doubt, a communication was made to the War Office on the subject, and the following answer has been received:—

"War Office, Nov. 28, 1844.

"Sir,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23rd instant, and to acquaint you, for the information of the magistrates of Leeds, that the law officers of the Crown have given their opinion that the words of the Mutiny Act do exempt, as they were intended to exempt, all military officers in uniform, dress or undress, and their horses, from the payment of toll when passing through turnpike-gates or bridges erected by the authority of Parliament. This exemption extends to military officers, whether required by her Majesty's regulations to keep horses for the public service or not, and when riding for exercise or recreation, as well as when travelling in the actual performance of an act of public duty, the only condition being, that the officers must be in uniform, dress or undress.

"I am, &c. "L. Sulivan."

"To Robt. Barr, esq. Leeds."

LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL NEW COURT.

Tuesday, Dec. 3.

(Before the Common Serjeant and Aldermen Challis and Hooper.)

Fraud by a Sham Attorney and Agent.—Thomas Field, otherwise John Easterfield, otherwise Wm. West, described as an agent, aged sixty-five, was charged on an indictment including three charges, and consisting of as many counts; first, with obtaining two half-crowns and a sixpence from William Wall; secondly, the same sum from E. Hammond; and also a half-crown from J. Harding, with intent to cheat and defraud them thereof.

The prisoner applied to have his trial put off to the next sessions, but as he had been given in charge to the jury, his application could not be complied with.

O'Brien stated the case, which was one of great importance to the public. The prisoner had gone about describing himself as an attorney or agent employed to recover money lodged in the Court of Chancery, and obtained money from different persons for that purpose. Among others, he went to the three persons who appeared as prosecutors, who were all poor men, and shoemakers by trade.

William Wall deposed as follows:—In July last the prisoner came to my house, and said he wanted a Mr. Wall. I said "My name is Wall." He said "I want an elderly man who used to live in Union-street, Lambeth, as I have some good news for him." I said, "I am his son," and invited him in. He told me that a great deal of property was in the Court of Chancery which belonged to my father or his heir. I asked him what was to be done, and he said, a petition must be sent to the Court of Chancery, and a will must be searched in Doctors'-commons. He said the charge of the petition would be 5s. 6d. for which an order would be granted. I made an appointment to see him the next day, when he produced several printed forms in blank, similar to that now in court. I paid the 5s. 6d. and he afterwards brought what I considered the order from the Court of Chancery (put in). I then asked him of what the property consisted. He said, "Strictly speaking, I ought not to say in this stage of the business, but it is part freehold and part funded." I said, "What do you think it will realise?" He said about 900*l*.

Prisoner.—Did I not tell you that I was employed by Mr. West to discover these matters?

Witness.—You said you came from an office belonging to the High Court of Chancery, and a great deal more.

Did I not give you a card with the name of West on it?—Yes, and here it is, and your writing at the back.

It being known to the Court that the prisoner was convicted here last year in the name of West, desired the card to be put in and read, which caused some merriment. The following is a copy:—

"West and Co. General Commission Agents, for purchasing and disposing of every description of property.—Leases executed, wills copied, unclaimed property restored, the bankrupt and insolvent laws clearly explained, and every other advice and assistance required by the embarrassed tradesman as well as the man of business. Money advanced on approved securities, policies on life insurances bought and sold; rents and debts collected and legally recovered; advice given without a fee, and the most honourable conduct may be depended on. It is most respectfully requested that all communications may be forwarded by letter (post paid), addressed to Mr. West or his agent, No. 55, New-cut, Lambeth, which will be punctually attended to. Charges very moderate."

The prisoner now entered upon a plausible statement which was irrelevant to the charge, until interrupted by the Common-Serjeant, who said, "You may go on in that strain as long as you like, but the case against you lies in the closest possible compass."

James Harding, shoemaker, Stangate, and Edward Hammond, shoemaker, Emmerton's-row, proved two other cases of the same kind as the preceding against the prisoner.

O'Brien.—My lord, I will now call the attorney who instructs me to prove that the papers called "orders" are pure fictions.

Stoddart deposed that he is a solicitor and conducts this prosecution for a friend. The papers given to the three prosecutors, called orders from the Court of Chancery, have nothing to do with that court—they are mere "notices of appearance" connected with the courts of common law.

This was the case for the prosecution, and

The prisoner commenced a long defence, and detailed matters foreign to that which most concerned him. He said that he had been in respectable circumstances, but dropped into poverty in forty-eight hours. He was placed in an awkward position through his trial not being put off to the 16th, as he could then have availed himself of the evidence of Mr. West, his employer.

The Common-Serjeant.—You profess to know the law, and you must have known that you ought to have made your application to traverse when you first came into court. You talk about being employed by Mr. West. Your ipse dixit is not enough; we must have the fact stated by that person on oath.

The prisoner proceeded in his rambling statement, when the judge told him that he did not desire to interrupt him, but all he had said was beside the mark.

To a question by the Court, the prisoner said he had no one to speak to his character. He was sixty-five years of age.

The jury, without consultation, found him guilty.

O'Brien.—My lord, I feel it my duty to the Court and the public to state that the prisoner was convicted of a similar offence in June last year, when points were argued which were overruled by Mr. Justice Patteson, who sentenced him to imprisonment for one year.

The Common-Serjeant.—I am aware of the fact. I have the arguments here (holding up a volume of reports recently published). He then called himself "Mr. West," of whom he has talked so much to-day. And Mr. Field or West, or whatever your name is, there is this remarkable fact in your case. Last year you stated your age as fifty-four, and to-day you have said you are sixty-five. How is it that you have advanced eleven years in twelve months?

The prisoner made no reply.

His Lordship then called him up to receive the judgment of the Court.

The Common-Serjeant said the Court could hardly conceive a worse character, for he had plundered very poor persons who could not even pay his demand, and he moved among a class who were ignorant of the law, and were easily beguiled by his holding out specious expectations. "You (said his lordship) have been convicted upon an indictment which contains three counts, and I shall mark your case in a particular manner, as it is quite clear that you are a very improper person to remain in this country. The sentence of the Court is, that upon the first count you be transported beyond the seas for seven years; for the term of seven years on the second count; and for a further term of seven years upon the third count, making, in the whole, twenty-one years; but mind, the terms upon each sentence commence on the same day, and not by sequence, so that you will only be transported in fact for seven years."

This appeared to be a new point of law to the prisoner. It was said that fifty similar cases of fraud could have been established against him, committed since June last.

Central Criminal Court.—A meeting of the members of the Bar practising at the Central Criminal Court and Middlesex Sessions has been recently held, to consider the state of the practice in these courts. After a discussion of some duration, a committee of inquiry was appointed. We understand that several gentlemen are favourable to the establishment of a mess, as on the circuits, but that some difference of opinion exists on this subject. We highly approve of the design, as eminently calculated to improve the practice, not only of the Bar, but of the attorneys also.

Whitehall, Dec. 5.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Charles Pemberton, of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, gent. to be a Master Extraordinary in the High Court of Chancery.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

BUSINESS OF THE COURT.

On an application being made by a learned counsel to his lordship that a common jury cause might be taken on Friday next,

His Lordship said, that that and the two following days, Saturday and Monday, were the last of the present sittings, and that each of them being appropriated to special juries, the Court could not comply with the application unless the parties were both ready to take the chances of coming on. It was his (the Lord Chief Baron's) determination not to allow any common jury cause to be put down in the same list with special juries for the future. In his own experience at the Bar, the opposite practice had been felt and admitted to be a grievous tax on suitors, and even so far back as Lord Ellenborough's time it had been complained of. Feeling the justice of these complaints, he had resolved to adopt the course now intimated in all cases, except undefended actions, or causes wherein verdicts might be taken by consent, or where parties, for special reasons, might agree to take their chance, and he was sure that great benefit would result from the general introduction of such a course of business.

Mr. Jervis and Mr. Humfrey begged to express, on behalf of their clients and of the Bar, the great and general satisfaction which this announcement could not but cause. The costs entailed on suitors by the old system were quite incalculable.

Mr. Martin also thanked his lordship for the arrangement in question. He had just been informed of one common jury cause, the witnesses in which came from the country at great expense, and which had stood at the top of the special jury paper for eleven consecutive days.

The Lord Chief Baron.—Oh yes; that frequently takes place. I think it much better to run the risk of occasionally losing a portion of a day devoted to special juries for want of common juries to fill it up with, than to entail on the suitors in the latter the certainty of unavailing and heavy expenses.

Illegal Marriages.—In consequence of a number of illegal marriages (on account of the respective parties not having resided in the parish) having been solemnized in the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol, the Lord Bishop has given notice to the respective clergy of his extensive diocese, that no marriage can be legally solemnized in any church or chapel but that of the parish or district in which one of the parties reside; and when both the parties do not reside in the same parish, his Lordship will require the banns of marriage to be published in the churches belonging to the parishes in which each party may reside, a certificate of which must be sent to the officiating minister. The Lord Bishop calls the attention of his clergy to the Act of Parliament against clandestine marriages, which enacts that, in order to protect the minister from fraudulent assertions, he is not bound to publish even banns unless the persons shall have resided in the parish at least seven days from the first publication of the banns, and the clergyman shall cause to be delivered to him a notice in writing of their true Christian and surnames, and also the places of their respective abodes, and the time they have occupied the same, in order to afford the officiating minister sufficient time to inquire if any imposition has been attempted. His Lordship expects that the above enactments will be carried out to the strict letter of the law in every part of his diocese.—Glocester Chronicle.

Liverpool.—On Tuesday evening last, a party of seventy gentlemen, practising attorneys in Liverpool, and (with few exceptions) members of the Liverpool Law Society, dined together at the Adelphi Hotel. This convivial meeting was arranged by the Committee of the Society, with the object of promoting cordiality and good feeling among the members of the profession. Mr. Ambrose Lace was chairman, and Mr. E. Guy Deane, vice. After the toasts, "the Queen," "the Royal Family," "the Judges," &c. &c. had been given, others of a local nature were proposed and responded to by gentlemen present. The health of "the Chairman" was proposed by Mr. Harvey, in a very appropriate speech, and received with general and enthusiastic applause. Due honours were also paid to "the Vice President," "the Town Clerk," "the Vestry Clerk," "the Coroner," and "the Clerk of the Peace," to which Mr. Deane, Mr. Shuttleworth, Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Curry, and Mr. Wright responded. Among the speakers were, also, Mr. Parr, Mr. Littledale, and Mr. Caton Thompson. Reference was made by the Chairman to the injustice done to the Profession as a body, by the sort of systematic general abuse which persons in other classes of the community are found to indulge in; and he made various remarks tending to prove how unfounded such aspersions were; though he ascribed the fault in some measure to the attorneys themselves, as arising from their want of unanimity and association together on the same terms as those on which barristers and members of other professions are accustomed to meet. Several excellent glees were sung, and the evening passed off, in a most agreeable manner, and the company parted, with a general wish that an annual meeting may take place.—From a Correspondent.

Six Clerks' Compensation.—Lord Langdale, the present Master of the Rolls, in a speech delivered by his Lordship in the House of Lords on the 13th of June, 1836, on the occasion of the second reading of a Bill entitled "A Bill for the better Administration of Justice in the Court of Chancery," and which speech was subsequently published by his Lordship, made the following observations:—"Of all the grievances which afflict a country, none are so pernicious, none tend so certainly to unfasten all the bands which hold society in peace and harmony together, as those which are found to prevail in courts of justice; but there are none which excite so little clamour and alarm—none, perhaps, which attract so little of public attention." Consider for a moment under what circumstances and by means of what gross misrepresentations the Act (under which these compensations were awarded) was obtained; and that the fees imposed under it, upon the helpless and unhappy suitors of the Court of Chancery, to pay the compensation, are so enormous in amount, and so onerous in their nature, as to tend to a denial of justice to all who can possibly escape the fangs of the court; that the compensated gentleman to whom, par excellence, was intrusted the delicate task of drawing the Act, has (fearful less the fees imposed might fail) made these compensations, and the no less enormous salaries, a charge upon all the funds of the suitors; that out of those funds the salaries of most of the judges of the court, and of all its other officers are paid, and you will readily admit the justice of the above observations of Lord Langdale, and not express much surprise on being told that during the last two Terms several of the judges of the Court of Chancery did not sit, for lack of business, and yet you will scarcely fail to express some surprise, that in the face of all this Parliament, and more particularly the House of Commons, upon the re-assertion of the misrepresentations under which the Act was obtained, refused in the present session all inquiry on the subject; but those misrepresentations having been now refuted and exposed, we may surely hope some inquiry will, in the next session, be conceded to the public.—Morning Chronicle.

COURT OF CHANCERY—December 3.

REMOVAL OF A SOLICITOR FROM THE ROLL FOR FRAUD.

Shortly after the Court sat this morning, Mr. Pigott, Q.C. on behalf of Andrew Christopher Pallas, solicitor, opened the affidavit filed in obedience to the order of the Lord Chancellor, explaining the part taken by Mr. Pallas in the execution and preparation of certain deeds referred to in the cause of Foster v. Goolde and others, and which deeds were declared in the course of the proceedings in Chancery to have been fabricated for the purposes of imposition and dishonesty, and with the intent of fraudulently conveying to Mr Pallas and to James J. Hardy, barrister-at-law, certain lands and tenements forming part of the Goolde estate in the county of Tipperary. The Chancellor was of opinion that the deeds in question were impeached by counsel for the defendant in the cause, and ordered them to be collected and impounded, and that Mr. Pallas should answer to the Court for his apparently dishonest and improper conduct. The affidavit now relied on by Pallas's counsel stated that the deeds referred to were prepared in the office of Mr. Hardy, and that Pallas knew nothing of the fraudulent alterations, nor by whom they were made. He also positively denied all knowledge of the object or intention to prepare the deeds for a fraudulent purpose, and stated he was quite ready to submit to any party interested the whole of the documents relating to the cause. He further denied that he even was a party to or was cognisant of any plan to raise money by means of those deeds, although he was aware they made himself and Mr. Hardy trustees for certain purposes.

The Lord Chancellor in delivering judgment said, that the explanations stated at the bar to have been given by Mr. Pallas did not relieve that person from the serious charges appearing against him; and that therefore, for the sake of the respectability of the profession to which he belonged—for the safety of the suitors of that Court, as well as for the benefit of the public generally, it was his lordship's painful duty to direct that Mr. Pallas's name should be removed from the roll of solicitors. As regarded the part which Mr. Hardy had taken in the transaction, explanation should be offered for it before the benchers of the Queen's inns, before whom the matter was pending.

The chambers of the grand duchy of Baden have adopted a project of law relative to the reform of the criminal courts' proceedings. This project enacts that henceforth there shall be a public accuser—that the defence of the accused shall be oral—that the accused or defendants shall be present at the proceedings—and that the sittings of the criminal courts shall be open to the public.

COURT OF CHANCERY.—Dec. 4.

Re Rickard O'Connell, a Barrister.—An application was made on a former day by Fitzgibbon, Q. C. on behalf of a Dr. Twohy, to prevent Mr. Rickard O'Connell, barrister-at-law, from practising or signing his name for the future to any pleadings in that court, on the ground that his personal answer to a bill filed in the cause in Chancery of O'Connell v. O'Connell was scandalous and libellous, and unwarrantably reflected upon the character of the petitioner, Doctor Twohy.

Martley, Q. C. represented the defendant, Mr. Rickard O'Connell.

At the sitting of the Court this morning, Fitzgibbon having renewed his application,

The Lord Chancellor decided that the defendant should be compelled to take his answer off the file, for the causes stated; that he should file a new answer immediately, and pay all the costs incurred. His lordship severely reprimanded the defendant, and reprobated the conduct of any gentleman of the bar putting upon the records of the court such an answer as that in question. In such cases, however (and he was happy to observe they were by no means of frequent occurrence), he would always leave barristers to be dealt with by the benchers of their inn. In the present case, however, if the suggestions he had thrown out were acceded to by the parties concerned, he should not interfere otherwise than as he had already stated.

These terms were approved of, and the matter was accordingly disposed of.

PROCEEDINGS OF LAW SOCIETIES.

THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

(From the Annual Report recently printed.)

"Bills in Parliament.—The numerous measures which have been proposed in Parliament during the last session, for the alteration of the law, have called for the attentive consideration of the committee.

"To the County Courts Bill they framed a series of objections, both in principle and detail, which they submitted to the Secretary of State, with a request that a deputation might attend him on the subject. This, however, was rendered unnecessary by the withdrawal of the Bill. The same fate attended the Bills introduced for the Improvement of the Proceedings in the Superior Courts of Common Law, and for the Recovery of Small Debts; to which, and also to the Debtors and Creditors and the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bills, the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, the Arches Court Bill, and the Marriage and Divorce Bill, the attention of the committee was also particularly directed.

"The committee have likewise had under their consideration the Bill for effecting the Service abroad of Common Law Process, of that relating to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and also the Bills introduced by the Lord Chancellor concerning the Transfer of Real Property, and the Jurisdiction in small Charitable Trusts: and they have not failed to notice the following Bills, which in a greater or less degree were interesting to the Profession, viz. the Joint Stock Companies Bill, the Metropolis Buildings Bill, the Inclosure of Commons Bill, the Landlord and Tenants Bill, the Letters Patent Bill, the Masters and Servants Bill, and the County Coroners Bill.

"The committee have directed their attention to the 60th clause of the Poor Law Bill, with reference to the interference of clerks of boards of guardians in business appertaining to members of the Profession; and they have the satisfaction to state, that by the clause as it now stands, the power given to those officers by the 5 & 6 Victoria, c. 57, to take proceedings at the quarter and general sessions no longer exists, and they are enabled to act at petty and special sessions only; so that the operation of the Attorneys Act remains undisturbed.

"Business at Judges' Chambers.—In consequence of the continued delays and great inconvenience in transacting the business at the judges' chambers, the committee deemed it advisable to prepare a petition to Parliament, recommending that one of the Masters of the Court should be authorized, under their Lordships' regulation, to hear ordinary summonses and matters of a practical kind, and also to administer oaths,—so that the time of the judges might be saved, and the business transacted more conveniently and expeditiously.

"Master's clerk.—The committee received a memorial from several of the members practising in the Court of Chancery, complaining of the appointment of an unqualified person as chief clerk to one of the Masters; and in consequence of representations made by them, they have been assured that the earliest opportunity of the introduction into Parliament of any Bill relating to the court should be taken, to place the qualification for this important office on a satisfactory footing.

"Probate Duty Office.—With a view to remedy the delays and inconvenience at the Probate Duty Office, of which complaints were frequently made, the committee, through their chairman, had a communication with the Commissioners of Stamps, the result of which has been an increase of the establishment in that office, sufficient to remove the evil complained of.

"Courts' removal.—The committee has kept in view the object which the society has for several years been endeavouring to attain—the removal of the courts from Westminster into this vicinity. They have made several attempts to obtain a further hearing before the House of Commons in the present session, but they cannot pretend to say that they have received much encouragement. With reference to this subject, it may be mentioned, that in a recent report of the state of the buildings for the new Houses of Parliament, provision has been made for the accommodation of practitioners attending them, according to a former recommendation made by this society, the expense of which is estimated at 5,000*l.*

"Bankruptcy costs.—The practice which had for some time prevailed of having the costs in bankruptcy in the London district taxed by the same registrar, having been found beneficial in producing a uniformity of charge, and in occasioning great convenience in the despatch of business, the committee, in order to render the practice permanent, deemed it advisable to promote an application to the Lord Chancellor to effect this object, and they have the gratification of stating that their application has been successful.

"Criminal law.—The Criminal Law Commissioners having forwarded to the committee various questions with reference to projected alterations in that branch of the law, the same have been laid on the hall table, with an invitation to the members to make such suggestions as appeared to them advisable.

"Proposed new orders of court.—The committee also, in addition to various other professional subjects which have come under their consideration, have devoted their best attention to various orders of court, which the judges have done them the honour to submit to them; and they have to express their pride and gratification at the continued kindness with which this body is treated by the Bench, and the confidence which is reposed in its recommendations.

"Usages.—The various points of professional usage in conveyancing practice which have been submitted to the committee they have endeavoured to determine to the satisfaction of the parties interested.

"The right claimed by the Scriveners' Company to refuse to qualify attorneys to act as notaries in the city of London has been considered, with a view to the alteration of the law at a fit opportunity.

"New rules and orders.—For the information of the members, the committee during the past year have printed and circulated among them the following papers:—

"The Act for the Regulation of Attorneys and Solicitors.

"The regulations thereunder of the office of Registrar.

"The Table of Costs in Bankruptcy.

"The Examination Orders in Chancery.

"The Orders in Chancery reducing the fees for Office Copies.

"The Orders in Lunacy.

"The Rules and Orders relating to Common Law Judgment, and Writs of Execution in Bankruptcy, and "The new Scale of Costs in Actions under 20*l.*

"Independently, however, of these various subjects, which have occupied the attention of the committee during the past year, the most laborious and important duty in which they have been engaged has been that which devolved upon them under the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, which received the royal assent soon after the last annual general meeting.

"Registrar of attorneys.—By that Act the new and responsible office of Registrar of Attorneys and Solicitors was established, and the performance of its duties was confided to this society,—a trust which secured to the body not only a legislative recognition, but a continuance during the whole of his professional career of that superintendence over every practitioner which by his examination previous to admission had already been reposed at his entrance into it. The members will at once see how material a benefit was conferred upon the Profession by this appointment, by which the annual certificates were subjected to a stricter regulation, and the possibility of their being issued, as was formerly too frequently the case, to parties who were unentitled by previous admission, was entirely prevented.

"The extent of the introductory labour imposed on the committee by this appointment will be apparent to the members, when they are reminded that a roll was to be prepared of all the attorneys and solicitors in the kingdom who were entitled to take out certificates—that the dates of their admissions into the several courts were to be discovered and inserted in the appropriate columns—that regulations were to be prepared for carrying the office into full effect—that the forms of the declarations which would be required were to be sent to every practitioner—that a book was to be formed for the insertion of the facts contained in those declarations—that the truth of those facts had to be verified in every instance—that no less than 10,000 certificates had to be framed in pursuance of those facts: a plan had to be formed of distributing those certificates within a very few days, without inconvenience to the Profession from pressure or delay—and that all these arrangements had to be completed and carried into effect in the short space of two months after the passing of the Act.

"By great exertion, however, the whole was accomplished, and the committee were repaid for the labour they had undergone by the success which in all its details attended the system they had planned, and by the satisfaction which they are rejoiced to find the Profession have expressed in reference to the arrangements adopted.

"Advantages of Attorneys and Solicitors Act.—Besides the palpable benefits which the Profession thus derive from unqualified persons being prevented from practising, the new Act secures many other important advantages both to the Profession and the public.

"Among these the following may be enumerated:—

"It renders permanent the appointment of examiners of persons applying to be admitted on the roll:

"It enables a graduate to serve one year of his articles with the agent in London:

"It simplifies the proceedings against attorneys who lend their names to unqualified persons, and against persons assuming to act as attorneys who are not duly qualified:

"It removes several technical difficulties in delivering bills of costs, and enables a solicitor to obtain the taxation of his own bill, and secure a judgment without the expense and delay of an action:

"It makes the Master's certificate final, and prevents a taxation from taking place after a verdict or writ of inquiry, or after twelve months from the delivery of the bill, except under special circumstances, and under any circumstances after twelve months' payment.

"And particularly it repeals enactments scattered over no less than sixty statutes, and consolidates into one Act the whole of the law relating to attorneys.

"Not the Profession only, but the public also, are benefited by this extensive consolidation; and the latter have a further advantage conferred upon them by the subjection of conveyancing costs to taxation—in reference to which the committee have taken every means in their power to secure to the Profession such allowances as have been long sanctioned in that branch of practice; and it will be satisfactory to the members to be informed that the Taxing Masters have adopted the rules which have long prevailed amongst solicitors upon that subject.

"In reference to the subject of costs, it will be convenient in this place to mention that the Taxing Masters in Chancery have determined to disallow on taxation, whether between party and party, or between solicitor and client, any fee to counsel's clerks, beyond the amount mentioned in the scale sanctioned by the Lord Chancellor and the other judges, which should exceed the rate of 25s. in every 50 guineas paid on the brief.

"Malpractice.—By the duties which the Attorneys Act imposes on the committee, their labours are increased in a variety of ways. The complaints relating to malpractice by attorneys, and of persons presuming to practise who are not duly qualified, have naturally become more numerous.

"Persons who had discontinued their certificates to practise in the superior courts, but who were in the habit of practising in the inferior courts and at the sessions and assizes, to the injury of the public and to the disgrace of the Profession, are now obliged to take out certificates; and their misconduct is more easily controlled, and better means of punishment are afforded.

"Renewal of Certificates.—Under the new Act, persons who omit or neglect to take out their certificates in due course are obliged to apply to the Court for permission to renew them—a proceeding which has been substituted for the former practice of re-admission: a regulation which requires a continual watchfulness on the part of the committee, and the necessity, in many instances, of opposing such renewals, the trouble and responsibility of which the committee cheerfully undertake, as it is manifest that the Profession must ultimately be thereby much improved, and its respectability increased in public estimation.

"With reference to this subject, it is important to mention that the Master of the Rolls, at the suggestion of the committee, has assimilated the practice of his Court, regarding notices of admission and renewals of certificates, to that of the Common Law Courts; thus introducing a uniformity of practice which will be found very convenient and advantageous."

After some other details relating to the affairs of the society, its lectures, library, and accounts, the report stated that "The committee could not conclude this statement of the labours of the past year without adverting to the great and valuable services rendered by their chairman, Mr. Foss, who was elected a second time to that office, on account of the several important matters then in progress, to which, as to all other subjects calculated to promote the interests of the Profession, he had devoted great ability and unwearied attention."

BIRMINGHAM LAW SOCIETY.

At the annual meeting of the Birmingham Law Society held on the 19th October, the following resolution was passed:—

"It having been notified that certain solicitors in this town have sent in written tenders competing for employment by a building club, and on a scale of charges greatly below those legally authorized, this meeting feels it necessary to express its severe condemnation of such conduct, as derogatory to the character of the legal profession, and calculated to endanger the interests of the public and the security of property; and to direct that this resolution be printed and sent to all the solicitors in Birmingham."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PRIVILEGES OF THE ATTORNEY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—A client of mine being in the custody of the police at Wolverhampton on a charge of concealing the birth of her child, I applied to the superintendent of police in that town for an interview with her prior to appearing before the magistrates in her behalf, but he refused to allow the interview, alleging as his excuse that the magistrates had made an order to the effect that no person should be permitted to see her. I then applied to the magistrates, who were sitting in court, in the presence of the superintendent, and they stated they had made no such order.

Still, however, the police officer openly refused the interview, partly as he said because the order had been made by the magistrates, and partly on his own responsibility. Shortly afterwards the accused was produced in court, and as a matter of course I advanced, with the intention of speaking to her, but in my progress I was interrupted by the police, who again repeated that I should not hold communion with her. I then moved the Court to afford me the facility of conferring with my client, and was about to speak of the irregularity of the interruption, but before I could advance many words, the senior magistrate, who, by the bye, is the deputy chairman of the Staffordshire Quarter Sessions, hastily and impetuously said, "You have already interrupted the Court; you are unnecessarily interfering with the time of the Court;—call the next case." And the next case was called; that case was the charge against my client, who, too weak to stand, was permitted to sit and hear all that police craft could urge against her, without possessing the advantage allowed in all the criminal courts in this country, save only the police court at Wolverhampton, viz. the assistance of her attorney, instructed by herself. And, Sir, the charge was investigated, but will you believe that the whole of it, or at least that alone which justified a committal, was based solely and exclusively upon answers wrung from the prisoner by questions put by the superintendent of police? The police were allowed to interrogate the accused, to invite her to make statements criminatory of herself, and these statements were made the means of committing her, but her attorney was prohibited, and the prohibition was sanctioned by the magistrates, speaking with his client. Here, however, the hardship of the case did not rest. The prisoner was committed for trial at the next assizes, and the amount of bail was stated by the magistrates' clerk; but even then I was not permitted to speak to her, nor allowed to ask her if bail could be procured; and the following morning she was conveyed to the county gaol, a distance of sixteen miles. There, of course, I have access to her.

The responsibility of the obstruction made to me throughout this matter rests as much with the magistrates as with the police.

The police, in the first instance, refused the interview under the impression that the magistrates had made the order. It is true the magistrates denied they had made such order, but the superintendent repeated in their presence that such an order had been made by them, and partly upon that order he still persisted in refusing me access.

If the magistrates had made no such order, why did not they correct the police for misrepresenting them? and when the police obstructed me in court, why did they not interfere? Sir, I conceive that access to his client, whether she be in the custody of the police power or at the bar of criminal justice, is the undoubted privilege of the attorney.

If I am wrong in this opinion, I shall be happy to have my mind disabused of the error, an error joined in by many of our brotherhood, of vast experience and extensive practice.

I am yours, &c

FORMS OF CONVEYANCE AND MORTGAGE.

(Vide Law Times of August 31.)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

Sir,—I quite agree with your correspondent Mr. Austin, that the words "in pursuance of the Act of 4 & 5 Vict. c. 21," or perhaps even "in pursuance of the statute for dispensing with a lease for a year," might be sufficient; but I totally differ from him in the opinion he expresses, that there can be no objection to, or doubt upon, the forms in question, owing to the substitution of the word "valid" for that of "effectual." For, 1stly, I consider it most objectionable, as a general principle, to misdescribe the title, no less than the body, of a statute, and more particularly so when the title as misrecited is marked (as in the forms referred to) with inverted commas; and, 2ndly, I must think that considerable doubts might fairly arise as to the validity of the release in the form proposed, without the accompaniment of a lease for a year, the same not being stated to have been made in pursuance of the Act for dispensing with the necessity of a lease for a year, of the Act of 4 & 5 Vict. c. 21, or of the statute in question, by its true and correct title; and there being, in fact, no such statute as that recited or described in the forms alluded to. But whatever might be the decision of a Court upon the point, it cannot, I think, be disputed that it is at any rate desirable to call the attention of the Profession to the mistake, in order to the prevention of errors and the avoidance of all possible dispute or litigation.

I am, &c.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

These statements and suggestions of a correspondent signing himself "D." deserve attention :—

I do not agree with your numerous correspondents who advocate the use of a gown by attorneys when attending the public courts, for many reasons, but especially for the following, namely, the great inconvenience an attorney would be put to by wearing it in the passages of a crowded court, by his being obliged at sessions and assizes to be continually passing in and out of court to his witnesses or inn, and also in calling upon other attorneys and private persons in the county towns, for it must be well known that attorneys at a distance generally make many other appointments to transact business at the times when assizes and sessions are held. I consider the much better plan to prevent "sham attorneys," and to uphold the respectability of the Profession, would be the formation of a mess similar to that of the Bar, and that the Court should require all attorneys engaged in appeals or prosecutions on either side to enter their names in a list, copies of which should not be given to any party except an attorney, and the production whereof to the court-keepers should admit the bearer to that part of the court appropriated to the Profession. But a very great evil is the small portion of room allotted for attorneys. At Hereford there is room for eight or ten only, which is in general filled before the court is opened; the same applies to Shrewsbury; but as regards the Monmouthshire Sessions Court, which is held at Usk, where I have heard of sixteen and seventeen parish appeals being entered at a sessions, and where the calendar is invariably very heavy, there is not any place at all appropriated for the Profession, who are obliged to stand in a narrow passage (thronged to excess by witnesses, friends of prisoners, &c.) behind their counsel, with whom they can only communicate over the back of their seats, which are at least four feet high, and there is not any place upon which the attorneys can arrange or open their papers. I have attended these latter sessions twice upon appeals: and the pressure of the crowd, the annoyance suffered by the attorneys, and the great inconvenience to which they are put, are a disgrace to the parties having the control of the funds of the county.

Until attorneys are better accommodated in the courts, it would be useless to wear gowns, which, in such courts as Usk, would be torn from their backs before they arrived near the bench.

At Worcester a much better arrangement exists, there being several seats allotted to attorneys, on which the word "attorneys" is painted, and I have never experienced any inconvenience in these courts.

I do hope that, for the respectability of the Profession, and for the interest of their clients, a much better arrangement will soon be introduced for the accommodation of the attorneys in the several courts of assizes and sessions.

THE LAW TIMES.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1844.

THE WINTER CIRCUIT.

The excessive inconvenience of this arrangement is beginning to be seriously felt. To the Profession it is an unmitigated annoyance; to Grand and Petty Juries a vexation which they express in the most emphatic manner by seizing every excuse to keep at home. The consequences to the administration of the law are still more pernicious. Just as the legal year has commenced, after the long vacation has accumulated business which cannot by any contrivance be got through in the Term, the judges are hurried out of town, there can be no sittings to lighten the arrears, judgments are deferred, and the entire legal business of the country is suspended, to the infinite inconvenience and serious loss of suitors.

On the other hand, it is impossible to deny that justice and humanity demand a Winter Assize, or a substitute for it, to prevent the manifest cruelty of incarcerating persons charged with crimes for many months before their trials.

In this state of affairs, the query presents itself to everybody whether, the evil admitted, it might not be remedied by some less clumsy and inconvenient contrivance than a Winter Assize.

The Judges, among others, appear to have turned their attention to the subject, and we find Mr. Baron Alderson putting forth a proposition in his charge to the Grand Jury at Winchester, in the following terms :—

Mr. Baron Alderson, in his charge to the grand jury, said, it could hardly be expected that they should have so good an attendance even as they had to-day at an assize at so unusual and inclement a period of the year; but he feared it was one of the consequences which arose from the increase of crime, that it had become necessary to have a larger measure of delivering the gaols by a more frequent assize. He sincerely regretted it on their accounts, and most certainly on his own, that they were brought together. But they must submit, as he presumed it was for the public good. He did not think, however, that the calendar of this county presented any particular reason for their being there that day; it did not contain a large number of prisoners who might not have been tried at the sessions. No doubt they must consider this as a temporary measure, otherwise it should exist throughout the kingdom, for he could not see any good reason why a prisoner in the gaol of Hampshire should be discharged, while a prisoner in the gaol of Wiltshire should be detained; if it was good for one, it must be so for all; therefore it must be a general arrangement, or cease to exist. Let them, then, see what was the real evil to be remedied. The real evil was the long interval between the summer and spring assizes, and the short interval between the spring and summer assizes. The real remedy one would necessarily expect would be making these intervals equal. The question was, whether that could be done? There was an interval of time which began on the 11th of January (the first day of Hilary Term) and the 15th of April (which was the first day of Easter Term). That was an interval of time occupied by three things: first, by Hilary Term, which lasted three weeks, then by the sitting after, which took four weeks, and the residue of the spring circuit. Now, if the spring circuit should be put first, Hilary Term second, and the sitting third, that would make the intervals between the different assizes equal. That appeared to him to be a very simple remedy.

This suggestion would meet the mischief partially, but not entirely, and undoubtedly it would have inconveniences of its own. Its effect would be to throw three Terms together; in fact, to make one long term from March to July, and another short one in November. Still we should have the evil of protracted assizes; still there would be the necessity for local courts.

The perplexity of Government and Judges upon this matter really surprises us. The remedy seems to us so obvious, so easy, that we are astonished how any person could meditate for a moment upon the mischief without lighting upon the cure, which lies close at hand, and may be adopted without changing one existing arrangement, without the slightest inconvenience in any quarter, but with many actual advantages added to the removal of the mischiefs at present complained of.

This obvious remedy is the reform of the Quarter Sessions Courts, by extending their jurisdiction in criminal cases to all offences but murder, and in civil cases to all actions where the damages sought to be recovered do not exceed 20*l*. To permit this extension to be made satisfactorily, it will be necessary, of course, to place a lawyer in the chair, and to give the courts precisely the same powers as are enjoyed by the superior courts, subject only to an appeal.

This arrangement, so easy, so obvious, yet so effective, is subject to no one objection that we have heard. All to whom it is named admit its excellence, and no other reason has yet been alleged for not adopting it than that it would meet the active hostility of the magistracy, who would consider it a curtailment of their dignity.

We do not believe that any such feeling would actuate that useful body to oppose a measure so manifestly for the public advantage, even if their importance at Sessions were to be somewhat diminished. But we deny that it would so affect them. We do not propose to dispense with them entirely. They would still attend as now, still sit upon the judgment-seat, still take part in the proceedings, the only change being, that instead of electing a member of their own body for chairman, their choice should be limited to the body of lawyers of a certain standing. We will not believe that the Parliament would reject so reasonable a proposition, and one so fraught with advantage to the whole country, merely because it might possibly derogate a trifle from the self-importance of two gentlemen in each county, for we repeat that the chairmen only would be affected by the substitution of lawyers for laymen as judges, while the whole body of the magistracy and their courts would gain vastly in dignity and importance by their extended jurisdiction, and the increased respect that would attend their proceedings.

Again we entreat the Law Societies throughout the kingdom to direct attention to the subject, and urge it upon the Government and the Parliament before the Local Courts Bill shall have produced irremediable mischief.

And certainly the Law Amendment Society could not employ itself more usefully than in the preparation of a complete measure for effecting the object we have described, to be placed in the hands of the Government as a substitute for their County Courts and Winter Assize.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The law of last session is producing the most disastrous effects throughout the country. Its practical result has been to rob creditors of all their debts not amounting to 20*l*. The loss has fallen with especial severity upon the class of small tradesmen who could least afford it, and who now find themselves suddenly deprived of their little properties by a law which came upon them without reasonable time being afforded them to consider its effects and express to Parliament their practical opinions of its probable working. Every attorney finds that if a debt be less than 20*l*. he must advise his client to abandon it rather than incur expenses in a vain attempt to recover it. Debtors everywhere thrust out their tongues at their creditors, and fling in their faces the bungling measure of Lord Brougham. Cheating has received the sanction of law, and flourishes accordingly.

We are in favour of the entire abolition of imprisonment for debt; but to the partial abolition of it, as effected by Lord Brougham, we have two objections. First, that it has taken away the creditor's remedy against the person, without substituting a sufficient remedy against the property and a due punishment for fraud; and secondly, that it was done without proper notice given to those whose interests were to be affected by it. It was quite forgotten by Lord Brougham, in his eagerness to defeat the matured measure of his rival Lord Cottenham, that throughout the country credit had been given upon the faith of an existing law, that extended to the creditor a powerful remedy in the hold he had upon the debtor's person. Creditors were entitled to such a notice of the change before it was finally effected, as might have enabled them to recover the debts they had permitted to grow on the faith of the law. If after that notice they had given credit, it would have been with a knowledge of the consequences, and they would have had nobody but themselves to blame for it. But how could they have anticipated that their security would have been taken from them without warning, or substitute given?

Lord COTTENHAM'S measure, which abolished imprisonment for debt, provided efficient remedies against the property, and severe punishment for fraud. With such substitutes as he had given, the change would have been beneficial to the creditor as well as to the honest debtor. Our readers will remember how Lord BROUGHAM pounced upon this admirable bill, and prevailed upon the Lords to aid him in so mangling it that it was disowned by its parent, deforming it by some crotchets of its own, and thus sending it forth to perplex the lawyers, trouble the judges, rob creditors, reflect disgrace upon the Legislature, and please none but fraudulent debtors, to whom it is in fact a bill of indemnity.

We trust that the Legislature will be deluged with petitions praying for an entire reconstruction of this mischief-making law, and the restoration of the original provisions framed by the lawyer-like and experienced mind of Lord COTTENHAM.

REPEAL OF THE CERTIFICATE DUTY.

WE trust that the Attorneys will be alive to their own interest, and urge upon Parliament, during the coming session, their claims to relief from a most unjust and grievous burden—the annual certificate duty. No good reason can be assigned why they should be singled out for special taxation. Wherefore are they to contribute more to the national funds than the barrister, the surgeon, or the clergyman? This impost was cruel enough before the Income Tax, but added to the latter, which falls so hardly upon industry, it becomes intolerable. It is, in fact, a double income tax laid upon the lawyers, with this added injustice, that it falls the most heavily on those who can least afford it; that it is not proportioned to means, but that the same sum is exacted from him who earns a hundred pounds as upon him whose gains are one thousand pounds per annum.

It used to be alleged, in support of this tax, that the profits of the lawyers were greater than those of other professions. Since our law reformers have curtailed costs, this cannot be urged with truth.

We will not believe that, with a surplus revenue, the Government or the Parliament would refuse to listen to a claim so manifestly just. But we are aware also that justice alone will not command a hearing with statesmen. It must be backed by the power to enforce attention. That power the lawyers possess. The representation is virtually in their hands. United, they might command the Parliament and the Government. On this occasion let them be united, and resolve to support no member who will not vote for a redress of their great grievance. With this resolution let them first go to the Ministry as a body, and then individually to the representatives of their several localities, with respectful but firm remonstrances, and we would wager large odds upon a successful issue.

Let the Law Societies straightway apply themselves to the work.

ADVERTISING ATTORNEYS.

OUR readers will remember how last week we stated that, in consequence of our attention having been directed to an advertisement that was appearing in our columns from Mr. BUCHANAN, soliciting agencies in bankruptcy, and conceiving such advertisement to be somewhat unprofessional, we had directed the Publisher to discontinue it, and to return to Mr. BUCHANAN the money he had paid for its future insertions.

We have received from Mr. BUCHANAN the following letter, to which, of course, we readily give a place. It is his defence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I am not a little surprised at my name being so prominently displayed in the leading article of your paper on the 30th ult. In reply, I beg to object, first, that the advertisement complained of is not within the class denounced by you, inasmuch as it is directed solely to the Profession, and not to the public, and the advantages and convenience of bankruptcy and insolvency business being transacted by solicitors who have devoted much time and attention to the points of practice have been often felt and personally acknowledged to me by many of the leading members of the Profession! The advertisement is not one seeking for general agency, but is expressly limited to a particular branch of business.

Secondly, I submit that a communication from the editor or publisher ought to have been conveyed to me, stating that such an advertisement was considered objectionable, before parading my name in so unfair a manner, and, by implication, classing me with non-professional quacks.

In conclusion, I beg to observe that no person is more ready than myself to bow to the opinion of the Profession at large, and if any correspondent considers the advertisement objectionable, that alone is a sufficient inducement with me to withdraw it from any publication for the future.

I am yours, &c.

Dec. 2, 1844. W. R. BUCHANAN.

Although we can by no means assent to Mr. BUCHANAN'S assertion, that the advertisment was allowable because it was addressed to the Profession and not to the public (Mr. CLARKE'S, for which he paid so severe a penalty, was no other), we cannot but express sincere gratification at the very becoming manner in which Mr. BUCHANAN has met the complaint. He declares his anxiety to acquiesce in any rules of professional etiquette that may be established, and to bow to the opinion of any correspondent that such an advertisement is contrary to its code, and instantly to withdraw it. This is the way to maintain the dignity of the Profession. Where the rules are unwritten it cannot be but that sometimes they will be violated in sheer ignorance, forgetfulness, or doubts as to their limits.

In such an error there is no shame, provided it be retracted as soon as it is pointed out. It was well said by the moralist, that "true greatness consists not in never falling, but in knowing how to rise again." The maxim is applicable in all the affairs of life. There is no man who does not sometimes err; the utmost we can expect is, that error shall be acknowledged and retrieved. This, Mr. BUCHANAN has done with a readiness that proves him to have acted with no wrong intent, but really questioning whether his advertisement was not permissible. Rather than a doubt should be entertained about it, he withdraws it.

This case, and that of Mr. CLARKE, in both of which there was a candour of admission and a readiness of retractation infinitely creditable to them, are full of promise for the Profession. They prove that the necessity for greater strictness of professional bearing is becoming a fixed opinion; the example which they have set in instant withdrawal of that which was deemed obnoxious, must have a most beneficial effect upon others who might have meditated proceeding some steps further than they had done.

It was for this reason that we did not privately withdraw the advertisement; the offence, if such it was, had been public; it was already known to the whole Profession, and had incurred their censure. To remove it in silence would have been to have hazarded a charge of partiality in the treatment of a document that had appeared in our own columns, and it would have left upon Mr. BUCHANAN all the censure which he has entirely removed by his subsequent conduct.

CONVICTION OF A SHAM LAWYER.

WE have only time to direct the attention of our readers to the report of a trial at the Central Criminal Court, which resulted in the conviction of one of the Sham Lawyers, whose doings we had brought under the notice of the Profession, and his sentence to transportation for twenty-one years.

Let the rest of the Tribe beware. The eyes of the Profession are upon them.

VERULAM SOCIETY.

AT length the first number of the Practice Cases is ready. It will be published on Wednesday, together with the sixth number of the Real Property and Conveyancing Cases.

The second number of Practice Cases, the fifth number of Magistrates' Cases, and the second number of the Registration Appeals, all containing the cases of the last Term, will be ready in a few days.

Of the text-books, the following are in preparation:—The Practice of Conveyancing, the Practice of the Law of Vendors and Purchasers, and the Practice of Wills, Administrations, &c.

It is proposed to publish the Annual Digest of the Reports and Statutes upon a new plan, so as to preserve a sort of Index to all the Laws made by Parliament and the Judges during the year, under the old familiar title of The Year Book, which every true Lawyer will be glad to see revived in so appropriate a shape.

Arrangements are in progress for bringing out the Legal Cyclopædia in parts, upon the plan originally proposed.

The following new members have been enrolled during the past week:—

Phillips, Andrew, Shiffnal, Salop.
Campion, W. J., York.

THE FRENCH BAR.

The Councils of Discipline.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

I cannot enter upon the subject of the Councils of Discipline without saying a few words on the Bar itself. I shall not go as far back as the ancient bench, which before the Revolution shone so conspicuously by its virtues and its eloquence; its annals are intimately connected with the history of the parliaments which formed sovereign courts in the different provinces, lending their assistance in turn to kings against the encroachments of the nobility, and to the people against the invasion of royalty, particularly during the reign of Louis XV. The Bench of olden times disappeared with the ancient parliaments, and was wrecked, like so many other institutions, at the Revolution. New courts—the establishment and organization of which I shall shortly send you an account of, in a series of articles I am preparing—new courts supplied the place of the ancient tribunals of justice. At first there were no jurisconsults to plead before them. The barristers who had escaped the revolutionary storm exercised their profession as simple citizens, their only recommendations being their integrity and their talents. There was no Bar, properly so called; there were only individuals exercising the profession of Barristers; no legal tie united them, and, insulated as they were, they were devoid of power and strength. This state of things was dangerous both for judges and litigants, for these men had it in their power to deceive justice and their clients; yet it was most unwillingly that the First Consul appointed official defendants at the courts, and these were only a species of lawyers. Barristers, whose very studies make them enemies to all despotism, Napoleon detested most cordially; for it is well known that he occasionally loved to set the laws at defiance.

Such was the condition of things in 1810, when, upon the representations of Cambacères, High Chancellor of the Empire, and formerly a barrister, Buonaparte consented to reorganize the Bar in France, and issued a decree to that effect.

The ordinance of the 14th of December, 1810, bears the stamp of the suspicious character of its author. The first rolls of the barristers appointed to the Cours Royales and to the Tribunaux de Première Instance, were drawn up by the Presidents and Procureurs du Roi at these different courts of justice, and were composed of all those who had formerly obtained degrees in the universities, or who had exercised for a length of time the profession of jurisconsults. The nomination of the bâtonnier belonged to the Attorney-General. The Order could only meet with the consent of the Attorney-General, and for the purpose of the election of the members of the Council of Discipline, without, however, the power of deliberating on any subject whatever without incurring the penalty attached to illegal meetings by the Penal Code. Barristers could not plead before other Courts than the one to which they were appointed, without permission from the Minister of Justice. In short, the restrictions placed on the liberty of the Bar in 1810 were too numerous to enumerate here, and were inconsistent with its dignity. In 1822, the 20th of November, a new decree issued from the throne, modified with improving the state of affairs existing since 1810. The most important article suppressed the Councils of Discipline in Bars composed of less than twenty members, investing the tribunals themselves with the attributes of the Councils of Discipline. But without further details, the following is the decree of the 27th of August, 1830, which is the barristers' share in the conquest of the Revolution of July:—

"Louis Philippe, &c. &c.

"Upon the report of our Keeper of the seals, Minister and Secretary of the State in the department of Justice.

"According to the law of the 22nd Ventose, year twelve, to the decree of the 14th December, 1810, and to the ordinance of the 20th November, 1822.

"Considering that just and numerous reclamations have been made for some time against the rules which govern the exercise of the profession of barrister.

"That a final organization necessarily requires some delays.

"That nevertheless, it is of consequence to put an end at once, by temporary arrangements, to the abuses which are most important and the most generally felt.

"Taking into consideration, upon this subject, the wishes expressed by a great number of the Bars in France, I have ordained, and do ordain, as follows:—

"Art. 1. Dating from the publication of this present ordinance, the Councils of Discipline shall be elected by the assembly of the order composed of all the barristers inscribed on the roll. The election will take place by ballot, and upon the majority of the members present.

"Art. 2. The Councils of Discipline shall be temporarily composed of five members in courts where the number of barristers inscribed is under twenty, including those where the functions of the said councils have been hitherto exercised by the tribunals; of seven members, if the number of barristers inscribed is from thirty to fifty; of nine, if the number is from fifty to a hundred; of fifteen, if it is above a hundred; and of twenty-one in Paris.

"Art. 3. The bâtonnier of the order shall be elected by the same assembly, and by a separate ballot upon a complete majority of before the election of the Council of Discipline.

"Art. 4. Dating from the same period, any barrister inscribed on the roll can plead before all the Cours Royales, and before all the cours of the kingdom requiring no other authorization whatever than the fulfilment of the dispositions of Art. 295 of the Code of Criminal Institution."

"Art. 5. Upon the shortest possible delay, there shall be a final revisal of the laws and rules which regulate the exercise of the profession of barrister."

Hitherto Art. 5 has not been acted upon, and the necessity of it has not been generally felt, as the Bar is satisfied with the security of the power of electing its judges and its chief.

With the exception of the above ordinance, the Bar continues to be regulated by the decrees of 1810 and 1822, and they contain the clauses which concern the Council of Discipline.

"The attributes of the Council of Discipline consist:—1st. In pronouncing on difficulties relating to the inscription on the roll of the order. 2nd. In exercising the watchfulness which the honour and the interests of the order require. 3rd. In applying when it is necessary the measures of discipline authorized by the rules.

"The Council of Discipline decides upon the admission into the noviciate the licentiates in law, who have taken the oath of barrister at the Cours Royales; upon the inscription on the rolls of barristers who remain novices after the expiration of their noviciate (des avocats stagiaires après l'expiration de leur stage), and upon the rank of those who, after having been inscribed on the roll, and having relinquished the exercise of their profession, present themselves to resume it again.

"The Councils of Discipline are bound to maintain sentiments of loyalty and fidelity to the constitutional monarchy and institutions and principles of moderation, of disinterestedness, and of integrity, upon which rest the honour of the order of advocates.

"They watch over the morals and conduct of the novice barristers.

"The Councils of Discipline, upon the complaints that are addressed to them, are officially to repress all infractions and faults committed by the barristers inscribed on the roll.

"These said regulations do not abrogate the tribunals from repressing those offences committed at their courts by the barristers.

"The exercise of the right of discipline does not prevent proceedings which the public ministry or individuals might consider themselves called upon to take for the suppression of deeds which constitute offences or crimes.

"The penalties of discipline are:—

"The warning,

"The reprimand,

"The temporary suspension,

"The striking off the roll.

"No temporary suspension can exceed the term of one year.

"No penalty of discipline can be inflicted, unless the accused barrister has been heard or called with a week's notice.

"Any decision of the Council of Discipline pronouncing temporary suspension, or striking off the roll, shall be submitted, under three days, to the Attorney-General, who will insure and inspect the execution of it.

"The Attorney-General can, if he thinks proper, require a copy of the decisions pronouncing a warning or reprimand.

"The Attorney-General can likewise require a copy of any decision by which the Council of Discipline shall have absolved the accused barrister.

"In cases of temporary suspension or striking off the rolls, the condemned barrister can appeal to the Cour du Ressort.

"The right of appealing against decisions given by the Court of Discipline, in cases above-mentioned, belongs also to the Attorney-Generals.

"The appeal, either of the Attorney-General or of the condemned barrister, will only be lawful, provided it is made within ten days after the decision of the Court of Discipline has been communicated to them by the bâtonnier.

"The Courts will judge the appeal in a general assembly, and in the Chamber of Council, as it is prescribed in Art. 52 of the law of the 20th April, 1810, concerning the measures of discipline to be taken with regard to the members of courts and tribunals.

"When the appeal has been lodged by the condemned barrister, the Courts can pronounce a heavier penalty if they think proper, although the Attorney-General has not himself appealed."

To be admitted to the exercise of the profession of barrister, or to enter the magistracy, the degree of licentiate in law is necessary, and can only be obtained after three years' studies, and after passing several examinations before one of the nine "Facultés de Droit," which exist in France. Moreover, the licentiates undergo a period of probation, called noviciate (stage), during which they must frequently attend the courts.

"The noviciate is to last three years.

"The noviciate can be made before divers Courts, without, however, being interrupted for more than three months.

"The Councils of Discipline can prolong the duration of the noviciate, according to circumstances.

"The 'avocats stagiaires' are not to form a part of the roll.

"The licentiates in law are to be received barristers by the Cours Royales; they take the oath in the following terms:—

"'I swear to be faithful to the King, and to obey the constitutional charter; never to say or publish any thing, either as defender or counsel, contrary to the laws, rules, good morals, the safety of the state, and public peace; and never to fail in the respect due to the Courts, and to the public authorities.'"

As there is no bar of justice without a counsel (defense), and as in criminal matters every thing is void where the accused has no defender, barristers can be officially appointed by the Court of Assizes; and

"The barrister officially appointed as counsel for the accused cannot refuse his assistance without assigning his reasons to the Court of Assizes, who can pronounce one of the aforesaid penalties if the case requires it.

"The profession of advocate is incompatible with the avocations of the judicial order, except to fulfil the office of temporary judge; with the offices of préfet, sous-préfet, secretary-general of the préfecture, sheriff, notary, and attorney; with all employments to which a salary is attached; with all financial occupations, and with all kinds of negociations. All persons exercising the calling of agents are excluded from the profession.

"Any attack a barrister might allow himself to make, either in his pleadings or in his writings, upon religion, the monarchical principles of the charter, the laws of the kingdom, or the established authorities, shall be repressed immediately upon the demand of the public ministry, by the tribunal before which the case appears, and which shall pronounce one of the penalties above-mentioned, without detriment to extraordinary proceedings, if there be occasion for them."

Such are the principal rules which govern the Bars in France; there are, besides, customs which are generally respected; even the ordinance of 1822 states that—

"The customs observed in the Bar, relating to the rights of advocates in the exercise of their profession, are to be retained."

These customs are mostly suggested by deferential and suitable sentiments, and a proper sense of right and dignity. Such is the right of pleading with the head covered before all the Courts, even the highest. The office of a barrister is considered as an asylum where bailiffs cannot enter to make any notification to clients; and, finally, a barrister is not compelled, even when subpœnaed as witness, to reveal what may have been confided to him as advocate; and this jurisprudence has been consecrated by the Court of Cassation.

THE CRITIC.

New Books.

A Complete Series of Precedents in Conveyancing, and of Common and Commercial Forms, in alphabetical order, adapted to the present state of the Law and the Practice of Conveyancing; with copious Prefaces, Observations, and Notes on the several Deeds. To which are added, the latest Real Property Acts, with Notes, and the Decisions thereon. By GEORGE CRABB, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. Third edition, revised and greatly enlarged. In 2 vols. London, 1845. Butterworth.

Concise Precedents in Conveyancing; applied to the Act for simplifying the Transfer of Property, 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 76; with practical Notes and Observations on the Act. By CHARLES DAVIDSON, of the Inner Temple, Esq. Barrister-at-Law, &c. London, 1845. Maxwell and Co.

WE receive repeated inquiries as to the utility of both the works named above, and whether reliance might be placed upon them. Short forms of conveyancing are in such continual request in the attorney's office—when good, they are so very useful—that the interest excited by the announcement of a volume professing to supply them will readily be understood by those who have experienced the want of them. The recent statute, too, has destroyed confidence in existing precedents, and practitioners are anxiously looking for authorities to guide them under its dubious provisions.

Crabb's Precedents are already well known to the Profession. Two editions have been exhausted in a very short period, a decisive proof of the high estimation in which they are held, and how useful and satisfactory they have been found in practice. Precedents, beyond any other portion of the lawyer's library, are enhanced in value by the sanction of time. Their defects are seldom patent; if faulty, the error is rarely discovered until long afterwards, when some change of property calls for a close investigation of a title. Hence it is that the Profession naturally clings to old, and is suspicious of new, forms; it requires the precedents to be really such, in the strictest sense of the word; they must be tried and proved; and then they are entitled to confidence and obtain it.

This sanction of time—this test of experience—recommend Mr. Crabb's Precedents, and that recommendation is of more worth than the testimony of a reviewer. It is sufficient of itself.

We believe that there are few, if any, of our readers to whom this work is not already familiar either from personal acquaintance or by repute. It will, therefore, be unnecessary to describe it at any length. Enough to say of it generally that its contents are arranged alphabetically, so that easy reference can be had to any subject, and to each class of precedent are prefixed some introductory remarks, setting forth succinctly the existing law, and the cautions to be observed by the conveyancer. There is moreover a table of cases and of abbreviations, an appendix of statutes, and an elaborate index.

The third edition, just published, presents a multitude of improvements, giving to it almost the value of a new work. The original design has been largely extended, both in number of precedents and prefatory matter. All the recent decisions and statutes have been noted, and four entirely new titles have been added, to wit, Auctions, Bills of Exchange, Coveyances, and Deeds. The Transfer of Property Act has received due attention, and it has been enriched with ample and learned notes. The work, thus improved, is indeed something more than a collection of precedents. It is an able treatise on the Law of Real Property, illustrated by examples, and as such may be read with advantage by the student as well as consulted by the practitioner.

We might extract from these learned volumes much that would instruct our readers, but with so many other claims upon our columns at this moment we resist the temptation, more especially as we are noticing a third edition. Perhaps hereafter we may include in "the Property Lawyer" two or three passages we had marked. It will be enough to add to this account of it a hearty recommendation of Crabb's Precedents to those who have not yet made acquaintance with them, and to those who are already familiar with the former, we offer assurance that they will find this third edition is a vast improvement upon its predecessors.

As for Mr. Davidson's concise Precedents, we must candidly confess that we are very loath to express an opinion. They are untried and unproved. To the experienced they will be useful, but we would not place new forms in the hands of the inexperienced. The precedents in this volume read well; they are seemingly sound, but to pronounce them safe it would be necessary to sit down and weigh every word, a labour we are by no means inclined to perform. Our duty is done when we announce its publication and describe its plan; we will not incur the responsibility upon such imperfect xamination as we can give to it of recommending bad forms or condemning good ones. The reader should form his own judgment, and the volume is small, and of such trifling cost, that if it be not found satisfactory in practice, the loss will not be a consideration. Some of the forms at least will be useful. They will supply hints which a skilful practitioner will wor' upon.

Mr. Davidson commences with an Introduction, in which he states, that,

> It is to be clearly understood that the present work contains no experimental or fanciful precedents, and that it is confined wholly to the object of simplifying the forms in common use, and retrenching their redundant expressions. It is believed that nearly every precedent in the book will (when the parcels are of moderate length) be contained in a single skin, and that hardly any will exceed two; but except in those cases in which the new Act has authorized an alteration, the precedents differ in no material respect from those which have been long and constantly used by the Profession.

He adds, that the principal points in which they differ from the old forms are that all unnecessary recitals have been dispensed with; the statement of a nominal consideration has been omitted, the operative words are used in the present tense only; the parcels are described by reference to a schedule and map, the general words have been abridged; in limiting powers no restriction has been imposed in their exercise, except that it shall be by deed; in framing covenants, the word "covenant" only is used, and the others shortened, and so have been the power to appoint new trustees, and the other powers.

The Introduction is followed by some observations upon the Transfer of Property Act, and then the Precedents are given with notes illustrative of the text. An Index completes the work, the utility of whose design none will dispute, however they may differ as to the merits of its execution. *

The Law Review and Quarterly Journal of British and Foreign Jurisprudence. No. I. November, 1844. London. O. Richards.

From the title, the introductory essay, and the subjects of the greater portion of the articles in this first number, we presume that The Law Review is intended to be that which is implied by its name, a "Journal of Jurisprudence;" in which we contemplate a periodical that shall treat of the making and administration, rather than the practice of the law; of that which is the peculiar business of statesmen and legislators, instead of that which relates to the business of lawyers. If we have rightly comprehended the design of The Law Review, it is to be cordially welcomed as a valuable addition to our legal periodicals, because it occupies a field entirely new, and in which, as we believe, there is abundant room for talent to exert itself, and where an audience will be found sufficiently enlightened to appreciate, and numerous enough to reward, the enterprise.

Being thus, The Law Review is ot, as some have supposed, a rival, but a coadjutor, of The Law Magazine, the latter addressing itself mainly to the interpretation of the law as it is, the former to the investigation of the law as it ought to be. Each has its own distinct department sufficiently large to engross its attention without trespassing upon the domain of the other; and if we might take the liberty of whispering a word of advice to the editors of both, it would be that each should confine himself to his own province; for we are satisfied that thus he would consult not only the convenience of the profession, but the true welfare of his publication.

We have no authentic knowledge on the matter, but rumour reports that The Law Review owes its parentage to the Society for the Amendment of the Law, and that Lord Brougham is, if not its editor, its chief patron and contributor. And inspection seems to confirm the report. The first advertisement is a prospectus of the Society. The essay on "Resistance to the Gradual Improvement of the Law" reads very like the writing of Lord Brougham, and we feel almost assured that the "Memoir of Lord Abinger" proceeds from his pen. Indeed we understand that he did contribute no less than five articles to the present number.

The subjects discussed in this number are various and well chosen. The first treats of the "Science and Study of Jurisprudence," and presents an outline of the science, its divisions and subdivisions, intended to be the foundation of future essays, in which the details will be fully considered. It should be read by all who desire to be lawyers in the enlarged meaning of the term.

The second article is written with considerable power. It is entitled, "Resistance to the gradual Improvement of the Law." Many of the modern irrational demands for sweeping changes in the law are attributed to Lord Eldon's resistance to needful improvements. The purport of the paper is to persuade law-makers to "join knowledge and caution with zeal for amending our legal system." This is obviously from the pen of Lord Brougham. Would that he would practice as well as preach!

The third article treats "Of the Distinction between Law and Fact," Harrison's Digest being the text. It is stated that this Digest contains about 44,000 cases, reported from 1756 to 1843, including a space of eighty-seven years only. This is an annual average of 500. But of late the increase has been much more rapid, and the present progress is estimated at no less than 1,500 per annum. An inquiry into the causes of so vast an increase of authorities cannot but be interesting and useful. As the commencement of such an investigation, the present inquiry is limited to the distinction between matter of law and matter of fact.

"The Law of Fees and Costs" is the theme of the fourth article; but it is not proposed to treat it as a question for the office, but as one "of comparative jurisprudence, that is, to shew the diversities of practice on this point, which have existed, not only in different countries, and at different periods, but between different tribunals of the same country, at the same time; to trace these historically, and thence to deduce principles by which the fitness of any proposed measure for regulating law expenses, under a given state of circumstances, may safely be tested." An imposing array of legal and historical lore has been adduced by the writer, but the essay yields no materials for extract.

A Memoir of Lord Abinger next engages attention. From this we take a few passages, which will amuse our readers. They cannot fail to recognize the authorship:—

LORD ABINGER AS A LAWYER.

Few men have ever appeared in the profession of the law endowed with a greater store of the qualities required to form an accomplished advocate than James Scarlett, afterwards raised to the Bench as Lord Chief Baron, and to the Peerage as Lord Abinger. His understanding was piercing and subtle; no man had more sagacity in seeing through obscure matters, or finding his way through conflicting difficulties, or reconciling contradictions, or dispelling doubts, or, if need were, of raising them; no man could bring more ingenuity to devise explanations, or overcome obstacles, or provide defence, or secure escape. Then he was, though naturally irritable, yet by habit completely master of his temper, always entirely self-possessed, hardly ever to be thrown off his guard by anger or vexation: and, habit becoming a second nature, he had all the external aspect and much of the reality of a placid good-humour, though this was drawn over a somewhat sensitive interior. He had thus in the largest measure these two great qualifications of the Nisi Prius leader—perfect quickness of perception and decision, and imperturbable self-possession.

THE ADVOCATES AT COMMON LAW AND AT EQUITY CONTRASTED.

There is the greatest difference between the two sides of Westminster Hall in the qualities which form the leading Advocate. In truth, Courts of Equity hardly know what the lead of a cause is; for each of three, or it may be four or five, counsel, go in much the same way over nearly the same ground; and it does not even follow that the junior takes the same view of the case with those who have gone before him. All the materials on which they have to work are fully known before they enter the court; their adversary's case is as much before them as their own; nothing can possibly arise for which they were not thoroughly prepared; and even were it possible to make any slip, as in meeting or proving unable to meet some new view of the case unexpectedly taken by the opposite advocate, or thrown out by the Court (a thing of very rare occurrence), abundant opportunities remain for supplying all defects and setting all oversights right. The words quick, ready, decisive, sudden, have therefore no application to equity practice, and are hardly intelligible in the courts where bills, answers, affidavits, and interrogatories reign.

It is far otherwise at Nisi Prius. What was all argument, all talk in Equity, is here all work, all action. What was all preparation and previous plan there, here is all the perception of the moment, the decision at a glance, the plan of the instant, the execution on the spot. The office of the leader here well deserves its name; he is every thing; his coadjutors are useful, but they are helps only: they are important, but as tools rather than fellow-workmen; they are often indispensable, but they are altogether subordinate. He is often wholly—in some degree he is always—uncertain beforehand what his own case is to be; he is still more uncertain of his adversary's. He comes into court with an account in his hand of what his witnesses are expected to swear, because his client has seen and examined them, which he himself has not; but he is necessarily uncertain that they will so swear, both because his client may have ill examined them, and because they may give a different account upon oath before the Court and jury. Then he is still more uncertain how far they may stand firm, how far they may be shaken upon cross-examination, and upon the examination by the judge. He is even uncertain of the effect his case and his witnesses may produce upon the judge and upon the jury. So far is the advocate at Nisi Prius in the dark as to his own case and witnesses. But of his adversary's he knows little or nothing; he may have to meet a story of which he had no kind of warning whatever; and he may have to protect his witnesses against evidence called to discredit them by proving that they have told a different story to others from that which they have told in court. Documents, letters, receipts, acquittances, releases, title-deeds, judgments, fines, recoveries—all may meet him, as well as unexpected witnesses; and on the spot he may have to devise and execute his measures of protection or of defence. It is needless to observe that this gives the greatest advantage to an advocate of quickness, sagacity, and decision; and that it is a just remark which likens the tact, and generally the practical skill and firmness, of the leader in jury trials, to the coup-d'œil of the leader in war.

Nor is this all. Far different from the effects of slip or blunder or oversight in equity are the consequences of the like mistakes or neglects at law; they are almost always irremediable, not seldom fatal. No relief is given against a verdict obtained by the miscarriage of counsel. Against a surprise in the adversary's case, or in the testimony of the witnesses of either side, there may be relief; but if the mishap was owing to the error of counsel, never. Thoughtless men have found fault with this rule; but were a contrary course pursued, the most careless transaction of all business would be one consequence, and another would be the giving business by favour or connection to the most incapable men. It is quite necessary that the client should, to some such extent and under some such qualification as has been mentioned, be bound by the conduct of his professional representative.

From what has been said it will at once appear, first, how difficult and how anxious is the position of a Nisi Prius leader; next, how small a portion of his needful qualification consists of mere eloquence. That which to the vulgar, the spectators at large, may seem the most important part of the whole, is in truth the leader's least important qualification. The object is to gain the cause; mere talk, if he spoke "with the tongues of men and of angels," would never get the verdict. By a great speech he may atone for minor erros in the management of the cause; for great slips, or great imperfections in the conduct of it, the eloquence of Demosthenes and Cicero combined could afford no compensation, nor any substitute. The importance of eloquence is admitted; with equal, or nearly equal conduct, the great speaker will have the advantage; but conduct without eloquence is safer by much to trust for the victory than eloquence without conduct. Mr. Wallace was a successful Nisi Prius advocate, with hardly any powers of speech; Mr. Wedderburn, afterwards Lord Loughborough, had but little success, though a very fine speaker; but Wallace was an excellent lawyer and a good leader of a cause; Wedderburn had so little law, that J. Lee said what he took in on the circuit at York had run through him before he got to Newcastle; and he was moreover an indifferent conductor of a cause.

SCARLETT AT NISI PRIUS.

What has just been said has prepared the reader for an admission that Mr. Scarlett was a more consummate leader in the conduct of a cause than in the eloquence wherewith he addressed the jury. Not that he was deficient in some of the greater qualities of the orator. He had a most easy and fluent style; a delivery free from all defects; an extremely sweet and pleasing voice—insomuch that a lady of good sense and of wit once said that as some people are asked to sing, Mr. Scarlett should be asked to speak, so agreeable and harmonious were his tones, though of little compass or variety. But he had far higher qualities than these, the mere external or ornamental parts of oratory. He had the most skilful arrangement of his topics, the quickest perception of their effect either upon the jury, the enemy, or the judge. Indeed he used to choose his seat while he ruled the Great Circuit (the Northern) second to that of which he had a rightful possession by his rank; he preferred the seat on the judge's left, because standing there he had the judge always in his eye as he spoke, and could shape his course with the jury by the effect he found he produced on My Lord. Then his reasoning powers were of a high order; they would have been of a higher, if he had not been too subtle and too fond of refining; so that his shot occasionally went over the head both of court and jury, to the no little comfort of his adversaries But when he had a great case in hand, or an uphill battle to fight, his argumentation was exceedingly powerful. Nor did he ever lessen its force either by diffusiveness or by repetition, or by the introduction of vulgar or puerile matter; his classical habits and correct taste preserved him from the one, his love of the verdict from the other. His language was choice; it was elegant, it was simple, it was not ambitious. Illustration he was a master of, unless when the love of refining was his own master, and then his illustration rather clouded than enlightened. He had considerable powers of wit and humour, without too much indulging in their display; and no man had a more quick sense and more keen relish of both. Hence he ever avoided the risks of any ridicule, and when treated with it himself shewed plainly how much he felt and how little he approved its application. The greater feats of oratory he hardly ever tried. He had no deep declamation, no impassioned effusion. He indulged in no stirring appeals either to pity or terror; he used no tropes or figures; he never soared so high as to lose sight of the ground, and so never feared to fall. But he was an admirable speaker, and for all cases except such as occur once in the course of several years, he was quite as great a speaker as could be desired. No man who understood what was going on in a trial ever saw the least defect in his oratory; and none could qualify the praise all gave his skill and his knowledge by a reflection on his rhetoric.

That skill and that knowledge were truly admirable. It really was impossible to figure any thing more consummate than this great advocate's address in the conduct of a cause. All the qualities which we set out with describing as going to form the Nisi Prius leader he possessed in unmeasured profusion. His sagacity, his sure tact, his circumspection, his provident care, his sudden sense of danger to his own case, his instantaneous perception of a weak point in his adversary's, all made him the most difficult person to contend against that perhaps ever appeared in Westminster Hall, when the object was to get or to prevent a verdict; and that is the only object of the advocate who faithfully represents his client, and sinks himself in that representative character. It is needless to add that no man ever was more renowned as a verdict-getter—to use the phrase of the Nisi Prius courts.

The columns of the LAW TIMES have already presented to its readers a memoir of Lord Abinger; it will, therefore, be unnecessary to do more than take from this amusing article some novelties which it contains.

ANECDOTES OF LORD ABINGER.

A country attorney perhaps paid him the highest compliment once when he was undervaluing his qualifications, and said—"Really there is nothing in a man getting so many verdicts who always has the luck to be on the right side of the cause." This reminds one of Partridge in Tom Jones, who thought Garrick was a poor actor, for any one could do all he did—"he was nothing of an actor at all."(a) His weight with the Court and jury was not unhappily expressed by another person when asked at what he rated Mr. Scarlett's value,—"A thirteenth juryman," was the answer. A remarkable instance is remembered in Westminster Hall of his acting in the face of the jury, at the critical moment of their beginning to consider their verdict. He had defended a gentleman of rank and fortune against a charge of an atrocious description. He had performed his part with even more than his accustomed zeal and skill. As soon as the judge had summed up, he tied up his papers deliberately, and with a face smiling and easy, but carefully turned towards the jury, he rose and said, loud enough to be generally heard, that he was engaged to dinner, and in so clear a case there was no occasion for him to wait what must be the certain event. He then retired deliberately, bowing to the Court. The prosecuting counsel were astonished at the excess of confidence or of effrontery,—nor was it lost upon the jury, who began their deliberation. But one of the juniors having occasion to leave the court, found that all this confidence and fearlessness had never crossed its threshold—for behind the door stood Sir James Scarlett trembling with anxiety, his face the colour of his brief, and awaiting the result of "the clearest case in the world" in breathless suspense.

Internal evidence of the authorship of this article may be found in the abuse of the Whigs. The defence set up for Mr. Scarlett's apostasy was this, that the Whigs did not sufficiently reward his services, therefore he was justified in abandoning his principles, and joining those whom he had previously asserted to be wrong. But that is Brougham morality; that is the spirit of our great law reformer. Here is an anecdote of SCARLETT'S VANITY.

One instance is recorded on the Northern Circuit of his overweening confidence betraying him, when matched against a party who was conducting his own cause. It was a case of libel, and no justification had been pleaded. He was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was throwing out assertions of the truth of the matter, which the judge interfered to check as wholly inadmissible in the state of the record. Mr. Scarlett, with his wonted smile of perfect, entire, and complacent confidence, said, "Oh, my lord, he is quite welcome to shew—what I know he cannot—that his slander was well founded." The man went on, and called a witness or two—nay, he was making much way in his proof, when Mr. Scarlett appealed to the judge for protection. "No (or rather Na)," said Mr. Baron Wood; "I won't—it's your own fault—why did you let him in?" The man proved his case and got a verdict, to the extreme annoyance of Mr. Scarlett. But this was a trifling matter compared with other consequences of the same foible. He made himself extremely unpopular, both in the Profession and in society, by the same course; for his was not, like Lord Erskine's weakness—a kindly, forbearing, recommending kind of vanity, which, if it sometimes made us smile, never gave pain, not even offence, because it never sought to rise by the depression of others. On the contrary, Lord Erskine, with hardly any exception, was the patron and foster-father of other men's merits, lauded their exertions, and enjoyed their success. Not so was Mr. Scarlett's self-esteem; he would rise by depressing others; he would allow nothing to be well done that any but one individual did; he would always intimate how it might have been better done, and would leave little doubt as to the artist whose superior excellence he had in his eye.

(a) "He the best player!" said Partridge with a contemptuous sneer. "Why I could act as well as he myself. I am sure if I had seen a ghost I should have looked in the very same manner, and done just as he did."—Tom Jones, book xvi. c. 5.

We conclude with Lord Brougham's opinion of LORD ABINGER AS A JUDGE.

The same defect was exceedingly injurious to his judicial qualities and reputation. He came late—too late—upon the Bench, and he was far from diminishing, by painstaking, the unavoidable consequences of this late promotion. He took the judicial office far too easily; he did not sufficiently work and labour, considering that it was a perfectly new duty which he had to perform—a duty less easily performed after a person has grown grey as an advocate. The consequence was, that he who had every one endowment for the constitution of a great judge,—quickness—sagacity—learning—integrity—legal habits—great knowledge of men—practice at the Bar of vast extent and infinite variety—good-nature withal and patience,—really made a very inferior judge to many who, having a more modest estimate of their own faculties, a greater respect for others, and a keener sense of the difficulties of their task, exerted those lesser faculties which they possessed far more strenuously than he did his much superior powers.

SOLICITORS' ACCOUNTS.—The system of Solicitors' Accounts advertised in our pages, not only precludes the previously existent necessity of resorting to the double entry, to avoid errors in the Account Current Ledger, but is far in advance of that system in its principle, as in the mode of its operation, and the number and importance of its results. It exactly and fully meets all the peculiarities of the case, making the most of the little leisure and instrumentality at solicitors' command, and, amidst all their disadvantages, places them in a better position than is enjoyed by any mercantile establishment in the kingdom; for, by one original entry and its transcript, it continuously, incidentally, and to himself exclusively, if such be his wish, will present to the principal the balances of his deposit, loan, profit and loss, cash-box, and banker's account; the extent, realizations, and cost of his business, and the value of that portion of his estate recorded and circulating in his books. It is a "Self-proving system" from beginning to end; the Journal and Cash-book contain on their four sides every item which passes into the correspondent sides of the Account Current Ledger, and with the Disbursement Book predicate and test its balances; the sum of the Disbursement Book and Agents' bills, so far as resolving into professional claims, and the totals of the inner column of the rough Bill-book, or "Business Ledger," also correspond; and the Cash-book, itself a system, demonstrates the accuracy of all its results, from folio to folio, and points out the entire Cash Balance, the proportion "available at the banker's," and that which "should be in the cash-box." By thus enabling the principal to ascertain at any time, and with certainty, every important feature of his business, it invests his accounts with an interest and an attractiveness hitherto unknown; and by convincing his clerks that their omissions and mistakes must come to light, it all but secures both their carefulness and integrity.—(See Advertisement.)

THE REPORTS.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Saturday, Nov. 30.

FRANCES ERMATINGER, widow of the late FRANCIS PERRY, deceased, as Testatrix to her minor Children, heirs of said FRANCIS PERRY, Appellant, v. BARTHOLOMEW CONRAD AUGUSTUS, Curator of the vacant succession of the late Honourable LEWIS GUGY, Respondent.

An action of account will not lie against the representative of a confidential agent, who has never been called on in his lifetime to account by his employer: but if the employer can shew that moneys have been received by such agent and not accounted for, or that such agent has appropriated to his own purposes his employer's money, his remedy must be debt for the ascertained defalcation, or assumpsit on the agent's implied promise, for damages to that amount, on such breach of duty.

The Hon. Lewis Gugy, the respondent in the first instance in this case, for many years previously to 1837 was sheriff of the district of Montreal, in the province of Lower Canada, and as such became the depositary of considerable sums of money, levied under execution. From the year 1827, to August 1836, at which time he died, the duties and business of the sheriff were carried on in an office at Montreal, almost under the entire management and direction of Mr. Francis Perry, the late husband of the appellant, who was the late respondent's "agent, attorney, clerk, book-keeper, and receiver." Considerable sums passed through Mr. Perry's hands in the fulfilment of his duties, which were deposited in the bank at Montreal in the name of the late respondent, and on which he was authorized to draw checks for their repayment and proper application. Shortly after Mr. Perry's death, the late respondent was removed from the office of sheriff, and on vacating such office was found to be a defaulter in a large sum of money, for which it was sought to make the present appellant, as the testatrix to Perry's children and heirs, accountable. Accordingly, on the 1st of February, 1837, the late respondent instituted an action of account against the appellant in her quality of testatrix, in the Court of Queen's Bench, for the district of Montreal, to compel her "to make and render a true and faithful account of all and every the fees, emoluments, sum and sums of money," received by the late F. Perry "as such deputy, agent, attorney, clerk, book-keeper, and receiver," and to pay such balance as, upon rendering such account, should appear to be due to the late respondent. To this declaration the appellant pleaded that all payments and receipts by her late husband were entered and specified in certain books of accounts, all of which ever had been and remained in possession of the plaintiff, and that she could not, nor was she bound by law to do so, render an account in manner and form as demanded. There was a second plea of the general issue.(a) Issue being joined, the parties went to trial, and evidence was gone into to shew that both the plaintiff and the late Mr. Perry drew checks on the bank, and that Mr. Perry had paid some private debts by checks; but that all books and transactions in the office were under the superintendence and control of the plaintiff, who was generally attendant, and that all moneys paid into the bank were paid to the account of the plaintiff, and that on Mr. Perry's death, all books and papers were taken possession of by the now respondent. It appeared also that the late respondent exercised only a mere nominal control. The Court of King's Bench dismissed this action, "saving to the plaintiff his recourse as he may be advised." From this judgment the late respondent, in February 1840, appealed to the Provincial Court of Appeals, who reversed the judgment of the Court below, and ordered the appellant to render "a faithful account of all and every the fees, emoluments, sum and sums of money received by the late F. Perry;"(b) and, in default of rendering such account, the now appellant was "adjudged and condemned to pay and satisfy the late respondent 5,000*l.* for and instead of the balance, sum, and sums of money which, if such account were rendered, might be coming and due" to him. From this reversal of judgment Mrs. Perry appealed to the Privy Council. In July 1840 the Hon. Lewis Gugy died, and the present respondent, by order of reviver, was intrusted with the duty of defending the appeal.

Renshaw, for the appellant, contended that Perry being only a clerk and servant in the employment of the late respondent, all moneys received by him in the course of his employment in his said office, were subject to the disposition of the said late respondent, and Perry ought not to be answerable for their application. Neither had the appellant the means of knowing what sums were applied or appropriated by the respondent. The late respondent had full knowledge of all that took place, and opportunity of inspecting all books of account, all which documents and books of account were in the possession of the respondent at the time of the decease of Perry, and still so remained. He contended, also, that the judgment of the Provincial Court of Appeals was contrary to law, and most unjust and oppressive.

Buller and Flemming, for the respondent, contended that, according to the laws of Lower Canada, the legal representatives of an agent were bound to account with his employer for his receipts and disbursements, and to pay and discharge the balance which might be found to be due to the employer, and as an authority for this position cited an ordinance of Louis the XIV. bearing date 1667, title 29, art. 1:—"De la reddition des Comptes," which it was alleged has still the force of law in Lower Canada. The article is as follows:—"Les tuteurs, procureurs, curateurs, fermiers judiciaires, sequestres, gardiens, et autres qui auront administré le bien d'autruy seront tenus de rendre compte aussi-tôt que leur gestion sera finie; et seront toujours reputés comptables encore que le compte soit clos, et arrête jusqu'à ce qu'ils ayent payé le reliquat, s'il en est dû, et rendu toutes les pièces justificatoires." They also contended that this ordinance obliges all persons, who have the management and administration of the property of others, duly to account; (c) and that the evidence in the Court of King's Bench shewed that Perry had applied the respondent's money in payment of his own debts.

Lord CAMPBELL delivered the judgment of the Court.—The question was, whether the appellant was liable to have such an action commenced against her for an account, or whether the proper course was not to go for any balance that might be deficient on an account drawn against her. Whether the late Mr. Perry was liable or not depended on the relation between him and his employer. There was no difficulty in the law of the case; the case resolved itself into a question of fact. But there was a great distinction between liability in a particular case and general liability; and the question was whether Mr. Perry received money with the character of general accountability. It seemed to the Court that he did not, but that he received the money as the confidential agent of Mrs. Gugy, who it appeared never called on him to account. Under these circumstances their lordships were of opinion that this was not a case in which an action for an account could be maintained, and that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Montreal was correct, especially as it did not prejudice Mrs. Gugy's representatives from claiming any sums of money which they might shew were in the appellant's hands as the representative of her husband. That remedy still remained open; but their lordships were of opinion that the remedy by action of account was misconceived. The decision of the Court was, that the judgment of the Court of King's Bench was right, and ought not to have been reversed; that the judgment of the court of appeal should be reversed, and that the judgment of the Court of King's Bench be affirmed.

(a) In 1 Chitty's Pleading, 488, 6th ed. it is laid down that there is no general issue in this form of action.

(b) The judgment in this form of action in the first instance is "quod computet," and afterwards, when the account is finished, that the defendant pay to the plaintiff so much as he is found in arrear. Bac. Abr. Accompt. G.

JUVEER BHAEE and OTHERS, Sons of GULLA BHAEE, Appellants (the defendants below), and YURUJ BHAEE and OTHERS, Respondents (the plaintiffs below).

Where documentary evidence necessary to the right understanding of a cause is improperly rejected by a colonial court, the Privy Council on appeal will refer the cause back again to be re-heard.

The hearing of this appeal occupied the greater part of Thursday and Friday.

The ground of the appeal was, as to the propriety of the rejection of certain documentary evidence by the Supreme Court of Bombay, on which the appellants relied in the Court below as tending to prove in their favour the fact of partition, or no partition of inheritable property under the Hindu law.

The appellants and the respondents are the descendants of a common grandfather, who was possessed of considerable inheritable property. The grandfather had three sons, one of whom was the father of the appellants, another the father of the respondents. By the Hindu law inheritable property is vested in the sons in the life-time of the father, and unless partition of the estate be made by the father, it descends to the sons as tenants in common. The father may make partition by will during his life-time, or to take effect after his death. By civil death, as by entering a religious order, or by the commission of certain crimes, the father loses the power of partition, and the estate descends in unity among the sons in common as it does should the father make no partition.(d) "Partition in its most general sense comprehends as well the division of patrimonial property during the life of the father (which usually takes place amongst co-heirs, as the adjusting by distribution the possession of different parties to a pre-existing right, as the divesting of exclusive rights in specific portions of property."(d) This inchoate right renders the sons in some sort co-proprietors with the father of the family property, which it is not in the power of the father to bar. Upon partition taking place by the father, the law regulates the distribution of inheritable property; but the distribution of the acquired property of the father is left more at his discretion. It was contended by the plaintiffs below (the now appellants) that there had been no partition of the estate of the grandfather, and that they succeeded in their own right to an undivided third share of the grandfather's inheritance, and also to an undivided third share of the property of two of his sons deceased, which shares were withheld from them by the respondents (the defendants below). The respondents had obtained possession of a large portion of the grandfather's inheritable and other property which had descended to them by linear succession. On the part of the respondents it was denied that the property of the grandfather, whether of inheritance or acquisition, was undivided; and that even if it were, there had been dealings with the property and adverse possession for thirty-seven years before the commencement of the suit, thirty years being the limitation by the Hindu law to any claim to the possession of lands or other immoveable property.(e)

It appeared that Mr. Grant, an officer of the East India Company, had in his possession certain documents relative to the estate of the grandfather, which he refused to produce unless compelled to do so. The defendants below (the respondents) denied the right of the Court to call for their production, relying upon their thirty-seven years' adverse possession, which they contended could not be affected by any documentary evidence. The Court below held the objection good, and the evidence was rejected.

In the absence of positive evidence of partition, the Hindu law presumes joint tenancy among brothers, "it being most natural for them to dwell together in unity."(f) On this ground, and on the ground of adverse possession for 37 years being a bar to any claim to a share of the family estate by the plaintiffs below, the Court of Bombay gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiffs now appealed to the Privy Council, urging that the documentary evidence they wished to produce was improperly rejected.

Counsel for the appellants, Wigram, Jackson, and Forsyth: for the respondents, Bury, Lloyd, and Moore.

Lord LANGDALE, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said, it appearing to the Council that certain documents in the cause had never been properly brought under the consideration of the Court below; that Court had, therefore, not had the means of forming a correct judgment. For this reason the Council were of opinion that the case should be referred back to the Court below, with directions to take into their consideration such allegations as were contained in the petition of the appellants. As these documents had been withheld by Mr. Grant, who was an officer of the East India Company, he thought it was for the consideration of that Company whether they would not bear a part of the costs of the appeal.

Equity Courts.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Nov. 23, 1844, and Nov. 23, 1844.

SMYTHE v. GRIFFIN.

Immoral consideration—Future cohabitation—Annuity—Pleading—Demurrer.

Where a plaintiff comes to be relieved against an annuity-grant, in consideration of future cohabitation, such an instrument is invalid, and its invalidity constitutes a good defence at law; and a general demurrer will be allowed unless the plaintiff can make out special circumstances for the interference of equity. The instruments being in the hands of the person claiming the annuity will not furnish such special circumstances, as production may be compelled by application to a judge of the court at law.

This was an appeal from an order of the Vice-Chancellor of England, allowing a general demurrer to the plaintiff's bill. The plaintiff, Major Smyth, being resident in Ireland in 1832, granted to Griffin, as trustee for Maria Seller, a woman with whom he was cohabiting, an annuity of 100*l.* for her life, to commence upon the death or marriage of Major Smyth, or upon his withdrawing his protection from Maria Seller. There was also an annuity of 50*l.* granted to Maria Smyth, their illegitimate daughter, during her life, to commence on the death or marriage of Maria Seller, the mother (who was a married woman) or upon her returning to the protection of her husband, or upon her going to reside with her father. These annuities were collaterally secured by Smyth's bond and a warrant of attorney to confess judgment in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland. On that warrant of attorney judgment was entered upon on the 12th Dec. 1832. The deed contained a covenant by Smyth, that if at any time he should become possessed of real estate, that he would effectually charge the annuities upon such estate. Maria Seller lived with Smyth for three or four years, and then left him by his desire, and in 1839 Smyth married. In October 1842 Maria Seller commenced an action in the Queen's Bench upon the Irish judgment in the name of Griffin, the trustee, who was abroad with his regiment, against Smyth, for the recovery of arrears of her annuity. When the declaration was delivered in November 1842, Smyth filed the present bill, whereby he charged that "in consequence of the form of the action, and inasmuch as he could not produce the indenture [the grant of the annuity], he could not safely plead to the said action at law so as to raise the question of the invalidity of the indenture and the collateral securities for the judgment of a court at law."

The bill prayed that the grant of the annuities might be declared wholly void in equity, that all the securities might be delivered up to be cancelled, that Griffin might be directed to enter satisfaction on the judgment in Ireland, and be restrained from proceeding the action pending; or, if the Court should be of opinion that the deeds and judgment were not wholly void, that it might be declared that the same was void so far as they affected to secure the annuity of 10*l.* to Maria Seller, and that the plaintiff might be relieved to that extent. The defendant demurred for want of equity, and the Vice-Chancellor allowed the demurrer, upon the ground that the instrument was void upon the face of it.

Stuart and Smythe, for the appellant, the plaintiff, contended that the plaintiff had a right to come into equity to have the deeds delivered up, because a bill might be filed against him to charge his real estate with the annuities. They cited Simpson v. Lord Howden (3 Myln. & Craig. 97); Batty v. Chester (5 Beavan, 109); Fergusson v. Mitton (11 Adolphus & Ellis, 182); Gray v. Mathias (5 Ves. 284); Guinness v. Carroll (1 Barnewall & Adolphus, 459).

Bethell and Tripp, for the respondents, contended that the bill contained no allegations to impeach the daughter's annuity, nor any averment that the plaintiff had or was likely to have landed property. The object of the bill was to set aside both annuities or one. Nothing else could be done on that record. That the plaintiff had no equity it was a merely legal question. Both the annuities were governed by the immoral consideration, for it was plainly Smyth's purpose and object to continue the cohabitation, by which he avoided payment of both annuities. They cited Batty v. Chester, suprà (1 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, 241); Mathew v. Hanbury (2 Vernon 187); Franco v. Bolton (3 Vesey, 368); Gray v. Mathias, suprà.

Stuart, in reply.

JUDGMENT.

Nov. 8, 1844.—The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I agree in this case with the Vice-Chancellor that this annuity to Maria Seller is void, on the face of the instrument as represented in the bill. It was evidently granted in contemplation of the future cohabitation, for he was to commence paying the annuity on his withdrawing his protection from her, on his marriage, or death. The plaintiff, therefore, has a sufficient defence at law upon the instrument itself, and he must be left to that defence, unless some special circumstances are stated, requiring the interference of a Court of Equity. This principle does not appear to be controverted, but the plaintiff rests his case for relief on the circumstances stated in the bill. And first he alleges that, in consequence of the form of the action, and not having possession of the indenture, or the precise knowledge of its contents, that he cannot safely plead to the action. The action is brought on a judgment, and if the judgment was entered upon the warrant of attorney, as stated in the bill (and it refers to the indenture) the plaintiff-at-law, on a proper application to the court in which the action is pending, would be ordered to produce the indenture for the purpose of the plea; or a bill of discovery might be filed in this Court for the same object. That special ground, therefore, in requiring the interposition of a court of equity, entirely fails. The next special ground insisted upon is the clause, by which the plaintiff binds himself, in the event of his acquiring any real estate, to make it chargeable with the payment of the annuity; but it is not stated that the plaintiff has any real estate, or is likely to have any in his possession; and if the plaintiff at the law should fail in the action, on the ground of the invalidity of the transaction, there will be an end of the matter. The apprehension of being afterwards harassed in this court on the clause in question, on the possible event of the plaintiff coming into possession of some real estate at a future period, is a mere chimera. It is suggested that the suit may be maintained as to the annuity to the daughter stated in this clause; but that is not the object of the plaintiff's bill; it states one consideration for both annuities, and it prays that both may be declared void, or, if not both, at least one, namely, as to the mother. But that is not the object of the bill, nor consistent with it. The plaintiff states one entire consideration for both annuities; that consideration he alleges to be illegal, and that the annuity is in consequence void. He prays, therefore, a declaration to that effect, and that the several instruments mentioned in the bill may be delivered up to be cancelled; or if the Court should be of opinion that the deed is not wholly void, it may be declared void as far as respects the annuity to the mother. There is no separate case made against the daughter, and no separate declaration prayed against her. The bill states that the action is brought by Maria Sellers the mother; that Griffin's name is used by her without his authority or knowledge; and that he is abroad, and out of the jurisdiction of the court. No interference by the daughter has been alleged or suggested, and it is prayed that the instruments may be declared wholly void as to the mother. What is stated to call for such a declaration as to the daughter? This is contrary to the plaintiff's own view of his case. The bill prays that the instrument may be delivered up to be cancelled; but if the bill cannot be maintained in this respect as to the mother, it must of course fail as to the daughter. There is in the bill no ground for maintaining the bill as to the daughter, if it cannot be supported as to the mother. It seems, on the contrary, from the frame of the bill, as if the plaintiff supposed the grant of the annuity to the daughter might be considered valid, and if so, there can be no reason for this Court to interfere. The demurrer, therefore, must be allowed.

Re WARWICK CHARITIES.

Charity trustees under the Municipal Corporations Act. Circumstances under which vacancies will be filled up.

Blunt supported a petition presented by certain of the inhabitants of Warwick, praying for a reference to the Master, to inquire as to vacancies in the charity trustees of that town, and to approve of proper persons to fill up those vacancies.

The charities were eleven in number, and the aggregate income of the whole amounted to 3,000*l.* a year, besides 13,000*l.* which was required to be lent out in sums of 100*l.* without interest for nine years, to young men resident in Warwick. The original number of trustees was twenty-one, of those three were dead, three more had left the town of Warwick and gone to reside elsewhere, one had become bankrupt, and another wished to retire from the situation of trustee on account of age and infirmity; so that more than one-third of the whole number was vacant.

Hayward, for the continuing trustees, consented.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after some consideration, and apparently in consequence of the amount and variety of the charities, made the order.

Re BURBIDGE, a LUNATIC.

Sale of lunatic's reversionary interest—Jurisdiction in lunacy.

The only estate of this lunatic consisted of a freehold cottage let at 4*l.* a year, and a reversionary interest in a considerable real estate, the yearly rental of which is 260*l.* The father of the lunatic is his heir-at-law, and he had always maintained him.

Kinlake supported a petition, stating the above circumstances, and that the father had incurred considerable expense in the maintenance of the lunatic since the year 1834, and praying that the reversionary interest might be sold or mortgaged for the purpose of repaying such outlay.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I have no power to direct the sale of a lunatic's estate except for the purpose of the payment of debts. You must shew me, if you can, by affidavit, that the sum claimed is due to the father as a debt, and then I shall have power to sell for repayment of that amount.

Re DRUMMOND, a LUNATIC.

Allowance to a lunatic's family—Practice.

This was a petition by Mr. J. H. Drummond and his wife, who was one of the two daughters of the lunatic, praying for an increased allowance out of the lunatic's estate. The lunatic's income amounted to 5,554*l.* yearly. The lunatic is now eighty-six years of age; each of the daughters had an allowance of 1,500*l.* and Mrs. Drummond's had been settled upon her marriage; she is now in a bad state of health, requiring the constant attendance of medical men, and frequent absence from home.

Whitmarsh, for the petition.

Chandless, for the other sister, who is unmarried, asked that the direction for inquiry should be made sufficiently extensive to comprise an equal increase of allowance for the other sister, as otherwise Mrs. Drummond would have an undue share of property. He did not, however, oppose the petition.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The increased allowance is asked for on the part of Mrs. Drummond, upon the express ground of the bad state of her health. There is not the same reason in the other case; the property is the lunatic's, and not the daughter's. I cannot make the order extend to an inquiry as to the other daughter.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Tuesday, Nov. 12.

MANTON v. ROE.

Practice—Defect of a suit for want of parties—Demurrer.

A creditor's suit was instituted by the judgment creditor of an intestate, against the heir-at-law of the deceased, a mortgagee and trustee for sale of a portion of the real estate of the intestate, also against a purchaser of that portion of the estate, for the purpose of having the estates administered under the directions of the Court, but without making the personal representative of the intestate a party. To this bill, two separate demurrers were put in, by the purchaser and the heir-at-law, on the ground that no personal representative of the intestate was before the Court. One of the demurrers contained a misnomer and false description, the other a false description only. Held, that on this account the demurrers must be overruled. Secus, had they been correct in such particulars; for that the suit was defective for want of the intestate's personal representative.

The bill was filed by the plaintiff, Manton, who was a judgment creditor of an intestate, Thomas John Roe, for the purpose of having the intestate's real and personal estates administered under the decree of the Court. The defendants were James Roe, the heir-at-law of the intestate; a mortgagee and trustee for sale of a portion of the real estate of the intestate, and Cadby, who was the purchaser of this portion of the estate. The bill alleged collusion between the heir-at-law, the mortgagee and trustee, and the purchaser. No personal representative of the intestate was made a party, nor was any reason given for not making him a party, except that no administration had been taken out. The defendants, James Roe and Cadby, put in separate demurrers to the bill, on the ground that no personal representative of the intestate was a party to the suit; but by some error in the engrossment, the demurrer of James Roe was expressed in this form: "This defendant doth demur and for cause of demurrer saith that no legal personal representative of the said James Roe, the testator, in the pleadings named, is a party to the suit." In this demurrer there were two mistakes, one as to the name, and the other as to the description of the party intended; the name of the party intended was in fact Thomas John Roe, and he died intestate. In the demurrer put in by Cadby, the name of the party was correctly stated, but his description was wrong, he was called a "testator," instead of an intestate; the demurrer being, that nolegal personal representative of Thomas John Roe, the testator in the pleadings named, was a party to the suit.

Sidebottom appeared for one of the demurring defendants, and Sheffield for the other.

Bethel and Torriano, in support of the bill.

His Honour the VICE-CHANCELLOR considered that the bill was improperly framed in not making the intestate's personal representative a party. He, however, overruled both demurrers as defective in point of form, on account of the mistakes, but without costs.

BOHN v. BOHN.

Practice—Executor—Injunction.

In a suit for the administration of a deceased trader's estate the Master had approved of a certain scheme for selling off the stock. One of the executors, conceiving that he was entitled to the control of the sale of a portion of the stock, removed it from where it was deposited, for the purpose, it was alleged, of effecting a different mode of sale from that which had been sanctioned by the Court. To restrain these proceedings an ex parte injunction had been obtained; upon coming in of the defendant's answer, in which he submitted that his right as executor justified his conduct, and therefore moved to dissolve the injunction—Held, that as both parties had proceeded upon a mistaken notion of their rights, and it not having appeared from any thing alleged that the original order was wrong, the motion to dissolve the injunction must be refused, but without costs.

This was a motion to dissolve an ex parte injunction that had been granted to restrain Mr. H. G. Bohn from removing any portion of the stock of books belonging to Mr. Bohn, the bookseller, of Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, deceased. In a suit for the administration of the estate of the deceased, the Master had approved of a proposal that one portion of the books should be sold by Sotheby, another portion by Evans, of Pall-mall, and the quire stock by Hodgson, of Fleet-street, and Fletcher, of Piccadilly. The conduct of the sale was intrusted to the plaintiffs, who were some of the children of the testator, and the defendant, H. G. Bohn, was alleged to have forcibly entered the house where the stock was contained, and removed some portion of it directed to be sold by Hodgson, for the purpose, it was alleged, of effecting a different mode of selling the stock to that which had received the sanction of the Court. In the answer of the defendant H. G. Bohn, on which the motion to dissolve the injunction proceeded, it appeared that the method of carrying out the direction of the Court respecting the quire stock had been the subject of much correspondence between the parties and their respective agents; the defendant insisting upon his right as executor to a certain control over the books, until proper catalogues and inventories had been taken; and as he now by his answer denied the principal allegation of breaking into the premises with a view of improperly removing the stock, he submitted the injunction ought to be dissolved.

Parker and Cox, in support of the motion.

Stuart and Prior, on behalf of the plaintiffs, in support of the the injunction.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I am of opinion the whole thing has proceeded in a mutual misapprehension of the parties, both on the one side and on the other, with respect to their rights. (His HONOUR here read several extracts out of the letters.) From these portions of the correspondence it is evident the solicitors for one party demand too much, and those on the other side refuse more than they ought. Hence a dispute arose which in all likelihood had never taken place, if a clear statement had been made in the first instance of the mode in which the preliminaries of the sale should be carried on. Upon the whole, however, nothing has been adduced to bring me to the conclusion that the original order to restrain a different mode of sale to that directed by the Court is wrong, and therefore I refuse to dissolve the injunction, but without costs.

Wednesday, Dec. 4.

MAHON v. O'GRADY.

Practice—Changing solicitor—New orders 26th Oct. 1841.

The 16th of the new orders 26th Oct. 1842, directs that " a party suing or defending by a solicitor shall not be at liberty to change his solicitor in any cause or matter without an order of the Court for that purpose, which may be obtained by motion or petition, as of course; and that until such order is obtained and served, and notice thereof given to the clerk of records and writs, the former solicitor shall be considered the solicitor of the party." One Richard Thomas, a solicitor, had taken his son into partnership during the progress of the suit; the question arose whether it were necessary under the above order for the party to apply to the Court to change the solicitor from the father to son, as it would be required in case the solicitor had taken a mere stranger into partnership.

Bolton appeared upon the motion.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR thought that the application under the order was necessary alike in one case as the other, notwithstanding the general opinion in practice had been the contrary.

ROLLS COURT.

Wednesday, Nov. 20.

BARKER v. WALTERS.

A bill to restrain an action at law on a policy of assurance, and to have the same delivered up to be cancelled or dealt with as the Court may direct, but not expressly offering to refund the premiums paid thereon in case of cancellation, is not demurrable for want of equity.

Neither is it demurrable for want of parties on the ground that it is filed only in the names of three of the directors of the assurance company (who by the authority of the board of directors, accepted and signed the policy), on behalf of themselves and all others interested in the property and profits of the company.

The bill in this case stated that the Alfred Assurance Company was established for the assurance of lives, and consisted of a large number of persons, who could not on that account be made parties, and that the business was conducted by a board of directors. On the 1st April, 1844, Charles Herbert Croft, of Pontypool, applied to the agent of the company there to effect an insurance on the life of Benjamin Walters, aged sixty in May then next. The agent accordingly sent up the usual paper of questions, filled up by Walters (falsely, it was alleged) to the company, and the three plaintiffs, by the authority of the board, accepted and signed a policy of assurance on Walters's life for 500*l.* at the premium of 31*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* On the 7th of August Walters died intestate, and letters of administration were taken out by Mary Walters, one of the defendants. This, the plaintiffs alleged, was done by her at the instance of Croft, the other defendant, and for a consideration to enable him to obtain the benefit of the policy, which he represented to have been assigned to him by Walters in the June preceding his death. Not being able, however, to make out his title satisfactorily by the assignment, he had recourse to the other plan. The plaintiffs also alleged that they had discovered that the policy, though in the name of Walters, was really effected by Croft for his own benefit, and that Walters was subject to epilepsy, &c. which being concealed from the company, they were thereby discharged from all obligation, and there was a forfeiture of the policy. The bill therefore prayed that Mary Walters should be restrained from bringing an action on the policy; that it should be delivered up to be cancelled, or otherwise dealt with as the Court might direct, and that Croft should be declared to have no interest therein. The bill was filed by the plaintiffs (who alone had signed the policy) on behalf of themselves, and all others interested in the property and profits of the assurance company, and the defendants demurred thereto for want of equity and for want of parties.

Wood, in support of the demurrer.—When a party comes into a court of equity for relief, he must do equity. The plaintiffs, therefore, cannot insist on a clause which involves a forfeiture, and ask relief by cancelling the contract, and thereby depriving us of the policy, without offering to account for and pay back the premiums received. But there is no such allegation in the bill, though they have in their pocket 31*l.* odd of our money. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The bill asks for relief as the Court thinks fit.] If the party asks to be relieved on a void contract, he ought to submit himself to account; and there is a great difference between cases of account and those in which it is sought to set aside an instrument. (Bromley v. Holland, 5 Ves. 610; 7 Ves. 3, G. Coop. 9; Byne v. Vivian, 5 Ves. 604; Mason v. Gardiner, 4 B. C. C. 436; Whitmore v. Francis, 8 Price, 616.) Again, it is vague to say that the members are too numerous to be made parties. The bill states that the affairs are conducted by a board, and yet there are only three of them here. We should have all the board parties, or an allegation that these plaintiffs act under their authority. (Attwood v. Small, 9 L. J. N. S. 132.) How can these plaintiffs pledge the company? If the bill be dismissed the board can file a new one, and they have only to say to the Court that the plaintiffs had not their authority. If relief be given then at the hearing on the terms of repayment of the premiums, the Court have nobody here to charge. There should, therefore, be proper parties to represent the company

Kindersley, contrà.—I am surprised to hear of a demurrer for want of equity, because no offer has been made of repayment of the premiums. Formerly that might have been successfully contended, but the principle is now that if a party asks, as we do here, to have relief as the Court may think fit, it is unnecessary to make the offer in terms. The mere coming here is a submission,—much more is it so in a case like this. The cases cited are all those in which relief is sought from usurious contracts, and in which both parties are guilty of a breach of an Act of Parliament. As to the parties, Attwood v. Small was a case in which the relief sought affected the property of the whole company, and all persons appointed by the company to be directors were necessarily parties. It is different here,—it is only said by the bill that the business is managed by a board. Moreover the plaintiffs are trustees for the company, and liable on the policy to the party. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Mr. Wood says the directors may file another bill.]

Hetherington, on same side.

Wood, in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, after stating the facts, said that the prayer of the bill was that the policy should be delivered up to be cancelled, or for such relief and on such terms as the Court should think fit. There was quite enough in that language of submission to the Court, and he thought it better to make no observations on the general principle. The demurrer for want of equity must be overruled. As to parties, it is said, something, in case of a decree, must be done on the part of the company, and they are not represented here. Now this argument cannot weigh; for the plaintiffs will be compelled to perform that duty to the defendants personally before obtaining the relief they ask. But it is said, that if the bill be dismissed, the other directors may file a fresh bill. Now, difficulties may occur, but if, because of this, we were to stop short, there would be an end of all proceedings. How this might be, there is no case to guide us; but if the difficulty occur, the Court will be able to deal with it. In my opinion (but I do not decide the point), in a case such as this, the other objectors would not be permitted to file a bill. I overrule the demurrer on this ground also. Let there be six weeks for answering.

Thursday, Nov. 21.

ROWE v. WARD.

A general authority given by one of two co-executors to a solicitor (who has acted in an original suit with the consent of both) to do whatever his co-executor may think right, does not justify the solicitor in filing a cross bill, even though it may be considered part of the defence to the original bill, without a retainer. And a motion to take a bill off the file will be granted with costs against the solicitor.

This was a motion in a cross suit, instituted by Mr. Hearne, a solicitor for the plaintiffs, who were parties in an original and supplemental suit against them as executors of Sir Richard Bassett. When they were made parties in the original suit, they had both given their consent to Mr. Hearne acting for them, and J. W. Bassett, one of them, said he would do whatever Charles Bassett Rowe, the other and the acting executor, thought fit. But on being served with the subpœna on 23rd May, 1844, to answer the supplemental bill, it appeared that the cross suit had been instituted in the names of both, and without the knowledge of J. W. Bassett. A motion was then made on the 23rd October, 1844, to take the bill off the file, it being stated that the fact of its being filed was first discovered by J. W. Bassett, in the month of August. The motion was endeavoured to be supported on the ground of the general sanction given by the original consent and the acquiescence in the acts of the acting executor, also that the cross suit was virtually a part of the defence in the original suit, and, lastly, that J. W. Bassett was guilty of laches in making the motion so long after the filing of the bill.

Kindersley, Turner, Purvis, Giffard, and Heathfield, for the several parties, came to an arrangement that the suit should go on, steps having been taken, the benefit of which would be entirely lost by taking the bill off the file, and that the name of J. W. Bassett should be used with indemnity for future costs.

The MASTER of the ROLLS approved of the arrangement; at the same time intimating that in the event of that not having been come to he would have granted the motion; for no solicitor ought to commence a suit without being armed with an express retainer in writing. Mr. Hearne must pay the costs of this motion.

Wednesday, Nov. 20, and Monday, Nov. 2[illegible].

TAYLOR v. WYLD.

The Court will not take cognizance of the regularity or irregularity, validity, or invalidity, of orders of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which they are competent to make.

A bill to set aside a conveyance in fee, and to cancel an assignment of a term (alleged to be fraudulent) in aid of a writ of sequestration issued by the Judicial Committee to enforce an order for the payment of alimony, is not demurrable on the ground of the order being (according to the allegations in the bill) irregular.

Nor is it demurrable for making the assignee of the term a party, on the ground of his being a mere trustee, he being alleged to be a party to the fraud.

Mrs. Taylor, the plaintiff, is the wife of a gentleman of fortune, to whom she was married in 1830, and who separated from her in 1837. In 1835, the plaintiff instituted a suit in the Consistory Court for the restitution of conjugal rights, in which she was successful. Mr. Taylor then appealed to the Arches Court; and, pending the proceedings, the plaintiff claimed alimony, and 800*l.* a year was allowed her with his consent. On the 20th June, 1839, the Arches Court disallowed the appeal, and Mr. Taylor then appealed to her Majesty in Council. On the 10th February, 18[illegible], the Judicial Committee affirmed the judgment of the Courts below, and on the 11th their report was approved, and Mr. Taylor ordered to act in obedience to the decree. The alimony ordered to be paid by the Court below to Mrs. T. was paid under that order up to the 10th Feb. 1842, when Mr. Taylor refused to pay it any longer, on the ground that it was intended as a provision only pendente lite, and ceased on the sentence of the Judicial Committee. He accordingly, on the 15th June, 1842, presented a petition praying a revocation of the monition or order as to alimony, but it was refused, and the order directed to be obeyed till he complied with the sentence of the Court. On the 18th Feb. 1843, an application was made to have Mr. Taylor declared in contempt (he having refused to pay the alimony), which being informal, because of the omission of referring the matter to her Majesty in Council, was, on the 24th of the same month, duly confirmed. By this time Mr. Taylor had gone abroad to avoid process, and the surrogate having declared him in contempt, a sequestration was ordered against his goods and estates. When, however, the sequestrators went on the lands, they were told that they had been conveyed in fee to Wyld, one of the defendants, by a deed of conveyance dated 21st Oct. 1843, in trust for Taylor. The plaintiff then filed her bill against Wyld, Taylor, and Lindo, to whom outstanding terms had been assigned, to have the conveyance set aside, and the assignment cancelled, as being a fraudulent contrivance of Taylor with Wyld and Lindo to defeat her of her alimony. The bill charged that Lindo was not merely a dry trustee of the term; but the agent, &c. of Taylor, and an instrument in his fraudulent contrivances, and prayed that he might account for the moneys which he had received. The bill was demurred to by Lindo on two grounds: first, that the proceedings of the Judicial Committee were, some of them, beyond their power, and some irregular, and the sequestration, therefore, not rightly issued; and, secondly, that Lindo was not a necessary party.

Teed and Faber, for the demurrer.—Some of the monitions for payment of the alimony were issued by the Court below, and adopted by the Judicial Committee, though there was no appeal on that question. Others were made by the Judicial Committee themselves, but irregular, because not laid before the Queen for her approval; and though these were validated by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 38, passed subsequently, yet there were others issued by the surrogate of the Judicial Committee which he had no power to make. The writs of sequestration, consequently, were improperly issued to enforce the payment of moneys improperly ordered, and are not, therefore, such as this Court will help to enforce. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Would a prohibition lie against the Judicial Committee if their order be erroneous?] If the order be in excess of their jurisdiction, I should say yes: an erroneous order is different. Again, if Lindo's assignment-deed be cancelled, how will that assist the plaintiff? The term will be outstanding still. It was quite unnecessary to make him a party.

Kindersley and Turner, contrà.—It is useless to state the grounds of jurisdiction on which this Court aids the process of other courts in removing impediments, &c. (Mitf. Eq. Pl. 126.) I contend that if the sentence is by a competent jurisdiction which has issued its process, and is unable to carry it out, this Court will give its aid. It is evident that Taylor wishes to evade the process of the Ecclesiastical Court, and Lindo is charged by the bill as a party to the fraud, and as being the agent, &c. of Taylor; relief is, therefore, clearly to be given against him. But it is said the process is invalid. The plain answer is, that the Judicial Committee is not merely a court of appeal, but an original court, and retains the cause, and goes through with it itself without remitting it back to the Court below. Of course, therefore, the cause carries with it all interlocutory orders, &c. issued by the Court below. Again, as to the surrogate issuing the monitions complained of, they are valid under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 38; and even if there be any irregularity in the orders, that is for the Judicial Committee to set right; this Court has nothing to do with it. The writs of sequestration were issued after the passing of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 38.

Faber, in reply.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—This is a singular case—one of the first impression. It is a demurrer to a bill, in which Lindo, one of the defendants, is charged with concocting a fraud with the principal defendant, and with having for that purpose got a conveyance of the legal estate in a term, in respect of which relief is prayed. [His lordship then stated the facts of the case.] To this bill Taylor does not answer, Wyld does not answer, and Lindo demurs. He says, at first, the orders of the Judicial Committee were illegal, they were not competent to make them—they ought all to be considered nullities; the junior counsel, indeed, stating that some only they were incompetent to make, and the whole should therefore fall to the ground. The Act of Parliament was not at first fully read, but when it is so afterwards, it is found the Judicial Committee has, and has had for a long time, the power of making such orders—certainly when the writs of sequestration were issued. But it is said they have proceeded on a footing, the validity of which is here to be considered, and it is supposed that I can here take upon me to say whether they have done right in a case in which they are fully competent to adjudicate. That is not so. The judicial committee is not merely a court of appeal, but an original court of judicature; and how far an excess of its power may lay it open to be brought into another court by prohibition, I will not say; but here they have full power, and I cannot take upon me to say whether their orders were made after due consideration of the right of the parties or not. I have seldom been more surprised than to hear the orders of this High Court of Judicature questioned; certainly they cannot be so here, in consequence of a mere allegation that they are irregular. As to Lindo's legal estate in the term, it is said to be in trust for Wyld, and that they are both contriving fraud, and that the legal estate in the term may be employed to defeat the sequestration. The consequence is obvious. I overrule the demurrer.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

Friday, Dec. 6.

SUTHERLAND v. COOKE.

Will—Construction—Conversion of Residue—Tenant for life.

A B, by will, gave all his money in the Long Annuities and in all or any of the public stocks or funds, ready money, or securities for money, outstanding debts, and all the rent, residue, and remainder to trustees upon trust by [illegible] of, or of so much thereof as should be necessary to pay his debts and legacies, and subject thereto upon trust for C D for life, and, after his decease, upon trust for other persons. It was held that C D was not entitled to take the dividends of the Long Annuities in specie, but that the Long Annuities were to be converted in the ordinary way.

William Cooke, by his will dated July 9, 1832, gave to Robert Cooke, Robert Sutherland, and Samuel Argill certain freehold messuages to hold to them, their executors, administrators, and assigns upon trust for Mary Jones, wife of John Jones, for her life, for her separate use, and after her decease upon trusts as she should appoint, and in default of appointment, the testator directed that the leasehold messuages should sink into his residue. In another part of his will the testator gave to the said Robert Cooke, Robert Sutherland, and Samuel Argill "all his money in the Long Annuities, and in all or any of the public stocks or funds, ready money and securities for money, outstanding debts, and all the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever the same should or might consist at the time of his decease not thereinbefore specifically disposed of," to hold, &c. upon trust that they, his said trustees, should, in the first place, by sale thereof, or of so much thereof as should be necessary for that purpose, pay thereout all his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies, and subject thereto "upon trust to pay to or permit and suffer and fully authorize and empower the said Robert Cooke to have, receive, and take the dividends and interest thereof to and for his own use and benefit for and during the term of his natural life," and after his decease, upon trusts for other persons. Mary Jones, the tenant for life of the leaseholds, having died without making an appointment, the leaseholds fell into the residue. The question in this cause then was whether the tenant for life of the residue was entitled to enjoy the Long Annuities mentioned by the testator and the leaseholds in specie, or whether the remainder men were entitled to have them converted in the ordinary way.

Whitmarsh and Whitmarsh, jun. K. Parker and Giffard, and Craig, for the several parties.

The following cases were cited: Alcock v. Sloper (2 M. & K. 699); Vaughan v. Buck (1 Ph. 75); Bethune v. Kennedy (1 M. & Cr. 114); Howe v. Lord Dartmouth (7 Ves. 137); and Caldecott v. Caldecott (1 Y. & C. C. C. 312).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he considered that the words in this will made primâ facie a mere gift of the residue, and that the mention of the particular fund did not prevent the bequest from being in effect residuary, and if it were a mere residuary gift, it must be followed by all the consequences of a gift of residue, and the residue must be put into a state permanently beneficial to all who are interested in it. It had been contended that that there was an intention primâ facie apparent that the Long Annuities should be excepted out of the residue. There was nothing in the nature of realty in the gift. The words "ready money" occurred between "stocks or funds," and the words "securities for money and outstanding debts," and after all this followed the words "rest, residue, and remainder." There was no trust for investment, but there was a direction for raising money by sale thereof, but nothing was said about calling in or conversion. The word "thereof" applied as well to ready money and outstanding debts as to the other parts of the gift. It was plain that the word "dividends" applied to dividends of the whole property when invested, and not to the dividends of the Long Annuities. His Honour said that he should be breaking down general rules, and introducing narrow and dangerous distinction, if he did not hold the words in the will to be a gift of the residue, subject to the ordinary consequences of such a gift.

PUTNAM v. POPE.

Administrator—Foreign testator.

The executor of a testator, who was domiciled and died in the United States of America, appointed an agent to collect assets in England. The agent took out letters of administration to the testator, and the Court directed him to pay over the assets he had collected to the executor in America.

The testator in this case was the residuary legatee of a party whose assets were the subject of an administration suit. His rights had been declared in that suit, and he afterwards died at Boston, in the United States of America, which was his domicile, leaving the plaintiff in this suit his executor. The plaintiff appointed the defendant Pope, his attorney and agent, to get in the property of the testator in England, and he took out letters of administration for that purpose. The suit was instituted for the purpose of obtaining the property from the defendant.

Goodere, for the plaintiff, cited De La Viesca v. Lubbock (10 Sim. 629).

Terrell for the defendant.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR thought that, under the circumstances, the defendant might safely pay the money to the plaintiff. He fully agreed in the principle of the case cited.

CHARLTON v. SADLER.

Practice—Costs.

Special order made as to the costs of the representative of a defaulting executor.

The following question arose in this suit. A suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of Augustus Charlton. Isaac Charlton, the surviving executor, was a defaulter to a large amount, and died, leaving the defendant in this suit his executor. This suit was then instituted for the purpose of administering the estate of Isaac Charlton, and to make out against that estate the claims in respect of his default as to the estate of Augustus Charlton. The question was, whether the defendant Sadler was entitled to have all his costs of the suit, or only such as he could obtain out of his own testator's estate.

Spence, for some of the plaintiffs, cited Adair v. Shaw (1 Sch. & Lef. 246); Humphreys v. Moore (2 Atk. 106); Williams v. Nixon (2 Bea. 472); and Bennies on Costs.

Simpkinson and Shebbeare, for parties in the same interest.

Hoffman, for the defendant Sadler, said, that in this bill there was no charge against Isaac Charlton, much less against Sadler. The defendant Sadler was brought before the Court in two characters; one as trustee, the other as the representative of a debtor; and he submitted that he was entitled to his costs.

Spence, in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR directed that all the costs of all the parties, so far as they were occasioned by the default of Isaac Charlton or his insolvency, should be added to the debt due from Isaac Charlton; and as to the other costs of Sadler, they should be deducted from the first-mentioned costs, so that the costs to be added to the debt would be diminished by that amount.

CUDSEY v. PRITCHETT.

Practice—8th Order of August, 1841.

Liberty given upon an ex parte application to enter an appearance for a defendant on the 8th Order of August, 1841, although two lunar months had elapsed since the service of the subpœna.

Hall moved for liberty to enter an appearance for the defendant, James Pritchett, under the 8th Order of August, 1841. The affidavit stated that personal service of the subpœna had been made upon the defendant on the 12th of October last, so that two lunar months had elapsed since the service. It was stated that there would be much difficulty in serving the defendant with notice of this application.

STOOKE and WIFE v. VINCENT and OTHERS.

Practice—Plea—Separate property of wife—Release.

To a bill filed by a husband and wife regarding the separate property of the wife, a plea stating the release by the husband is good.

By a bond dated the 30th June, 1787, John Vincent was bound to John Beviss, the younger, and John Wheadon, in a penal sum to secure the payment by him, his heirs, executors, or administrators, to the said John Beviss, the younger, and John Wheadon, their executors, administrators, or assigns, of the sum of 303*l.* 3*s.* 3¾*d.* with interest. This sum was trust money which belonged to Sarah Vincent, the wife of John Vincent, for her separate use. Sarah Vincent, by her will, dated the 9th of February 1814, gave to her husband the interest of the sum for his life, and she gave the residue of her estate to Sarah Stooke (the plaintiff) for her separate use, and appointed Sarah Stooke her executrix. Sarah Vincent died the 8th December 1814, and John Vincent her husband retained the interest of the sum during his life, and died on the 10th April, 1830, having by his will, dated the 2nd of March, 1830, appointed his three sons (three of the defendants) his executors. John Wheadon, the surviving trustee, died on the 29th of November, 1829, having by his will (dated the 15th of February, 1810) appointed his wife (since deceased) and his two sons (two of the defendants) his executrix and executors. This bill was filed for the purpose of obtaining payment to the plaintiff, or to Wheadon's executors as trustees for her, of the sum due on the bond.

To this bill the three defendants Vincent pleaded that the plaintiff, Edward Stooke, by a deed of release dated the 15th of April, 1818, in consideration of the conveyance and assignment of certain leasehold closes, pieces, or parcels of land and hereditaments or chattels real of the said testator, John Vincent, in the county of Somerset, and which were by the same indenture assigned by the said John Vincent to Samuel Ware, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the residue of a term of ninety-nine years, upon trusts for the benefit of Sarah Stooke and the issue of Edward Stooke and Sarah his wife, he, the said Edward Stooke, for himself, and Sarah his wife, and their respective heirs, executors, and administrators, remised, released, and for ever discharged the said John Vincent, his heirs, executors, and administrators, of and from all and all manner of action and actions, cause and causes of action, suits, debts, dues, sum and sums of money, accounts, reckonings, controversies, damages, claims, and demands whatsoever in law and in equity, which against the said John Vincent they, the said Edward Stooke and Sarah his wife, then had, or which they and their respective heirs, executors, or administrators thereafter could, should, or might have, for, upon, or by reason of any matter, cause, or thing whatsoever.

G. M. Crawford, for the plea, argued that the joinder of the husband and wife as plaintiffs made it the husband's suit, and to such a suit the plea of the husband's release was good.

Moore, for the plea, cited [illegible]

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a [illegible]

the plaintiff says upon the face of his bill that he has no title, and the defendant has filed a plea stating that the plaintiff has released that no right or no title. I am not prepared to say that such a plea will not do—I think the plea will do; I shall, therefore, allow the plea, and, without prejudice to any application to amend the bill, the defendants, the Vincents, consenting and undertaking to allow the plaintiff's solicitor to inspect the deed of release, and to take a copy thereof at the plaintiff's expense at any reasonable time before the 25th instant, let the plaintiff pay the costs of the plea.

ADAMS v. PAYNTER.

Practice—Foreclosure suit—Judgment creditors—23rd order of August 1841.

In a foreclosure suit it is not sufficient to make judgment-creditors parties by service of a copy of the bill upon them, under the 23rd order of August 1841.

A preliminary question in this case was raised, viz.: whether it was sufficient in a bill of foreclosure to serve a copy of the bill under the 23rd order of August 1841 upon judgment creditors, or whether it was necessary to make them substantial parties.

Simpkinson and Miller, for the plaintiff, cited Neate v. Duke of Marlborough (3 Myl. & Cr. 407); Bishop of Winchester v. Beavor (3 Ves. 314); Draper v. Earl of Clarendon (2 Vern. 518); Burgh v. Francis (cited in 3 Swanst.); Finch v. Earl of Winchelsea (1 P. Wms. 127); and Rose v. Page (2 Sim.).

Russell, Chapman, and R. W. Moore, for different defendants, were not heard.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is the case of a bill filed by a first mortgagee to foreclose. It appears upon the face of the bill, and it is admitted that there is a puisne mortgagee, or an incumbrancer tantamount to a mortgagee, a party to the bill, and that there are judgment-creditors intervening between the first and second mortgagees. Ever since I have known the practice of the Court, such an incumbrancer is a necessary party to a bill of foreclosure. I conceive that I should be acting against established rules if I were to suggest a doubt upon the subject. There are certainly cases of judgments pendente lite, or of fraud, or when the numbers of such creditors may be inconveniently large, but that is not the present case, nor is it suggested that there is any particularity of that kind here. If they had not been made parties, such a case when brought to a hearing must have stood over for want of parties. But these persons are on the record, and therefore it is the case of there being parties on the record who have not answered. Such a bill then comes on to be heard, and it is said that the answers are not necessary, as the parties have been served with a copy of the bill under the 23rd order. The very grounds upon which the judgment-creditors are necessary parties to such a bill, shew that direct relief is asked against them, and therefore it is not a case within the order.

DICKINS v. BARKER.

Legacy, specific or demonstrative.

A legacy, directed to be paid out of a specific property, cannot, upon failure of that property, be charged upon the general estate.

This was a demurrer to a bill seeking to have a testator's personal estate charged with the payment of a legacy of 1,000*l.* which was directed to be raised by the sale of the timber upon the testator's estate.

Tinney, Q. C. for the demurrer, argued that a specific gift exonerated the personal estate, on the authority of Bootle v. Blundell (1 Mer. 195); Ricketts v. Ladley (3 Russ. 418); Read v. Litchfield (3 Ves. 479).

Romilly, Q.C. for the bill.—The cases which relate to the exoneration of personal estate do not here apply; but the cases do which relate to the question whether this is a specific or demonstrative legacy. A gift of a specific sum is different from a legacy charged upon a specific thing, which, if you take away, the legacy becomes chargeable on other property, unless specially exonerated, and is demonstrative. (Man v. Copland, 2 Mad. 223; Colville v. Middleton, 3 Beav. 570; Fowler v. Willoughby, 2 S. & St. 354; Campbell v. Graham, 1 Russ. & Myn. 453; Rook v. Worrall, 11 Sim. 216.)

Vice-Chancellor WIGRAM said that he must construe this legacy as a specific one, and that accordingly the personal estate must be exonerated from its payment.

Demurrer allowed.

MALLILIEU v. MILLER.

JUDGMENT.

His HONOUR gave judgment upon a motion made in these proceedings by the defendant for a new trial at law, on the grounds of the insufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence, upon which the jury found their verdict, and also of the inadmissibility of that evidence, and the consequent misdirection by the judge to the jury in reference to it. The proceedings at law were directed by this Court for the purpose of trying an issue as to the existence and credibility of an agreement upon which the plaintiff's equity and relief in this suit depended. The circumstances of the case arose out of the bankruptcy of Coupland and Co. of Liverpool, who were agents for Crawford and Co. in London, for the purpose of causing consignments to be made through Crawford's house to India, and the duty of Coupland was to advise Crawford's house as to the amount of advances they might safely come under upon the consignments, and the return consignments were to be made through Crawford's house for their security, and the surplus proceeds forwarded to the owners. Such being the arrangement between the two houses, Coupland was anxious to make consignments on his own account to Crawford's; but, in order to prevent Crawford from suspecting they were his own, an agreement was made between Coupland and Mallilieu, the plaintiff, to the effect that Mallilieu should be ostensibly the owner of the consignments, and that the return consignments should also be made through Crawford to Mallilieu. A large business was accordingly carried on under this agreement, and Mallilieu was considered so much the real owner of the consignments, that upon the bankruptcy of Coupland and Co. when the assignees claimed some property then in the possession of Crawford and Co. arising from Mallilieu's consignments, it was objected by Crawford that the property claimed belonged to Mallilieu, and not to Coupland. It appeared that Mallilieu had been in the habit of accepting bills for Coupland, and a large balance was, at the time of the bankruptcy, due from Coupland to Mallilieu in respect of those transactions between themselves, and, as a security to Mallilieu, he was allowed by Coupland to repay himself out of the return consignments which passed through his hands. A claim, therefore, to this effect was made by Mallilieu upon the bankruptcy of Coupland, and it being resisted by the assignees and Crawford, he filed his bill against them, stating the amount due to him from Coupland, and that Crawford and Co. had in their hands property arising from consignments for which they were accountable to him, and praying relief accordingly; as although it might be said that the transaction as between Coupland and Crawford was on Coupland's part fraudulent, as Coupland thereby placed himself in a position in which his duty and his interest were opposed to each other, yet he, Mallilieu, was ignorant of the fraud, and ought not to be affected by it. On the other hand, Crawford and Co. having discovered that the consignments made to them in Mallilieu's name were the property of the bankrupts, and being creditors, insist upon their right to consider them as the owners of the consignments, and to repay themselves out of that property. The issue, therefore, was directed to try whether in effect Mallilieu had a lien on the consignments for the balance owing to him on his general account.

His HONOUR was of opinion that the jury had found rightly upon the evidence for the plaintiff, and refused the motion.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

PHILLIPSON v. LORD EGREMONT.

Pleading.

JUDGMENT.

Lord DENMAN, C. J. in delivering judgment, said, this was a writ of scire facias against the defendant as a member of the Commercial Steam Packet Company to have execution on a judgment obtained against the company in the name of their officer. This company was formed under letters patent granted under the provisions of the 1 Vict. c. 17. The first objection to the declaration was, that it did not allege to what extent the defendant was liable by the letters patent, and whether his liability was in any respect limited according to the power given by the 4th section, the execution being on such ground limited also by the 24th section. We are clearly of opinion that, whether there be any such limitation as has been stated by way of plea by the defendant, that it was unnecessary for the plaintiff to notice it at all. The next objection to the declaration was, that the declaration does not shew the defendant to have been a member of the company when the cause of action accrued, but only when the promise was made; the answer is, that this being an action of assumpsit, the promise is the legal cause of action. But a third plea is here set up, which alleges that the defendant was not, at the commencement of the suit, liable as an existing or future member of the company. This plea is founded likewise on the 14th section, but it is bad, because it concludes to the country. The plea does not deny the allegation in the declaration. The declaration alleges that the defendant, at the time of the promises, and from thence and until after giving judgment, and from that time hitherto, hath been and still is a member of the company: the plea does not deny his being so a member, but states that, at the commencement of the suit, he was not liable as a member, and therefore it is insufficient and bad. The next objection was raised by the fourth plea, founded on the 5th section of the Act. It is sufficient to say that the matter of this plea might have been pleaded to the action itself, which has not been done. That principle, which has been settled long ago, was fully supported in the case of Bradley v. Eyre (11 M. & W.). The same answer disposes of the objection raised by the fifth plea. The fifth plea alleges that the judgment was recovered in respect of a demand for which the company was not by law liable, and applies to the officer sued; and it appears, that, in consequence of certain fraudulent proceedings, and by connivance, the plaintiff suffered judgment to be recovered, in order to charge the defendant. Now, so far as this plea states that the company had a defence to the action, it is open to the same answer as the fourth and sixth pleas, namely, that the defence should have been pleaded to the original action. It was suggested by the plaintiff that possibly such defence might have been made upon the Statute of Limitations, or the Statute of Frauds, or any other technical defence not touching the merits of the case, which might have been most honestly made, and doubtless it might have been most consistent with the facts; but the gist of the plea is that the company, not being liable by law, fraudulently, and by connivance with the plaintiff, suffered a judgment in order to charge the defendant. Now, if this allegation be true, the defendant certainly ought to have some remedy; and the question is, whether the remedy is by pleading, as he has done, or by a motion of the court. We are far from saying the latter course is not open to the defendant. Fraud vitiates every thing; and no doubt the remedy of the Court will be that which is suggested in Bradley v. Eyre. Still, such a plea as the present may be good, as in the case of Fuller v. Rickarby (2 M. & G.), wherein Tindal, C.J. stated that it would be good if the plea had alleged that fraud was practised on the original defendant. That would have been open to the answer made upon the fourth and sixth pleas; but as it alleges fraud and collusion between the plaintiff and the defendant in that action, for the purpose of charging the present defendant, there was no opportunity for him to plead that before. We are of opinion that such fraud and collusion are sufficiently stated by the fifth plea, and a question of fact thereby raised, properly within the province of the jury to determine. We were reminded on the argument that where such a question of fraud had arisen on the motion to set aside the pleading to the sci. fa. we then directed an issue to try the fact, rather than determine ourselves on affidavit. The case of Bosanquet v. Graham furnishes forcibly an argument to shew that such facts may be pleaded, and the defendant is open to do so. On the whole, we think our judgment must be for the defendant on the fifth plea, and for the plaintiff on the others.

DOE dem. ROBERTS v. BOUSFIELD.

Knowles, Q. C. had moved to enter a nonsuit in this action. The Court now gave judgment.

Lord DENMAN, C. J.—The lessor of the plaintiff claimed under a lease for twelve years granted by Scott. By the custom of the manor, tenants may demise, without license, for three years and no more. The defendant was tenant from year to year to Scott, and held over after notice to quit. It was objected that the lease for twelve years was void, and conferred no title on the lessor of the plaintiff; for which Jackson v. Neal (Croke Elizabeth, 394) was cited. This case is important in establishing that a lease beyond the custom is not void, but only that it may be waived by the lord, and which the reversioner even cannot avail himself of, but must be considered as a mere stranger. There is no ground, therefore, for the present application, and we do not wish to encourage such applications by granting the rule.

REG. v. ROYDES and OTHERS.

Mandamus to compel the levy of rates too late after four years—Acquiescence in an agreement with a party to pay a fixed sum.

Baines, Q. C. (with whom was Butt), shewed cause against a rule for a mandamus to compel the defendants, who are justices for the county of Lancaster, to enforce the payment of certain poor-rates in the parish of Todmorden, made in pursuance of a certain agreement made by Mr. Stansfield, an assistant overseer, with a rate-payer, in the year 1840, to the effect that certain prospective rates should be greater than the last effective rate. Subsequently the magistrates ordered a new rate, on the footing of the last effective rate, according to 41 Geo. 3, c. 23, s. 2. The question then arose, whether the parish had any right to make this agreement, or the justices to allow the rate. (Harper v. Ker, 7 T. R. 270.) The application, it was also contended, was made too late, other rates having been since made on the same basis.

It also appeared that notice of the rates was affixed only upon one of the entrances to the principal church, although there was another church, disused for divine service, but used still for burials, upon which church door there was no notice at all, the statute requiring the notice to be affixed on all the doors of all the churches. The rates must be properly published. (Sibbald v. Roderick, 11 Ad. & Ell. 38; R. v. Newcomb, 4 T. R. 368.) The assistant overseer acted as overseer. (Slingkey v. Savage, 11 M. & W. 503.)

The Solicitor-General (with whom was Archbold), contrà.—The old church being used for funerals only, it is ridiculous to suppose the Legislature intended the notices to be put up there. The magistrates had no power to make the allowance of the rates founded on this so-called agreement.

By the COURT.—It is perfectly clear that this long delay in coming to the Court for a mandamus precludes us from granting it now. Many rates have been made since the agreement in question, and the parish must be taken to have acquiesced in what was then done, and to have tied their hands by their own act. We need not enter into the question of the publication of the rates, which it is not necessary we should decide, though we think that probably any chief door of the principal churches would suffice for affixing the notices, to which, however, it is desirable to give every publicity. The magistrates do not appear to us to have been in fault, though certain imputations appear on the affidavits.

Rule discharged with costs.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

Saturday, Dec. 7.

ROGERS v. SPENCE.

The right to bring trespass quare clausum fregit does not pass to the assignees of a bankrupt, although in consequence of the trespass the bankrupt's property may have been diminished.

The arguments in this case in the court below are reported in 11 M. & W. 191, and referred to in 2 Law T. 276.

JUDGMENT.

Lord DENMAN, C.J.—This was an action of trespass in which the plaintiff below complained that the defendant below broke and entered his house and garden, and damaged the doors, &c. of the house, and the trees of the garden, and seized certain goods of the plaintiff, and exposed them for sale on the premises without his leave, whereby the plaintiff and his family were disturbed and annoyed, and the plaintiff prevented carrying on his lawful business. The defendant pleaded to the further maintenance of the action that the plaintiff became a bankrupt after the action was brought, and an assignee had been appointed, whereby the causes of action became vested in the assignee. To this plea there was a general demurrer, in which the Court of Exchequer, relying on the case of Clarke v. Calvert (8 Taunt. 742), in the Common Pleas, gave judgment for the plaintiff. As the plea avers that the causes of action vested in the assignees, it must be taken to be so in fact, if in law it be possible they should. The question therefore is, whether there be any cause of action materially; that is, substantially; and not merely by way of aggravation stated in the declaration, which could not possibly vest in the assignee; if there be, the plea is bad; if not, it is sufficient. On the bankruptcy of a trader, there are some rights of action to which he may be entitled, which vest in the assignee, and some which would not; and the question is, whether there be any right of action in this case which belongs to that class which does not vest in the assignee. The 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, which does not in this respect substantially vary from the previous statutes, gives to the assignees, by secs. 63, 64, and 68, all the personal and real estate of the bankrupt, and all debts due or to be due to him; and as the object of the law is manifestly to benefit the creditor, by making all the pecuniary means and property of the bankrupt available, it has, in furtherance of this object, been construed largely, so as to pass not only what in strictness may be called the property and debts of the bankrupt, but also all the rights of action in cases of real or personal damage, by which his property had been diminished in value, withheld, or taken away from him. But causes of action not falling within this description, but arising out of violence to the person of the bankrupt, for which he is entitled to damages, whether his property be diminished or impaired, or not, are clearly not within the letter, and have never been held to be within the spirit of the enactment, even in cases where an injury of this kind may have been accompanied or followed by loss of property. And to this class, the action of trespass quare clausum fregit must be considered to belong. These rights of action are given in respect of the immediate and present violation of the possession of the bankrupt, independently of his right of property and the protection which the law throws around the person, and substantial damages may be recovered in respect of these rights, where no loss or diminution of property has accrued. And even where such an incident has accompanied or followed a wrong of this description, the primary personal injury to the bankrupt being the principal and essential cause of action, it still remains in him, and does not vest in the assignee. On these grounds the case of Clarke v. Calvert appears to have proceeded, and on these grounds the present judgment must be affirmed. Judgment below affirmed.

Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts.

COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

Tuesday, Dec. 10.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.)

In the Matter of JAMES TAYLOR, an Insolvent Debtor.

A final order rescinded.

This being the first rescinding of a final order, much interest was excited. The insolvent a coffee-shop keeper, filed his petition for protection under the 5 & 6 Vict. on the 15th June last, and obtained his final order in August following.

Buchanan, on behalf of several creditors, urged that his Honour should rescind the same so far as relates to the protection of the person from process, on the ground that the petition had been filed in fraud, and the insolvent had not made a full disclosure of his estate and effects, in proof of which several respectable witnesses were called, and stated that the insolvent had given a bill of sale of the whole of his property ten days before the filing his petition in this Court for 70*l.* Although no consideration was proved to have been given, a few days after obtaining his final order, he called on a creditor named Hopkinson (a grocer) for the purpose of borrowing money, and offered as security a bill of sale of his property, and when asked how he happened to have money so soon after his insolvency, he answered, "It's all right, the things are mine; Osborne only held them till I got my final order." Other creditors proved the insolvent had offered his business, &c. as being his own. His attorney tried to prove that it was done by his client merely as the agent for Osborne, and on being severely cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan, the insolvent denied all the facts. The Commissioner then adjourned the case until the 20th November, that Osborne might attend and be examined. He attended accordingly, and told the Court he had lent the insolvent 40*l.* for which the bill of sale was given; and when asked where he got the money from, said he had sold and pledged goods to the amount, but did not know where he had pawned them. This statement appeared so improbable that his Honour again adjourned the case till to-day, that Osborne might furnish Mr. Buchanan with better particulars as to how he obtained the money, and on the case being called for hearing, neither Osborne nor the insolvent was present, although notices had been specially sent them.

His HONOUR, after hearing Mr. Buchanan for the creditors, said it was a gross case of fraud, and rescinded the final order as far as relates to the protection of the person from process.

COUNTRY COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

BRISTOL DISTRICT BANKRUPTCY COURT.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Serjt. STEPHEN.)

Wednesday, Dec. 4.

Re STEPHEN YEARSLEY.

An insolvent arrested after final order, may obtain an order for his discharge on application to the Commissioner who made the final order.

This insolvent had obtained a final order under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, notwithstanding which, a creditor named Heane, who was properly included in the insolvent's schedule, and who had received express notice of the petition, had taken the insolvent in execution, and now detained him for a debt inserted in his schedule.

A. W. Gay, of Cheltenham, on an affidavit of these facts, applied under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 29, for an order for the petitioner's immediate discharge.

His HONOUR observed that the grammatical construction of the words, "such order as last aforesaid," occurring in sec. 29, inclined him to doubt whether it was applicable to the petitioner's case, and referred to and commented upon the 25th section in connection therewith, and also sections 6 and 23.

Gay contended that the 23rd section related only to the case of a prisoner "at the time of filing the petition," whereas the 29th section applied to all parties arrested after final order. (a)

His HONOUR said, as there was some doubt on the wording of the statute, he would, in this case, only grant a rule calling on the plaintiff to shew cause why the petitioner should not be discharged.

Rule nisi granted accordingly.

On the 2nd inst. Gay produced an affidavit of service of the rule nisi, and quoted Ex parte Hewitt (Birmingham, 9th May, 1844), in which Mr. Commissioner Daniell held that the Court could exercise the power now prayed for. The judgment of that learned commissioner was to the effect, among other things, "That he had no doubt that the arrest of a party who had obtained a final order under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, was a contempt, and was punishable in the same manner as contempts of all other courts of record. If it were otherwise, that statute, so far as related to some of its most important enactments, would be a dead letter; for he knew not by what other means the protection professed to be given by the order could be enforced in cases where a judgment had been entered up before the date of the order." And as to this being the proper Court to apply for the insolvent's discharge, the learned commissioner observed, "He thought he was not unwarranted in drawing the conclusion, that in case of an arrest of an insolvent after a final order upon a judgment entered up before it, the judges of the superior courts would not feel themselves authorized to order the insolvent to be discharged." After referring to the impossibility of the petitioner's pleading the final order in bar, where the judgment was entered up before the granting of the final order, Gay concluded his quotations with the following paragraph from the same judgment:—"The insolvent would be wholly destitute of the protection intended to be afforded him if that Court did not possess the means of enforcing it; and that it does possess them he had no doubt. He had no doubt that such arrest, if made by a party duly apprized of the existence of such an order, was a contempt of Court, punishable by fine or imprisonment; and that if an insolvent so arrested should make an application to that Court, he should not have a moment's hesitation in ordering his discharge; and on being satisfied that the contempt was wilful, should visit it with such punishment, either by way of fine or imprisonment, as the circumstances of the case might appear to require. That the production of such order, signed by the commissioner, would be perfectly sufficient, without further proof, to render the party or officers amenable to all consequences of disobedience; and he should have adopted the course pursued by Lord Eldon in Ex parte Byrne (1 Ves. & B. 316; 1 Rose, 451), and have ordered the plaintiff in the action and the officers to discharge the insolvent instanter."

His HONOUR said that he was desirous of affording the detaining creditor a further opportunity of explanation; and directed that Heane should be served with notice to the effect, that unless he shewed cause to the contrary, the Court would on Wednesday make a peremptory order for the petitioner's immediate release from custody.

On this day, on production of an affidavit of service, and no cause being shewn to the contrary, his Honour granted the order prayed for.

Monday, Dec. 9.

Re LANE.

Creditors may only oppose in person or by attorneys enrolled in the Court—Practice on shewing cause against final order.

This was the day named for the insolvent's final order, when Gaisford, of Berkeley, solicitor, appeared, and stated his intention to oppose on behalf of a creditor.

Homes, for the insolvent, objected that Mr. Gaisford was not enrolled in this Court.

His HONOUR.—I cannot allow any person to appear and oppose for a creditor, unless the party appearing is an attorney duly enrolled in this Court.

Gaisford then said he was himself a creditor, and on its appearing that he was entered as a creditor for a sum of thirty shillings for law charges, he proceeded to oppose on his own account. He proposed to examine the insolvent, when

Homes objected that the insolvent had already passed his examination; this was the day named for the final order, and if the opposing creditor wished to examine the insolvent for any purpose, it must be only as a witness, and the purpose must be stated beforehand. He submitted that the opposing creditor had now upon himself the whole burden of shewing cause against the final order, and should first

(a) By the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in Re Partington, reported ante, p. 173, the order which the Commissioner is empowered to give by section 29, is decided to be a final order to take effect at a future period, with a limit as to the power of [illegible] state what cause he proposed to shew, and then prove his case by witnesses.

His Honour.—We invariably require creditors opposing on the final order to state the grounds of opposition on which they rely.

Gaisford then said, the points he relied on were the omission of a creditor, and that the schedule did not contain a full discovery of the insolvent's estate.

Homes objected that it was now too late to enter into the grounds of opposition mentioned in sec. 24 of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. Creditors relying on any such ground of opposition should oppose on the day for the first hearing, or some adjournment thereof. Notice of that day was now given to the creditors, and it was their own laches to neglect it, and delay their attendance until the final order. The words "on the day for the first examination, or some adjournment thereof," ride over the whole of the 24th section, and there is no other clause in either of the Acts which permits a creditor to oppose on any of those grounds after a day has been named for the final order.

His Honour.—Then what is shewing cause against the final order?

Homes.—Pointing out some fatal objection to the proceedings; such as, for example, an inaccuracy in the petition or affidavit; proving that insolvent was a trader liable to the bankrupt laws, or shewing that he had not resided within the district for twelve months. All such matters as these may properly be shewn as cause against the final order; but by the 24th section the commissioner is to be satisfied that the insolvent has made a full discovery, &c. before, and not after, a day is appointed for the final order. It has been decided that a remand could not be made under the 24th section on the day of the final order for the same reason.(a) The object of the Legislature seems to have been to require vigilance on the part of the creditor, and limits him to only one opportunity of opposing. After the first hearing, the matter is settled as far as regards any of the points of opposition enumerated in section 24, and the creditor can then only shew cause on some fundamental objection, striking at the jurisdiction of the Court in the matter of the petition.

Gaisford said that his debt being under 5*l.* he had no notice of the first hearing.

His Honour.—The words in the two Acts relative to naming a day for the final order are exactly the same; by the 4th sec. of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, the Court was "to cause notice to be given that on a certain day to be named therein, he would proceed to make an order, unless cause be shewn to the contrary, which order shall be called a final order." The words in the 24th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, are precisely the same. Under the first Act, a creditor was allowed to oppose on the day named for the final order on any of the grounds set forth in the 4th section of that Act; and the words of the new Act being the same, I see no reason to alter the practice. Why is the power of adjourning the final order sine die given by section 27 unless an opposition be contemplated? It appears to me that the Court has even a wider discretion as to the cause that may be shewn against the final order than it has under the 24th section, which specifies particular grounds of opposition. I will not at any time refuse to permit a creditor to examine the insolvent on a suggestion that a true account has not been given of his estate and effects: to refuse such a permission may lead to mischief and encourage fraud.

Gaisford then proceeded with his examination.

Ecclesiastical Courts.

ARCHES COURT.

Saturday, Nov. 2.

The Dean of the Arches took his seat at ten o'clock, and opened the Ecclesiastical Courts with prayer and the usual formalities.

The Office of the Judge Promoted by Titchmarsh v. Chapman.

When clergymen are called upon to read the Burial Service of the Church of England over the body of a parishioner, what is the "convenient warning" to which they are entitled under the 68th canon.

This is a proceeding under the Church Discipline Act, brought by letters of request from the Bishop of Ely, against the Rev. Herbert Chapman, vicar of Basingbourne, in the diocese of Ely, for having violated the 68th canon of the Church of England by refusing, without sufficient cause, to bury the corpse of the infant daughter of a parishioner on the 26th of May, 1841."

The articles laying the charge having been admitted, a defensive allegation was offered on behalf of the Rev. H. Chapman. It pleaded that the parents of the child belonged to a sect known as Independents; that the minister and members of that sect avowed open hostility to the Church of England, and that consequently they were ipso facto excommunicate; that the child herself had been baptized by a minister thus excommunicate; that the baptism was thereby heretical and schismatical, and in consequence the child, being "unbaptized" within the meaning of the Rubric of the Book of Common Prayer, was not entitled to have the burial service of the Church read over her body. This defensive allegation was rejected by the Court during the last Term, in a very elaborate judgment. (Reported at length in 3 Law T. 353.)

The articles having gone to proof, the case now came on to be heard upon the evidence.

Phillimore and Harding, for the rev. defendant.—The canon under which this proceeding has been instituted provides that "convenient warning" shall be given to every clergyman before he is called upon to perform the burial service. Indeed, that warning is absolutely necessary to an obedience of the requirements of the canon. It enjoins that the Burial Service shall be read over all parishioners excepting those who are "excommunicate." Without notice, how can a clergyman tell who have or who have not been excommunicated? —and if he read the service over a corpse not entitled thereto, he is liable to censure. So "convenient warning" being indispensable, what was the warning given in this case? The evidence is, that the father of the child took the corpse to the porch of the church—there left it—then ran down to the vicarage, and, meeting the vicar, requested him at once to bury the body. Was this "convenient" warning? Did this enable the vicar to ascertain whether the person to be buried was or was not excommunicate? To hold such to be the due notice required by the canon would be to introduce scandal and confusion into every parish of the land. The present is a criminal proceeding, and the objection that the defendant had relied upon another and more substantive defence at the time, is utterly opposed to every principle prevailing in such cases.

Sir J. Dodson, Q.A. and Addams, contrà.—Here the charge against the clergyman is not that he has been guilty of delay, but that he has twice positively refused to bury the body of a child entitled to the privilege of the Church Burial Service. To the former case alone do the words of the canon requiring "convenient warning" apply. No such notice is requisite in a case of refusal. But if this be not so, the evidence proves adequate warning. From the notoriety of the circumstances the defendant must have been aware of the intention to bring the body, and his sole ground of refusal was not the absence of notice, but the inefficacy of the child's baptism.

Sir H. Jenner Fust.—The great point is, whether "convenient warning" has or has not been given; and as it is important to clergymen to ascertain what is sufficient notice in these cases, I shall take time to consider. Cur. adv. vult.

The Office of the Judge Promoted by Nurse v. Henslowe.

The refusal to bury the body of a parishioner baptized by a minister of the sect denominated "Primitive Methodists" is a violation of the 68th canon,(a) and incurs the punishment of suspension for three months. The Court has no power in a proceeding under the canon to alter the penalty.

This is also a proceeding by articles under the Church Discipline Act, brought by letters of request from the Bishop of Norwich, against the Rev. Wm. Henry Henslowe, perpetual curate of the parish of Wormegay, in the county and diocese of Norwich, for having refused, on the 17th of February and the 3rd of March, 1844, to bury the corpse of Sarah Bowden, a parishioner, who had been baptized by a minister of the sect known as "Primitive Methodists."

The articles having been admitted, the rev. defendant (who conducted his own case) gave thereto a negative issue; but subsequently he has retracted that plea, and given an affirmative issue, thereby admitting the facts as set forth in the articles.

Harding and White, for the promoters, cited Mastin v. Escott (2 Curt. 692).

Sir H. Jenner Fust said that, however the Court might lament the position in which the rev. defendant had placed himself, it was bound to pronounce sentence in the terms of the canon. As the proceeding was not under the general ecclesiastical law, the Court had no discretion to diminish or increase the punishment, which the canon had fixed at suspension from the ministry for three months. The Court could not conclude the case without observing that a long protest in arrest of judgment had been delivered to the registrar by Mr. Henslowe. It went into a history, of which no notice whatever could be taken, referring to persons and matters not before the Court, and attributing to those persons the most malevolent motives. The Court lamented that a case of this kind should be brought before it, and that a clergyman should place himself in a situation from which the Court could not relieve him. It would be wise on the part of clergymen to recollect that an unsuccessful opposition to a legal right only afforded a triumph to those who sought the downfal of the Established Church. It was his duty now to pronounce that the defendant in the cause had incurred the penalty affixed by the canon, unless he had any thing to urge to the contrary.

Mr. Henslowe alleged that justice had not been done him. He complained of the proceedings.

Sir H. Jenner Fust.—You have admitted the facts as set forth in the articles.

Mr. Henslowe.—I did so because I was intimidated on the ground of costs. I was sensible that there was a predetermination.

Sir H. Jenner Fust.—I cannot hear this. I must desire the registrar to record that Mr. Henslowe is suspended from the ministry for the space of three months, and he is condemned in the costs of the proceedings.

Mr. Henslowe.—I solemnly protest against this judgment. I will appeal to the great council of the realm and to the Convocation.

Sir H. Jenner Fust.—If you mean to appeal, you must appeal to her Majesty in Council. Let the sentence take effect from the 10th of November.

QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Before Lord Denman, C.J.)

Hill v. Stratford.

Under a plea of illegality of consideration and notice thereof to an action on bill of exchange, evidence of the pecuniary circumstances of the person from whom the holder obtained it may be given, as it may afford a ground for the jury to infer that the holder had sent notice.

This was an action on bills of exchange for 3,550*l.* by the plaintiff as indorsee, against the defendant as acceptor. Amongst other pleas it was pleaded that the consideration of the bills was a gambling debt due to the drawer, one Coghlan, and that the plaintiff had discounted them with notice. The evidence clearly established the illegal nature of the consideration as alleged, and then evidence was offered of the pecuniary circumstances of Coghlan, for whom the plaintiff had discounted the bills for 3,000*l.* to shew that he was hiding from his creditors, and had long been so, and that many executions against him were unsatisfied, when Kelly, Q. C. objected that it was incumbent upon the defendant to prove that there was a distinct communication of the nature of the consideration to the plaintiff before he discounted the bills, and that the position and circumstances of Coghlan were wholly immaterial and irrelevant.

Jerris, Q.C. (with whom was Shee, Serjt. and Henderson) argued that the evidence was admissible, for that there was no necessity to prove a notice in distinct terms, but that the fact of such a notice having been given might be inferred from a number of concurrent circumstances, and one such circumstance of great importance was that Coghlan, to whom the plaintiff had given so large a sum of money as 3,000*l.* was in a state of hopeless insolvency, and it had been proved that the plaintiff was in some degree acquainted with him prior to this transaction. There is no necessity to prove express notice.

Kelly, Q. C. said he should not enter into the question whether express notice must be proved, but insisted that even if it were proved that the plaintiff knew of the state of Coghlan's circumstances, that would be irrelevant to the issues under which it was incumbent on the defendant to prove that a certain communication was made by Coghlan to the plaintiff. Such evidence, if admitted, would give rise to a number of collateral issues, and let in evidence on the other side to explain how the money came to be given to Coghlan, and why he then received so large a sum.

Lord Denman, C.J.—It certainly does admit that consequence, but I nevertheless think that it may be shewn that Coghlan was in extremely embarrassed circumstances, and therefore not likely to have bonâ fide transactions of this extent. It will, of course, be open to the other side to offer explanations.

Kelly, Q. C. requested his lordship to take a note of the objection, and the evidence was then admitted.

In summing up, Lord Denman evidently laid great stress upon the circumstances and character of Coghlan, although he told the jury that they were not to find for the defendant unless they could say that they could not doubt that the plaintiff knew of the gambling nature of the consideration.

After a brief deliberation, the jury found a verdict on the plea as to notice for the defendant.

Verdict for the defendant.

(a) See Re Baker, 3 Law T. [illegible]; and Re Waterfield, ib. 486; but see also Re Partington, ante, p. 172.

(a) The 68th canon is as follows:—"Ministers not to refuse to christen or bury.—No minister shall refuse or delay to christen any childe according to the form of the Booke of Common Prayer, that is brought to the church to him upon Sundayes or Holy-dayes to bee christened, or to bury any corpes that is brought to the church or churchyard (convenient warning being given him thereof before) in such manner and forme as is prescribed in the sayd Booke of Common Prayer. And if he shall refuse to christen the one or bury the other, except the party deceased were denounced excommunicated, majori excommunicatione, for some grievous and notorious crime (and no man able to testifie of his repentance), he shall be suspended by the bishop of the diocese from his ministry by the space of three months."

Tuesday, Dec. 3.

REG. v. GORDON.

Evidence of payment to banker—Notice to produce documents in the custody of the officers of the Court of Chancery—Two witnesses to prove perjury.

This was an indictment for perjury arising out of Chancery proceedings taken by a Mr. Price, now dead, against the firm of which the defendant was a member, to restrain them from proceeding on certain promissory notes. It appeared that, some months after the bill and answer had been filed, a supplemental bill had been filed, to which the defendant put in an answer in due course. In this answer an account was given as to the notes in question different from that in the first answer; it being stated in the second answer that one of them had been taken from the custody of Mr. Bryant, who had advanced money upon it as a security, and deposited with Messrs. Glyn, which was contrary to the statements in the first answer, that it had been always in Mr. Bryant's possession. The defendant was indicted for perjury upon the first answer.

Kelly, Q.C. and Butt, for the prosecution.

Jervis, Q.C. Bodkin, and Humfrey, for the defence.

In the course of the trial, Kelly called two clerks in Messrs. Glyn's house, Mr. Daniel and Mr. Pickering, the object being to prove the payment of 1,000*l*. by Mr. Gordon. The ledger was produced, and it appeared that the practice was for Daniel to receive the payment, and write the amount on a piece of paper, which was then handed to Pickering, who entered it into the ledger, and it was given to the person paying in. Neither of them from his own memory could recollect the fact of the payment, and the question was, whether they might be allowed to refresh their memory from the book.

Jervis objected to this, as the paper from which the entry was made was not produced.

Kelly.—It was in the course of Pickering's business to receive the memorandum from Daniel, and enter something in the book; and this fact of entry may be proved without the production of the paper. Pickering is not called to prove the fact of payment, but the entry, and then Daniel may recollect the fact of payment.

Lord DENMAN, C. J.—Daniel may certainly be asked what he recollects.

Daniel, however, could recollect nothing, and Pickering was not allowed to refer to the entry.

Kelly, Q. C. then called for the pass-book. It was not produced, and Jervis, Q.C. objected that it was not in the possession of the defendant, and therefore the non-production after notice did not authorize the admission of secondary evidence.

It appeared that the pass-book had been given up under an order in Chancery, and was in the custody of the clerk of the records, together with other books and papers. Some of these he had produced and had in court, but the pass-book was not forthcoming.

Jervis, Q.C. said, that the prosecutor could have obtained it equally with the defendant, however,

Lord DENMAN, C.J. ruled, that it was so far within the power of the defendant, that secondary evidence might be given; but, at the request of Jervis, his lordship took a note of the objection, when,

Kelly, Q. C. said, in that case, rather than incur any risk, he would withdraw the evidence.

The evidence of the perjury consisted merely of the statement on oath in the second answer, contradicting the first, and a statement of the witness in whose custody the notes in the first answer were said to have been, that he recollected the defendant telling him at a subsequent period that he, the defendant, had had the note from him for the purpose of depositing it at Messrs. Glyn's. The witness, however, swore that he himself had not the slightest recollection of this, and that the note (one for 1,000*l*.) had, to the best of his knowledge and belief, never been out of his possession during the period stated, and that it was locked up in his strong box and sent every night to his bankers'; and that most certainly he had never been to Messrs. Glyn for any purpose connected with the note. He admitted, however, that had he been asked by Gordon to allow him to have it for any special purpose, he should not have refused, having full confidence that it would be returned.

Jervis, in his address to the jury, said that his lordship would point out to them that as the law required two witnesses to prove perjury, there was, in fact, no evidence to go for their consideration, but Lord DENMAN, C.J. in the course of his summing up, treated the evidence as sufficient.

Jervis objected to the direction.

Lord DENMAN, C.J.—The rule of law with reference to two witnesses being necessary has been much relaxed. I consider it sufficient if there are circumstances sufficient to shew that the statement is false. I am not aware that any case has gone so far as this, but here, although there is only one witness who speaks to the conversation with the defendant, there is also his oath, and there is evidence to go to the jury. The requirements as to two witnesses are sufficiently complied with.

The jury almost immediately acquitted the defendant, and the point therefore will not be decided at present. Verdict for the defendant.

[The first point is reported to shew the necessity of counsel who advise on the evidence being acquainted with the exact course of business in a bank or other office. The secondary evidence was most properly rejected. As to the ruling of Lord Denman, it is in accordance with his previous holding in Rex v. Mayhew (6 C. & P. 315); but see Wheatland's case (8 C. & P. 259, before Gurney, B.), and Mary Jackson's case (1 Lew. 270, before Holroyd, J.), and the note of the learned editor of Russell on Crimes, vol. 2, 653, where the objection is clearly put, that it is a mere assumption to say that the second statement is false.]

WESTERN CIRCUIT.

SOMERSET WINTER CIRCUIT.

Taunton, Dec. 10.

(Before Mr. Baron ALDERSON.)

REG. v. WILLIAM CLOTHIER and JAMES TILER.

Practice.

Where prisoners are jointly indicted, and a statement is put in evidence in which he implicates the other, the judge will sum up the cases separately, requesting the jury to consult and come to a decision upon the one case, but not to deliver their verdict, and then he will sum up the case of the other, and take the verdict against both.

The prisoners were jointly indicted for burglary.

On the part of the prosecution, a statement by prisoner Clothier was put in evidence, admitting his own guilt and affecting prisoner Tiler.

ALDERSON, B. (to the jury).—The evidence affects the two prisoners differently. Clothier has made a statement involving Tiler, which is not evidence against Tiler. That your judgments might not unconsciously be biassed by a statement, which is evidence against the one and not against the other, I shall first lay before you the case of Tiler alone, and ask you to form your opinion upon that, and then I will call your attention to the case as against Clothier.

His Lordship having summed up the evidence as it affected Tiler, requested the jury to consult and come to a decision upon his case, but not to say what that decision was.

The jury having deliberated, and announced that they had decided,

His Lordship proceeded to sum up the evidence as it affected Clothier. Verdict—Tiler, not guilty. Clothier, guilty.

Stone, for the prosecution.

Edwards, for prisoner Tiler.

Clothier was undefended.

REG. v. CHARLES DYER.

Practice.

Even where the prisoner is defended by counsel, he will be permitted to make a statement in his defence, and afterwards his counsel may address the jury and comment upon the prisoner's statement, together with the evidence for the prosecution.

The prisoner was indicted for larceny.

Stone, for the prisoner, in his address to the jury, remarked upon the hardship of the prisoner's position, who could himself give no evidence to contradict the statements of the witnesses against him.

ALDERSON, B. (interrupting).—You have no right to make such an observation. The prisoner might make his own statement in explanation in contradiction of the evidence against him.

Stone.—There are contradictory decisions upon that. Some learned judges have refused to permit a prisoner who is represented by counsel to make a statement. In Reg. v. Malings (8 C. & P. 242), Patteson, J. permitted the prisoner to do so, but only under special circumstances, as it is expressly stated in the report.

ALDERSON, B.—I would never prevent a prisoner from making a statement though he has counsel. He may make any statement he pleases before his counsel addresses the jury, and then his counsel may comment upon that statement as a part of the case. If it were otherwise, the most monstrous injustice might result to prisoners. If the statement of the prisoner fits in with the evidence, it would be very material, and we should have no right to shut it out.

Thursday, Dec. 12.

REG. v. JOHN ROBINS.

Practice.

Where a long period of time (nearly two years) has elapsed from the time of the committing of the offence before complaint was made to the justices, the case will not be permitted to go to the jury.

Prisoner was indicted for bestiality.

No counsel appearing for the prosecution, the depositions were handed to Fitzherbert, and his Lordship directed his attention to the date of the offence, and the time when the parties went before the magistrates.

The offence was alleged to have been committed on the 17th of December, 1842, but no complaint was made to the justices until Oct. 1844.

The first witness being called, his Lordship asked him why he did not mention the offence until so long a time had elapsed. Witness said he did do so.

ALDERSON, B.—Yes, but not to a magistrate. Is there a confession?

Fitzherbert.—No, and I am unable to explain satisfactorily the cause of the delay.

ALDERSON, B. (to the jury).—I ought not to allow this case to go farther. It is monstrous to put a man on his trial after such a lapse of time. How can he account for his conduct so far back? If you accuse a man of a crime the next day, he may be enabled to bring forward his servants and family to say where he was and what he was about at the time; but if the charge be not preferred for a year or more, how can he clear himself? No man's life would be safe if such a prosecution were permitted. It would be very unjust to put him on his trial.

His Lordship then directed the jury to acquit the prisoner.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

THE New Settlement Bill continues to be actively opposed alike in the agricultural and the manufacturing districts. It appears to please nobody, and we believe that in fact it is a crotchet of its parent. There is no probability of its passing, at least without material alteration. It is rumoured that it is not in favour at Somerset-house.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Yesterday being the day to which Parliament stood prorogued, both Houses met pro formâ. The Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Haddington, and the Earl of Dalhousie, at a quarter past two o'clock took their seats as Lords Commissioners in front of the throne, when the LORD CHANCELLOR directed the Deputy-Usher of the Black Rod to summon the House of Commons to hear her Majesty's commission read for the further prorogation of Parliament. In a few minutes Mr. Ley, jun. attended by several officers of the House of Commons, appeared at the bar, upon which her Majesty's commission for the further prorogation of Parliament was read by one of the clerks at the table. The LORD CHANCELLOR then, in the usual form, declared that it was her Majesty's pleasure that her Parliament should be further prorogued to Tuesday, the 4th of February next, then to meet for the despatch of business, and the Parliament was prorogued to that day accordingly. The Lords Commissioners then withdrew, as did also the officers of the House of Commons.

CAP. XCIII.

An Act to Regulate Joint Stock Banks in England. (Sept. 5, 1844.)

THIS statute, on account of its general interest, we give entire.

No joint stock bank established after 6th May last to carry on business unless by virtue of letters patent granted according to this Act; but companies previously established not restrained from carrying on business until letters patent have been granted.—Whereas the laws in force for the regulation of copartnerships of bankers in England need to be amended: Be it enacted by the Queen's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That it shall not be lawful for any company of more than six persons to carry on the trade or business of bankers in England, after the passing of this Act, under any agreement or covenant of co-partnership made or entered into on or after the sixth day of May last passed, unless by virtue of letters patent to be granted by her Majesty according to the provisions of this Act; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to restrain any such company established before the said sixth day of May, for the purpose of carrying on the said trade or business of bankers in England, from continuing to carry on the said trade and business as legally as they might have done before the passing of this Act, until letters patent shall have been granted to them according to their application.

as herein-after provided, to be made subject to the provisions of this Act.

2. Company to petition for charter.—And be it enacted, That before beginning to exercise the said trade or business every such company shall present a petition to her Majesty in Council, praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to grant to them letters patent under this Act; and every such petition shall be signed by seven at least of the said company, and shall set forth the following particulars (that is to say):—

First, The names and additions of all the partners of the company, and the name of the street, square, or other place where each of the said partners reside:

Second, The proposed name of the bank:

Third, The name of the street, square, or other local description of the place or places where the business of the bank is to be carried on:

Fourth, The proposed amount of the capital stock, not being in any case less than one hundred thousand pounds, and the means by which it is to be raised:

Fifth, The amount of capital stock then paid up, and where and how invested:

Sixth, The proposed number of shares in the business:

Seventh, The amount of each share, not being less than one hundred pounds each.

3. Charter to be granted on report of Board of Trade.—And be it enacted, That every such petition shall be referred by her Majesty to the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations, and so soon as the lords of the said committee shall have reported to her Majesty that the provisions of this Act have been complied with on the part of the said company, it shall thereupon be lawful for her Majesty, if her Majesty shall so think fit, with the advice of her Privy Council, to grant the said letters patent.

4. Deed of settlement.—And be it enacted, That the deed of partnership of every such banking company shall be prepared according to a form to be approved by the lords of the said committee, and shall, in addition to any other provisions which may be contained therein, contain specific provisions for the following purposes (that is to say),—

First, For holding ordinary general meetings of the company once at least in every year, at an appointed time and place:

Second, For holding extraordinary general meetings of the company, upon the requisition of nine shareholders or more, having in the whole at least twenty-one shares in the partnership business:

Third, For the management of the affairs of the company, and the election and qualification of the directors:

Fourth, For the retirement of at least one-fourth of the directors yearly, and for preventing the re-election of the retiring directors for at least twelve calendar months:

Fifth, For preventing the company from purchasing any shares or making advances of money, or securities for money, to any person on the security of a share or shares in the partnership business:

Sixth, For the publication of the assets and liabilities of the company once at least in every calendar month:

Seventh, For the yearly audit of the accounts of the company by two or more auditors chosen at a general meeting of the shareholders, and not being directors at the time:

Eighth, For the yearly communication of the auditors' report, and of a balance-sheet, and profit and loss account, to every shareholder:

Ninth, For the appointment of a manager or other officer to perform the duties of manager:

and such deed, executed by the holders of at least one half of the shares in the said business, on which not less than ten pounds on each such share of one hundred pounds, and in proportion for every share of larger amount, shall have been then paid up, shall be annexed to the petition; and the provisions of such deed, with such others as to her Majesty shall seem fit, shall be set forth in the letters patent.

5. No company to commence business till deed executed and all the shares subscribed for and at least half the amount paid up.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any such company to commence business until all the shares shall have been subscribed for, and until the deed of partnership shall have been executed, personally or by some person duly authorized by warrant of attorney to execute the same on behalf of such holder or holders, by the holders of all the shares in the said business, and until a sum of not less than one-half of the amount of each share shall have been paid up in respect of each such share; and it shall not be lawful for the company to repay any part of the sum so paid up without leave of the lords of the said committee.

6. Company to be incorporated.—And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for her Majesty in and by such letters patent to grant that the persons by whom the said deed of partnership shall have been executed, and all other persons who shall thereafter become shareholders in the said banking business, their executors, administrators, successors, and assigns respectively, shall be one body politic and corporate, by such name as shall be given to them in and by the said letters patent, for the purpose of carrying on the said banking business, and by that name shall have perpetual succession and a common seal, and shall have power to purchase and hold lands of such annual value as shall be expressed in such letters patent; and such letters patent shall be granted for a term of years, not exceeding twenty years, and may be made subject to such other provisions and stipulations as to her Majesty may seem fit.

7. Incorporation not to limit the liability of the shareholders.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That notwithstanding such incorporation the several shareholders for the time being in the said banking business, and those who have been shareholders therein, and their several executors, administrators, successors, and assigns, shall be and continue liable for all the dealings, covenants, and undertakings of the said company, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, as fully as if the said company were not incorporated.

8. Actions by or against shareholders.—And be it enacted, That no action or suit by or against the company shall be in anywise affected by reason of the plaintiff or defendant therein being a shareholder or former shareholder of the company; but any such shareholder, either alone or jointly with another person as against the company, or the company as against any such shareholder, either alone or jointly with any other person, shall have the same action and remedy in respect of any cause of action or suit whatever which such shareholder or company might have had if such cause of action or suit had arisen with a stranger.

9. Decree or judgment to be enforced against company and shareholders.—And be it enacted, That every judgment, decree, or order of any court of justice in any proceeding against the company may be lawfully executed against, and shall have the like effect on, the property and effects of the company, and also, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, upon the person, property, and effects of every shareholder and former shareholder thereof, as if every individual shareholder and former shareholder had been by name a party to such proceeding.

10. Execution against company to precede execution against present or former shareholders.—And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the plaintiff to cause execution upon any judgment, decree, or order obtained by him in any such action or suit against the company to be issued against the property and effects of the company; and if such execution shall be ineffectual to obtain satisfaction of the sums sought to be recovered thereby, then it shall be lawful for him to have execution in satisfaction of such judgment, decree, or order against the person, property, and effects of any shareholder, or, in default of obtaining satisfaction of such judgment, decree, or order, from any shareholder, against the person, property, and effects of any person who was a shareholder of the company at the time when the cause of action against the company arose: provided always, that no person having ceased to be a shareholder of the company shall be liable for the payment of any debt for which any such judgment, decree, or order shall have been so obtained, for which he would not have been liable as a partner in case a suit had been originally brought against him for the same, or for which judgment shall have been obtained, after the expiration of three years from the time when he shall have ceased to be a shareholder of such company; nor shall this Act be deemed to enable any party to a suit to recover from any individual shareholder of the company, or any other person whomsoever, any other or greater sum than might have been recovered if this Act had not been passed.

11. Reimbursement of individual shareholders.—And be it enacted, That every person against whom or against whose property or effects any such execution shall have issued, shall be reimbursed out of the property and effects of the company for all moneys paid, and for all damages, costs, and expenses incurred by him by reason of such execution, or of the action or suit in which the same shall have issued, or in default of such reimbursement, by contribution from the other shareholders of the company.

12. Individuals paying under execution to recover against company.—And be it enacted, That if any such execution be issued against any present or former shareholder of the company, and if, within fourteen days next after the levying of such execution, he be not reimbursed, on demand, out of the property and effects of the company, all such moneys, damages, costs, and expenses as he shall have paid or incurred in consequence of such execution, it shall be lawful for such shareholder, or his executors or administrators, to have execution against the property and effects of the company in satisfaction of such moneys, damages, costs, and expenses; and the amount of such moneys, damages, costs, and expenses shall be ascertained and certified by one of the Masters or other officer of the court out of which such execution shall issue.

13. How such execution is to be had.—And be it enacted, That in the cases provided by this Act for execution on any judgment, decree, or order in any action or suit against the company, to be issued against the person or against the property and effects of any shareholder or former shareholder of such company, or against the property and effects of the company at the suit of any shareholder or former shareholder, in satisfaction of any moneys, damages, costs, and expenses paid or incurred by him as aforesaid in any action or suit against the company, such execution may be issued by leave of the Court, or of a judge of the Court in which such judgment, decree, or order shall have been obtained, upon motion or summons for a rule to shew cause, or other motion or summons consistent with the practice of the Court, without any suggestion or scire facias in that behalf, and that it shall be lawful for such Court or judge to make absolute or discharge such rule, or allow or dismiss such motion (as the case may be), and to direct the costs of the application to be paid by either party, or to make such order therein as to such Court or judge shall seem fit; and in such cases such form of writs of execution shall be sued out of the courts of law and equity respectively, for giving effect to the provision in that behalf aforesaid, as the judges of such courts respectively shall from time to time think fit to order, and the execution of such writs shall be enforced in like manner as writs of execution are now enforced; provided that any order made by a judge as aforesaid may be discharged or varied by the Court on application made thereto by either party dissatisfied with such order; provided also, that no such motion shall be made nor summons granted for the purpose of charging any shareholder or former shareholder until ten days' notice thereof shall have been given to the person sought to be charged thereby.

14. Contribution to be recovered from other shareholders.—And be it enacted, That if such shareholder be not by the means aforesaid fully paid all such moneys, with interest, damages, costs, and expenses, as he shall have paid or incurred by reason of any such execution, it shall be lawful for him, his executors, or administrators, to divide the amount thereof, or so much thereof as he shall not have been reimbursed, into as many equal parts as there shall then be shares in the capital stock of the company (not including shares then under forfeiture); and every shareholder for the time being of the company, and the executors or administrators of every deceased shareholder, shall, in proportion to the number of shares which they may hold in the company, pay one or more of such parts, upon demand, to the shareholder against whom such execution shall have been issued, or to his executors or administrators; and upon neglect or refusal so to pay, it shall be lawful for such shareholder, his executors, or administrators, to sue for and recover the same against the shareholder, or the executors or administrators of any shareholder, who shall so neglect or refuse as aforesaid, in any of her Majesty's courts of record at Westminster, or in any other court having jurisdiction in respect of such demand.

15. Further remedy in case of bankruptcy, &c. of company's shareholders.—And be it enacted, That if the shareholder or former shareholder against whom any such execution shall have issued, his executors or administrators, shall, by reason of the bankruptcy or insolvency of any shareholder, or from any other cause, but without any neglect or wilful default on his own part, be prevented from recovering any proportion of the moneys, costs, or expenses which he shall have so paid, it shall be lawful for him, his executors or administrators, again to divide the amount of all such moneys, costs, and expenses as shall not have been recovered by him or them into as many equal parts as there shall then be shares in the capital stock of the company (not including the shares then under forfeiture), except the shares in respect of which such default shall have happened; and every shareholder for the time being of the company, and the executors or administrators of every deceased shareholder, except as aforesaid, shall rateably, according to the number of shares which they shall hold in the company, upon demand, pay one or more such last-mentioned parts to the shareholder against whom such execution shall have issued, his executors or administrators; and in default of payment he or they shall have the same remedies in all respects for the recovery thereof as under the provisions hereinbefore mentioned are given in respect of the original proportions of such moneys, damages, costs, and expenses; and if any proportion of the said moneys, damages, costs, and expenses shall remain unpaid by reason of any such bankruptcy, insolvency, or other cause as aforesaid, such shareholder, his executors, or administrators, shall have in like manner, from time to time, and by way of accumulative remedy, the same powers, according to the circumstances of the case, of again dividing and enforcing payment of the amount of such proportion, until he or they shall, in the end, if a former shareholder, be fully reimbursed the whole of the said moneys, costs, and expenses, and if then a shareholder, the whole, excepting the portions belonging to the shares held by him.

16. Memorial to be registered.—And be it enacted,

That within three months after the grant of the said letters patent, and before the company shall begin to carry on their business as bankers, an account or memorial shall be made out, according to the form contained in the schedule marked (A.) to this Act annexed, wherein shall be set forth the true title or firm of the company, and also the names and places of abode of all the members of such company as the same respectively shall appear on the books of such company, and also the name and place of abode of every director and manager or other like officer of the company, and the name or firm of every bank or banks established or to be established by such company, and also the name of every town or place where the business of the said company shall be carried on; and a new account or memorial of the same particulars shall be made by the said company in every year, between the twenty-eighth day of February and the twenty-fifth day of March, while they shall continue to carry on their business as bankers; and every such memorial shall be delivered to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes at the Stamp Office in London, who shall cause the same to be filed and kept in the said Stamp Office, and an entry or registry thereof to be made in a book or books to be there kept for that purpose by some person or persons to be appointed by the said commissioners in that behalf, which book or books any person or persons shall from time to time have liberty to search and inspect on payment of the sum of one shilling for every search; and the company shall from time to time cause to be printed and kept, in a conspicuous place accessible to the public in their office or principal place of business, a list of the registered names and places of abode of all the members of such company for the time being.

17. Memorials of occasional changes. — Provided also, and be it enacted, That the manager or one of the directors of every such company shall, from time to time as occasion shall require, make out in manner hereinbefore directed, and cause to be delivered to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes as aforesaid, a further account or memorial, according to the form contained in the schedule marked (B.) to this Act annexed, of the name and place of abode of every new director, manager, or other like officer of such company, and also of the name or names of any person or persons who shall have ceased to be members of such company, and also of the name or names of any person or persons who shall have become a member or members of such company, either in addition to or instead of any former member or members thereof, and of the name or names of any new or additional town or towns, place or places, where the business of the said company is carried on; and such further account or memorial shall from time to time be filed, and kept and entered and registered at the Stamp Office in London, in like manner as is hereinbefore required with respect to the original or annual account or memorial hereinbefore directed to be made.

18. Form of memorials. 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 62.— And be it enacted, That the several memorials aforesaid shall be signed by the manager or one of the directors of the company, and shall be verified by a declaration of such manager or director before a justice of the peace, or a master or master extraordinary of the high Court of Chancery, made pursuant to the provisions of an Act passed in the sixth year of his late Majesty's reign, intituled "An Act to repeal an Act of the present Session of Parliament, intituled, 'An Act for the more effectual Abolition of Oaths and Affirmations taken and made in various Departments of the State, and to substitute Declarations in lieu thereof, and for the more entire Suppression of voluntary and extra-judicial Oaths and Affidavits,' and to make other provisions for the Abolition of unnecessary Oaths;" and if any declaration so made shall be false in any material particular, the person wilfully making such false declaration shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

19. Evidence of memorials.—And be it enacted, That a true copy of any such memorial, certified under the hand of one of the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes for the time being, upon proof made that such certificate has been signed with the handwriting of the person certifying the same, whom it shall not be necessary to prove to be a Commissioner of Stamps and taxes, shall be received in evidence as proof of the contents of such memorial, and proof shall not be required that the person by whom the memorial shall purport to be verified was, at the time of such verification, the manager or one of the directors of the company.

20. Commissioners of Stamps to give certified copies on payment of ten shillings.—And be it enacted, That the said Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes for the time being shall, upon application made to them by any person or persons requiring a copy, certified according to this Act, of any such account or memorial as aforesaid, in order that the same may be produced in evidence, or for any other purpose, deliver to the person or persons so applying for the same such certified copy, he, she, or they paying for the same the sum of ten shillings and no more.

21. Existing liabilities to continue till new memorials.—And be it enacted, That the person whose names shall appear from time to time in the then last delivered memorial, and their legal representatives, shall be liable to all legal proceedings under this Act, as existing shareholders of the company, and shall be entitled to be reimbursed, as such existing shareholders only, out of the funds or property of the company, for all losses sustained in consequence thereof.

22. Bills and notes to be signed by one director or manager. Manager not personally liable.—And be it enacted, That all bills of exchange or promissory notes made, accepted, or endorsed on behalf of the said company may be made, accepted, or endorsed (as the case may be) in any manner provided by the deed of partnership, so that they be signed by one of the managers or directors of the company, and be by him expressed to be so made, accepted, or endorsed by him on behalf of such company: provided always that nothing herein contained shall be deemed to make any such manager or director liable upon any such bill of exchange or promissory note to any greater extent or in a different manner than upon any other contract signed by him on behalf of any such company; and that every such company, on whose behalf any bill of exchange or promissory note shall be made, accepted, or endorsed in manner and form as aforesaid, may sue and be sued thereon as fully as in the case of any contract made and entered into under their common seal.

23. Transfers of shares to be registered, &c.—And be it enacted, That, subject to the regulations herein contained, and to the provisions of the deed of settlement, every shareholder may sell and transfer his shares in the said company by deed duly stamped, in which the consideration shall be truly stated; and such deed may be according to the form in the schedule marked (C.) annexed to this Act, or to the like effect; and the same (when duly executed) shall be delivered to the secretary, and be kept by him; and the secretary shall enter a memorial thereof in a book, to be called the "Register of Transfers," and shall endorse such entry on the deed of transfer, and for every such entry and endorsement the company may demand any sum not exceeding two shillings and sixpence; and until such transfer have been so delivered to the secretary as aforesaid the purchaser of the share shall not be entitled to receive any share of the profits of the said business, or to vote in respect of such share.

24. Transfer not to be made until all calls paid.—And be it enacted, That no shareholder shall be entitled to transfer any share until he shall have paid all calls for the time being due on every share held by him.

25. Closing of Transfer Books.—And be it enacted, That the directors may close the register of transfers for a period not exceeding fourteen days previous to each ordinary meeting, and may fix a day for the closing of the same, of which seven days' notice shall be given by advertisement in some newspaper as after mentioned; and any transfer made during the time when the transfer books are so closed shall, as between the company and the party claiming under the same, but not otherwise, be considered as made subsequently to such ordinary meeting.

26. Transmission of shares by other means than transfer to be authenticated by a declaration.—And with respect to the registration of shares the interest in which may have become transmitted in consequence of the death or bankruptcy or insolvency of any shareholder, or in consequence of the marriage of a female shareholder, or by any other legal means than by a transfer according to the provisions of this Act, be it enacted, That no person claiming by virtue of any such transmission shall be entitled to receive any share of the profits of the said business, or to vote in respect of any such share as the holder thereof, until such transmission have been authenticated by a declaration in writing as hereinafter mentioned, or in such other manner as the directors shall require; and every such declaration shall state the manner in which and the party to whom such share shall have been so transmitted, and shall be made and signed by some credible person before a justice of the peace, or before a Master or Master Extraordinary in the high Court of Chancery; and such declaration shall be left with the secretary, and thereupon he shall enter the name of the person entitled under such transmission in the register book of shareholders of the company; and for every such entry the company may demand any sum not exceeding two shillings and sixpence.

27. Proof of transmission by marriage, will, &c.—And be it enacted, That if such transmission be by virtue of the marriage of a female shareholder, the said declaration shall contain a copy of the register of such marriage, or other particulars of the celebration thereof, and shall declare the identity of the wife with the holder of such share; and if such transmission have taken place by virtue of any testamentary instrument, or by intestacy, the probate of the will or letters of administration, or an official extract therefrom, shall, together with such declaration, be produced to the secretary; and upon such production, in either of the cases aforesaid, the secretary shall make an entry of the declaration in the said register of transfers.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

Mr. Baron Alderson has repeated at Taunton the suggestion he threw out at Winchester for avoiding a Winter Assize by a new regulation of the Terms, and appointing the regular Assizes at equal intervals. We can never revert to this subject without reminding our readers that there is a more effectual plan for accomplishing the same purpose, and providing for other acknowledged defects in our jurisprudence—the reform of the Quarter Sessions' Courts. That is the simplest and the surest remedy for Winter Assizes, County Courts' Bills, and other evils present and threatening.

The Petition nuisance.—A party of disreputable mendicants have recently infested the neighbourhood of Monmouth with petitions for relief, under various and feigned pretences. In one instance a fellow who bore an apparently respectable exterior, and representing himself as nearly blind, carried a testimonial with him purporting to be signed by several of the resident gentry, and stating the petitioner was reduced from affluent circumstances, nearly the whole of which signatures were forged. In another instance a memorial was sent, bearing the Monmouth postmark, to Penry Williams, esq. the Lord Lieutenant of Breconshire, representing the petitioner, Mrs. Martha Williams, to be the widow of a missionary who had shot himself in the East Indies, and had left a large family without the means of support. This statement purported to be vouched for by the Rev. Mr. Llewellyn, vicar of Dingestow, near Monmouth, and was signed with the forged name of the Bishop of Llandaff, 10*l.* 10*s.*, with several names of the leading families of Monmouthshire for various sums. Mr. Williams forwarded the petition to the postmaster of Monmouth, who immediately ascertained that no person of the name of Llewellyn was incumbent of Dingestow, that the whole affair was a fraud, and the names appended to it forged. In the neighbourhood of Ross the same parties have attempted their impositions, in some cases pretending to be sufferers from fire at Goodrich; and in others purporting to seek assistance to place the petitioner, who represented himself as nearly blind, in an institution for the relief of that affliction. In these instances, the names of some of the Herefordshire gentry are also appended to the memorials, vouching for their accuracy, and with the amount of their subscription annexed to them. The signatures to these petitions are in many cases excellent imitations; they exhibit a natural diversity of style, and are written in ink of several colours. From information given to the police at Ross, where the parties were traced, an active pursuit has been set on foot, which we trust will eventually terminate in their capture. The blind man has an assortment of forged crests, with which he seals his memorial, thereby giving an additional cloak to the fraud.—Cambrian.

The following circular has been addressed to the Bankers:—

"Stamps and Taxes.
"Dec. 2, 1844.

"Gentlemen,—I am directed by the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes to direct your particular attention to the following extract from the Bank Charter Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 32, s. 21:—And be it enacted, 'That every banker in England and Wales who is now carrying on, or shall hereafter carry on business as such, shall, on the first day of January in each year, or within fifteen days thereafter, make a return to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, at their head office in London, of his name, residence, and occupation, or, in the case of a company or partnership, of the name, residence, and occupation of every person composing or being a member of such company or partnership, and also the name of the firm under which such banker, company, or partnership carry on the business of banking, and of every place where such business is carried on, and if any such banker, company, or partnership shall omit or refuse to make such return within fifteen days after the said first day of January, or shall wilfully make other than a true return of the persons as herein required, every banker, company, or partnership so offending shall forfeit and pay the sum of fifty pounds; and the said Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes shall, on or before the first day of March in every year, publish in some newspaper circulating within each town or county respectively, a copy of the return so made by every banker, company, or partnership, carrying on the business of bankers within such town or county respectively, as the case may be.'

"I am also directed to inform you, that the return must be made in the subjoined form, within the time specified by the Act, addressed to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, and marked on the outside 'Banker's Return.'

"I am, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,
"THOMAS KEOGH, Assistant Secretary."

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

THE week has been barren of events interesting to the lawyer. The Reports of the last Term are now completed, and next week we have to present our usual summary of the cases decided. Now that the work is done, we may refer with confidence to the success which has attended this the first attempt ever made to present to the Profession all the written judgments verbatim. It is probable that many of these will never be procurable in any other publication. It is certain that none of them will be published elsewhere for many months.

CHANCERY-OFFICE PAY AND PROFIT.

Much astonishment having been excited in certain high quarters at a few facts respecting remuneration paid in Chancery-offices for what are termed "office-copies," as of bills, answers, interrogatories, affidavits, reports, statement of facts, &c. with all the other technical etcetera of missiles in a Chancery suit, it may be as well to say a word or two by way of supplementary statement in respect of the Masters'-offices, referred to last week. The cause of complaint against these offices arose from the fact of a miserable pittance being given in reward of penmanship labours to the tune of a farthing per folio. It is satisfactory to find that this scale of pay has not been general; but condemnation of the half-penny a folio system will extend to all the Masters'-offices. Now, looking at the practice that has existed for years respecting the places in question, it is surprising so reprehensible a state of things should have existed to the present day. In most public offices some established and specific rules exist for regulating the copying business in them. In the Masters' offices, however, the mechanical part of the business has been executed by means according to the whim or caprice of the individual having control in them. From this has resulted that state of things we have already had occasion to comment upon. In some of the offices much work is done with them during the day, and the remainder is distributed amongst individuals out of them at four o'clock. In another, it appears, means have been devised for applying the screw pressure system to the greatest possible degree of application—the innovation of salaried and farthing-a-folio writers has been tried, and the cries have been loud and deep of "Shame, shame!" In others, again, the work is "farmed" by some favoured individuals out of the office, and holding employment elsewhere, who has had the copying business conferred upon him, and who distributes it amongst a circle of satellites; thence again it frequently finds its way into the hands of a third degree, whose pay, of course, is upon a sliding scale. Now, in certain classes of legal documents, in estimating the number of words in them, they are subdivided into 60, 72, or 90 words to the folio, as it may be. The position of this individual who distributes his favours may be compared to the Irish middleman, who makes much profit by dealing out oppression, and who stands between the landlord and the slave of the soil. He undertakes the writing at ½d. per folio (the quantity used to exceed 1,000 or 1,500 folios in an evening, perhaps it does sometimes, now); his writers are compelled to count it up at 90 words to the folio indiscriminately, and he deducts as his reward 1d. out of every 24 folios done. These pence, with what is made by his re-estimating at 60 or 72, as it may be, places him in a comfortable position at the day of reckoning. It appears ½d. has has been the maximum, about two-thirds the medium, and ¼d. the minimum price paid for preparing office copies, for which solicitors pay 4d. per folio. What becomes of the difference? Let us see. At the maximum price, 1d. profit on every folio goes to the "warrant-officer," who receives a salary of 150*l*. per annum. Now, if 1,500 folios go out in a day from one office, there is a clear profit to him of 6*l*. 5s.; at the minimum, a clear profit of 7*l*. 16s. 3d. The compensation or fee fund receives 2½d. upon every folio; its share then would be 15*l*. 12s. 6d. on the 1,500. Now, what are the several writer's shares? Why, at the maximum 3*l*. 2s. 6d. at the minimum 1*l*. 11s. 3d. out of 25*l*. the cost of 1,500 folios at 4d. After this, need we refer to the late wretched position and pay of the penny-a-shirt people as one of the greatest instances of galling and grinding oppression practised in the metropolis? Let us look to the state of things in the immediate neighbourhood of the High Court of Chancery.—Times.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

SIR,—My attention has been directed to a report in your Saturday's paper, of the case of Charles Warren, who was tried at Winchester, for arson, in which I was counsel for the prisoner. At the close of the evidence for the prosecution, the report proceeds:—

"Mr. Saunders then rose to address the jury, when Mr. Baron Alderson, addressing him, asked him if he had observed the deposition of the last witness?

"The learned counsel said that he had, but that he felt a difficulty in the case; as, if he put it in, he should give his learned friend the reply.

"Mr. Baron Alderson.—And if I put the deposition in I shall prevent his reply. But I think you attribute too much consequence to a speech. You expect to lead the jury by unfair arguments, which, by God's grace, I will try to prevent. I think the deposition very important.

"Mr. Saunders assured the learned judge that he had no such wish as that imputed to him; and as his lordship thought the deposition material, he should certainly put it in."

The words which I have underlined are not correctly reported; and they convey in the place where they occur an impression which is in every way unfair to the judge and to myself.

When I stated that I felt a difficulty in putting in the deposition, because of the reply, the judge said, "There is that difficulty, and if I put in the deposition I shall deprive the prosecutor of a reply." Then addressing me his lordship observed, "But I think you attach too much importance to a speech. If any unjust observations are made to mislead the jury, I shall endeavour to prevent it; but I do not suppose that there will. I think the deposition material."

I do not pledge myself to the very words, but such was their substance. Instead of suggesting that I thought too much of my own speech, as any one reading the report might suppose, his lordship was referring not to my speech but to the reply which would be given if I put in the deposition; and instead of imputing to me personally a wish to mislead the jury by unfair arguments, his lordship's purpose was to intimate that if, in the reply, any unfair arguments were used it would be his duty to remark upon them. Then, to guard against imputation to any one, his lordship, in a marked manner, added the words, "But I do not suppose that there will."

In making this statement, I have the sanction of Mr. Baron Alderson; and I am sure you will do me the justice, by publishing this letter, of correcting an impression which is entirely erroneous and prejudicial.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

Temple, Dec. 9, 1844. CHARLES SAUNDERS.

WHITEHALL, Dec. 11.—The Queen has been pleased to appoint Sir Henry De la Beche, knt. and Thomas Cubitt, esq. to be her Majesty's Commissioners for inquiring into the causes of the falling of a cotton-mill, at Oldham, and as to the failure of a part of the prison, at North Leach.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed Charles Pemberton of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, gent., and Thomas Topham, of Middleham, in the north riding of the county of York, gent. to be Masters Extraordinary in the High Court of Chancery.

MR. FITZROY KELLY.—This gentleman was compelled to quit England for the Continent late last night, in consequence of the sudden and dangerous illness of his daughter, Mrs. Paley.

We understand that the Earl of Rosse is likely to be the new representative peer of Ireland, in the room of the late Earl of Limerick.

THE TEMPLE.—The Benchers of the Hon. Societies of the Inner and Middle Temple have, at length, conceded to the wishes of a large body of requisitionists, members of both societies, for daily service in their church; and it is now announced, that the church will be opened for daily service at nine o'clock a.m.

PROCLAMATION OF OUTLAWRY.—Yesterday a county court of the Sheriff of Middlesex was held at the Sheriffs Court, Red Lion-square, when proclamation of outlawry was made against John Robert Duncan, Frederick Hawkes, Charles John Attwood, — Spalding, Aaron Jolly, Henry Brown, John Scott Lillie, Arthur Selby, Edward Benjamin Lake, James Tongue; and the Court was then adjourned.

SLAVES OF CHANCERY.—During the last term the Lord Chancellor, on occasion of some papers being laid before him, took the opportunity of animadverting upon the way in which office copies of legal documents in Chancery were sometimes executed, in fact, as his Lordship observed, "disgracefully written." The papers in question were copies of depositions in the Examiner's office, for which 8d. per folio had been paid, of which sum the copyist received for his labour 0½d.; his Lordship expressed his surprise at the smallness of the sum, and said "the matter should be looked into." This is one of the best samples of the griping system pursued towards copyists of Chancery-office documents; it is not, however, a thing of modern growth; it has not resulted from the reduction of 18,000*l.* a-year to the public by the abolition of certain Chancery offices in 1842, as previous to that time nearly all the office copies of bills and answers in Chancery were prepared by individuals in the neighbourhood of the Chancery offices, who eked out a wretched existence by copying the parchment documents usually at a trifle less than a halfpenny a folio of ninety words; at that time the charge to solicitors for office copies was 10d. per folio; it is now 4d. The work was then given out in the evening, and executed during the night. It is now done within the Office of Records and Writs. As regards the Masters' office, the old plan still exists of employing persons as copyists who reside in the neighbourhood, independently of the few who have permanent sittings within the Masters' office. The charge for copies of documents in the Masters' office is 4d. per folio of 90 words; of this sum the copyist receives one halfpenny per folio, sometimes less; in fact, to such an extent has this grasping, griping system been carried, that in one at least of these offices the pay has been cut down to one farthing per folio of 90 words. A steady writer will get over 10 folios in an hour:—what is the result of his labour for a day's work of 10 hours at a farthing per folio?—2s. 1d.! A great part of the copies of documents in the Masters' office are and ever were prepared at night, and delivered in by 10 o'clock in the morning by individuals who, to carry out their miserable existence, lend, and have lent, their aid in perpetuating a system that has long required investigation and amendment. Many an unfortunate being, whose fortune has not thrown better means in his way, with a view of putting a larger loaf before his impoverished and half-famished family, by the present copying system, secures, as the reward of his midnight toil, at one farthing per folio, perhaps 1s. 6d. and an early passage to the grave; whilst the sleek and well-paid Chancery-office clerk proceeds in his career of wealth, extracted from the pockets of Chancery litigants through the toilsome pen of the miserable office-copy slave.—Times.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.—Two most important railway meetings have been held at Liverpool this week—first, for the purpose of submitting the conditional agreement entered into by the Liverpool and Manchester Company with the North Union Company for the amalgamation of the lines, and other minor matters; and, secondly, to obtain the sanction of the proprietors of the Grand Junction Company to the consolidation of the Manchester line with theirs. The terms of the first agreement are, that each consolidated North Union stock be considered equivalent to 64*l.* 7s. 6d. of the Liverpool and Manchester, or amalgamated stock. Those of the second, as stated in the report that the Liverpool and Manchester Company having already created new 40*l.* shares this year to extinguish their debt, and the Grand Junction Company having issued new 12*l.* 10s. shares to meet their subscriptions to the Lancaster and Carlisle Company, each holder of a Grand Junction 100*l.* share, or other stock equivalent in amount, shall have a new 25*l.* share, and that being done, that the whole shall be consolidated on equal terms, in one capital stock (instead of shares), under clauses in the Bill for which, with the concurrence of the trustees, the directors intend to apply in the ensuing session.

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.—A woman, 52 years of age, the wife of a small farmer named Benvoisin, residing at Epreville, was tried on the 27th ult. before the Court of Assizes of the Eure, for the murder of her brother, Pierre Vautier. It appeared from the indictment and the evidence that the brother and the sister had for nearly 15 years been on bad terms, in consequence of the anger felt by the latter at her brother having a larger portion of the property left by the father than she thought right, and that Vautier, in his just resentment against his sister, who was a woman of the worst feelings, had made a will bequeathing his property (about 16,000*f.*) to a friend. The mother, however, being attacked with severe illness, and therefore desirous of seeing her daughter, Vautier, who resided with his mother, consented to receive his sister, and at the death-bed of the parent a reconciliation took place. Vautier having about the period of his mother's death broken his thigh, the sister remained at his house to nurse him; and although her selfish disposition was again shewn by her desiring to have the whole of the household furniture of the deceased, and a quarrel ensued, yet Vautier, as a proof that the reconciliation made by the bedside of his mother was sincere on his part, revoked the will which he had made in favour of his friend, and executed another, in which he left everything to his sister. This act of generosity caused his death. The prisoner anxious to get immediate possession of the property, and taking advantage of his feeble state, entered his room at night, and with a club beat out his brains. Early on the following morning she went to a neighbour, and told him that during the night some thieves had broken in, and after robbing the house, had murdered her brother. The character of the woman, however, created suspicion, and the officers of justice had soon proof that the murder was committed by her. On the trial the evidence was such as not to admit of a doubt of her guilt; but the jury, to the surprise of the Court, declared that there was no proof of the murder having been committed with premeditation. She was therefore only sentenced to imprisonment for life, with hard labour. A remarkable fact was revealed on the trial, shewing that even the most calculating criminals frequently commit great oversights. The murderess had taken the precaution, after the consummation of the crime, to proceed to a neighbouring spring, and wash away the stains of blood from her hands and some of her clothing, but she had placed a bloody hand upon a latch on the inner side of a door which was locked, and the key of which was found in her possession. Her story of thieves having entered the house was contradicted by this fact, for they could not subsequently have locked a door of which they had not the key; the marks of blood also were those of the left hand, and it was proved that the prisoner was left-handed.—Galignani's Messenger.

STATISTICS OF CRIME.—The National states that the number of thieves who pursue their Profession in the capital, according to M. Gisquet, amounts to 10,000. Of this number 6,000 would take your purse if they found it lying about; 3,000 would pick your pocket; 2,000 would pick the lock of your door; 1,000 would enter your apartment at night by breaking open your doors or windows; and 600 would not hesitate to commit murder in order to effect a robbery. The Prefect of Police of Paris, yielding to the appeals of the press, had resolved that the night patrols, which hitherto consisted of six men each, should hereafter be reduced to three, so as to render the rounds more numerous, and consequently more efficacious. The Constitutionnel pronounces the measure to be insufficient, and observes that a few isolated precautions cannot remedy the imperfections of the present system, and that the gravity of circumstances, the light thrown by recent trials on the organization of bands of malefactors which have existed undisturbed since 1836, and the alarm of the population, imperiously require a complete reform in the police of the metropolis.

IRELAND.

RIGHT OF CHALLENGE IN FELONY CASES.

In consequence of the decision of the House of Lords in the appeal of Reg. v. Samuel Gray, the Government have caused circulars to be issued to the Crown solicitors, directing them to sue out writs of error in the cases of the several prisoners tried at the last assizes for felony, and to whom the claim to challenge peremptorily had been denied, as the offences with which they had been charged were not capital. The result of this proceeding will be a very material increase to the calendars at the next spring assizes. The writs are to be sued out without expense to the prisoners.

PROCEEDINGS OF LAW SOCIETIES.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.

The defects of the present mode of preparing and carrying through Public Bills in Parliament have been long very generally admitted. They have been the subject of constant complaint by the judges, and were referred for inquiry to a select committee of the House of Commons in 1836.(a)

Some progress has been made in both Houses of Parliament as to the revision of private Bills. In the House of Lords a general supervision takes place by the chairman of committees and his counsel; and in the House of Commons the same superintendence is effected by means of the chairman of Ways and Means and the Counsel to the Speaker. But no care whatever on the part of the Legislature is taken as to the preparation of public Bills. In the House of Lords Bills may be presented, and are usually read a first time and ordered to be printed as a matter of course on the motion of any peer. In the House of Commons, although in some cases the principle is discussed on moving for leave to introduce a Bill, no precaution whatever is taken as to the mode and language in which the principle is carried into effect. The member, indeed, who moves for leave to introduce the Bill is, in conjunction with one or two other members, ordered to prepare and bring in the Bill; but this proceeding is a mere formality, as he does not, in fact, usually prepare it. The Bill is then brought in, and not unfrequently in its progress through Parliament it rests entirely on the individual responsibility of its promoter. If it excites no party feeling, or interferes with no vested interest, and even if it does, when its principles and fate is once decided on, its details, and still less its language, are hardly looked to by any one, and are not, in many cases, attentively considered, until the Bill becomes the law of the land. Sometimes a particular clause or part of a Bill, is severely contested, or express attention is called to it; and then this clause or part of a Bill is critically considered; but even when this is the case, all the other parts and clauses frequently pass without any proper attention being paid to them.

Thus it may happen that a Bill affecting the whole country may be drawn by a person who never drew a Bill before; by one ignorant of law as a science, and possessing merely a superficial acquaintance with the usual technicalities of Acts, prepared possibly after a similar fashion. There is no uniformity of expression. There is in many cases no attempt to use the same word or phrase in the same sense throughout. There is no responsibility, except a very vague one attaching to the mover of the Bill, who is rarely its draftsman.

The Bill thus passed into law sometimes remains a dead letter in the statute-book from inability to work it. In other cases, consequences result from the Act which were never intended or anticipated; but at best the parties attempting to carry the measure into execution are frequently beset by the greatest doubt and difficulty. A very considerable proportion of the cases laid before counsel are occasioned by the difficulty of construing these statutes; and the same observation applies to actions and suits in the courts both of common law and equity, the time of which is taken up in expounding and settling the meaning of the Legislature. But all this is of course attended with great and sometimes ruinous expense and delay to the parties.

(a) Much information on this subject may also be found in a document presented to Parliament in 1836, and compiled by Mr. Arthur Symonds, intituled "Papers relative to the Drawing of Acts of Parliament." The judicial expressions of disapprobation of the present system of legislation are very numerous. It is only necessary here to refer, in addition to those referred to by Mr. Symonds, to the strong opinion of Lord Hardwicke in the House of Lords, on the discussion of the Militia Bill in 1756; to the opinion of Lord Eldon (see his life by Mr. Horace Twiss, vol. ii. p. [illegible]); to the opinion of Sir Edward Sugden, now Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in his letter to Mr. Humphreys in 1826; and to the [illegible] opinion of Lord Langdale, Master of the Rolls, on [illegible] June, 1836, in the House of Lords.—Original Draft.

It may however be said that legislation, in the nature of things, must be attended by disadvantages and hazards. But it is found that where Acts have been drawn by competent persons, as for instance in the Acts for the Consolidation of the Criminal Law, brought in by Sir Robert Peel, and most of the Acts passed under the direction of the Real Property and Common Law Commissioners, very few doubts comparatively have arisen, although many of these Acts have made great alteration in the law, and have legislated on points of much technical nicety and of constant occurrence. It is to be observed that most of the statutes to which allusion is now made passed very nearly as they were brought in.

It may be asserted, therefore, that legislation is capable of being so conducted as to avert the evils which are now so deeply felt, and of which complaint has become so general.

The inquiry then arises, whether it be not possible to devise some plan by which Acts may be passed, which will not be attended by the evils of the present system?

The plan which appears to this Committee best calculated effectually to guard against and remedy these evils, is to appoint certain persons selected from the legal profession, officers of Parliament, for the examination and revision of all public Bills.

After much consideration, it appears to this Committee that these officers should not be employed to draw the Bills either of the Government or of private members. All that they would recommend, at any rate, in the first instance is, that every Bill should, after its second reading, be revised by the officers to be appointed. On the Bill being so revised, it should be returned to the House of Parliament in which it originated for committee; but the duty of the revising officers should not be supposed to end when the Bill was so returned; but it should be their duty to watch it throughout, and attend to all alterations made in either House of Parliament, until it received the Royal assent; and on any alterations being made, it should be referred back again to the revision of the officers.

It does not seem unreasonable to expect that the following advantages would attend the establishment of this office, some of which are now not even attempted to be gained.

1. A uniformity of style and expression in Acts of Parliament.

2. A knowledge of the existing state of that part of the law intended to be affected by the proposed measure.

3. A greater degree of clearness in the Act when passed, and thus greatly lessening the doubts as to the intention of the Legislature, and the subsequent expense of ascertaining it either by opinions of counsel, or actions or suits for his purpose.

Another great advantage that would be gained is, that competent persons would be induced to turn their attention to the framing of Acts of Parliament, a branch of study hitherto almost entirely neglected, and yet surely demanding exclusive attention as much as any other.

The principal disadvantages appear to be, that the establishment of this office might lessen the responsibility which now attaches to the Government and to the Speaker in matters of public legislation, and that when appointed, the new officers might relax in their zeal, and leave things much as they now are.

On the whole these disadvantages, although they deserve attention, appear to be far outweighed by the advantages which would attend its establishment.

One difficulty which has been sometimes urged to the establishment of the officers proposed is, that it might tend to fetter individual members in the exercise of some of their powers in committee on the Bill; but it is conceived that this difficulty is not very formidable. Where the committee is a select committee, one of the Public Bill officers might attend the committee (which is now not an unusual course for the gentleman to take who has prepared the Bill) to make explanations and provide for objections. A committee of the whole House is not perhaps the best place for settling construction of language; but it would be still open to members to make objections of this nature if they thought fit, although, as there would probably be less occasion for it, so it may be considered that this privilege would not be so often acted on as now.

It is quite possible that the office might, at some portion of the session, have a great press of work, and at others very little to do. When there was an excess of business they might have means afforded them of obtaining some assistance.

When the House was not sitting, or when business was not so pressing, their time might be usefully employed in consolidating and digesting the statute law, or advising on what statutes are obsolete or repealed, in reporting on the state of the law affected by proposed alterations, and in the general care and supervision of the statute law. The officers might also with advantage accompany the bills which they returned to the House with a short statement of the existing law, and the effect of the proposed alteration.

Another question of great difficulty will be, whether the new officers should continue in practice? It is considered that the chief officer, having the task of supervising the whole, should devote himself exclusively to the duties of the office. The other members might with advantage be allowed to remain in practice in the several branches of their profession.

In effecting an object of this nature, so important to every member of the community, it is conceived that the expense to be incurred should not be the difficulty in the way of carrying it out. But it seems capable of proof that the saving that the office would effect in stopping inconsiderate and useless legislation, in shortening bills, in preventing reprints of bills in many cases, and in saving the time of the courts, which is now occupied in construing the present imperfect statutes, would amply pay for its establishment.

For the reasons here given, and subject to the restrictions above alluded to, this committee are of opinion that parliamentary officers to revise public bills might be appointed with great advantage, as well to the Legislature as to the public.

TRANSFER OF PROPERTY ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—The Act of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 76 was passed with so little notice or discussion, that it surprised me in the midst of the preparation of some arrangements as to contingent remainders affecting a considerable estate, and being apprehensive that I could not proceed with the deeds to destroy such estates, I laid the papers before an eminent conveyancer, and the following is an extract from his opinion: "With respect to the question under the late Act, that is a very important question, and has given me a good deal of trouble in the consideration; but I am of opinion that contingent remainders may still be barred until the end of this year, notwithstanding the exception of the provision regarding contingent remainders in the 13th section."

As you do not notice this point in the treatise on the above Act, in your publication of Saturday last, I have deemed it advisable to call your attention to it, being of very great importance in estates now under settlement.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—Forthcoming events cast their shadows before. Lord Eldon must surely have been possessed of the gift of second sight, when he thus denounced, in the House of Lords, some Insolvent Debtors Bill of his day:—

"The Chancellor reprobated the false humanity and real injustice which these measures so often involved. They were made effectual instruments of chicanery and swindling, until creditors were reduced by them to the situation of debtors, and compelled to seek the refuge of such legislation for themselves." —Horace Twiss's Life of Lord Eldon.

I fear the ready resort to—

"The sponge which wipes out all, and costs you nothing."

will destroy the fine old spirit and bearing of the English trader, who formerly looked on bankruptcy as a crime, but will now be too apt to consider it as a periodical operation so usual, that it will not lower him in the scale of society, or destroy his self-respect,

Dec. 9, 1844.

8 VICTORIA, CAP. 96.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I have previously troubled you with some remarks upon this Act, for which you were pleased to find a place in page 446, Vol. III. No. LXXV. Since then I have seen a little more of its operation, and have heard various constructions put upon certain sections, but particularly upon the power to imprison for fraud in sec. 59.

When I wrote to you before, I had been consulted about this power to imprison, and a client of mine afterwards received a summons for debt from the Honour of Pontefract Court here, which is held two or three times a month before the Deputy-Steward or Judge, a gentleman of many years' standing at the Bar. My client told me that, from what he had heard in an indirect manner, the plaintiff intended to prefer some charge of fraud against him—what in particular he knew not—and therefore he desired I would attend the court to watch the case for him. I did so, and when the case was called on, I allowed a verdict to be given by the judge, the same as a judgment by default. After the verdict, the plaintiff's advocate proceeded to prefer certain charges of fraud against my client, and proved them. I then called the learned judge's attention to the words, "who shall try the cause," contending there had been no trial; and the objection was overruled. I next applied for the case to stand adjourned, to give my client an opportunity of rebutting, by evidence of absent persons, the charges brought against him; but this was refused, and the learned judge made an order for payment of debt and costs, and, in default, that defendant should be imprisoned three calendar months.

The same day another person had an action against my client; no defence being offered, the judge gave a verdict for the amount claimed, and again, on the application of the opposing advocate, an order was made for payment, and in default, that defendant should be imprisoned forty days, such imprisonment to commence on the expiration of the former sentence, in case he went to gaol. At the time I thought, and still think, the learned judge exceeded the authority given him by the above section—but this with all due deference. Had nothing further occurred, I should have allowed it to pass unnoticed. On Wednesday last, however, my client, who was in gaol, sent me another summons he had received, and desired me to watch the case for him. I attended at the court, but having other business before the magistrates who were sitting in an adjoining room, and while I was attending to it, the case against my client, in the Honour Court, was called on and disposed of, my clerk being present, but knowing nothing of the case, he declined to interfere. After the verdict, as usual, the same opposing advocate applied for an order for a further term of imprisonment, which was ordered accordingly. Whether the charges for fraud were the same I know not, neither do I know whether they were charges for offences committed about the same time as the other, as I presume the order for imprisonment could not be legally made in either case. If so, a person owing many debts might be detained in prison for years for what was all ONE offence, excepting you allow that offence to be divisible, e. g. in the case of a removal or concealment of half a dozen chairs, at as many different times, and to as many different places, all before the first action commenced. Or unless you limit the authority to make only so many different orders for imprisonment, not to extend over more than the period of six calendar months altogether; or not to make an order only within six calendar months from the date of the first, and the latter not to make the imprisonment more than six calendar months in the whole. Something of this kind I believe has been insinuated to me. But as the Act is a recent one, and the question general—perhaps, if you could find a place for this in your valuable periodical, some gentlemen connected with inferior courts might make known their practice, and others might give their opinions through the same medium.

I am not aware of reading about any similar cases in the superior courts.

I am yours, &c.

B. TERRY.

COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LAW TIMES.

SIR,—I have just read, in the LAW TIMES of Dec. 7, under the head of "Legal Intelligence, 'Ireland,'" a paragraph purporting to be a report of what took place before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the 3rd inst. in the matter of Andrew Christopher Palles, and in relation to the cause of Foster v. Goold, and I beg leave to correct some errors and omissions in it, which I am sure were not intentional.

In the first place, the affidavit of Mr. Palles did not state that the DEEDS were prepared in my chambers, but only the drafts of them; and it is not, I believe, even pretended or alleged, that I had any thing whatever to do with the engrossing of them, or the dating of them.

The deeds were admittedly in strict accordance with the arrangement between the parties; and the offence charged against Mr. Palles was, that the dates of some of them had been altered, and that some of them had been antedated. But it appeared from the affidavit of Mr. Palles that such was done with the knowledge, concurrence, and approbation of all the parties; and, in fact, that the dates inserted were the dates at which the original arrangement was entered into, and when the deeds ought to have been executed.

Your report should have also stated that the proceedings in the Court of Chancery were behind my back, as the Lord Chancellor himself admitted; and that I applied to him by my counsel in open court, to be allowed to make an affidavit in the matter, in order to shew that my conduct had been entirely free from blame; but his lordship thought that he had not any power to hear me. I have been, and am, most anxious to make such an affidavit.

I will thank you to insert this in the next number of the LAW TIMES, and am, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

JAMES J. HARDEY.

SELECTIONS FROM CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. M. S. directs attention to another character in which SHAM LAWYERS are the source of infinite mischief:—

"Having, from the commencement of your useful publication, noticed an evident desire on your part to redress the numerous grievances under which our Profession labours, attention being called to them through your means, and not having hitherto observed any communication on the matter I am about to mention, I forward this, trusting some remedy may be devised. The subject I allude to is the drawing of wills by persons other than attorneys. Scarcely is there a town in the kingdom which has not, in the person of its bailiff or schoolmaster, a sham lawyer, though, thanks to the deserved exposure a few of these gentry have met at your hands, the race, I hope, is on the decrease. Still in the preparation of wills, their ready services may at all times be procured, unfortunately it being unnecessary that a qualified person should prepare these documents. Surely when it is considered how many points may arise in the construction of wills, and the intimate acquaintance with the law requisite to enable a person properly to draw them, it is time this practice was put a stop to. How seldom we hear of a will prepared by an attorney (so far as the legal effect is concerned) being called in question, compared with those prepared by persons not in the Profession. It would have been well had the late Act contained a clause invalidating any will not prepared by an attorney, unless drawn by the testator himself. This would have had the effect of confining the schoolmaster to his legitimate occupation, and by so doing have prevented numerous lawsuits and their ruinous consequences. The attorney already pays a sufficient tax in the shape of stamp-duty for articles, admission, and certificate, without the further wrong of having business properly belonging to him carried off by those who are both unable and unqualified to perform it.

A. P. transmits the following, and a reply will no doubt be interesting to others as well as to the writer. It is strictly a point of practice.

I shall feel particularly obliged by your allowing me the use of a corner of your valuable journal to ask some of my professional brethren the following points of practice:—

A. B. dies intestate as to a certain freehold estate contracted to be purchased by him, and his heir-at-law claiming to have the purchase completed out of the assets, has the solicitor to the executors of A. B. or the solicitor to his heir-at-law, the right to peruse the abstract and to prepare the conveyance?

If both have the right to peruse the abstract, and the solicitor to the executors is dissatisfied with the title, which the heir-at-law, however, is willing to accept, can the executors be compelled to complete the purchase?

"H. A." thus answers a practical query in our last:—

In answer to the query of your correspondent "Z." on the subject of creditors' deeds of assignment, I think there can be but little, if any, doubt that the execution of a deed by an agent acting under a memorandum not under seal is not a valid execution of the deed, and that the clause lately introduced into deeds of assignment for the benefit of creditors cannot have the effect intended. In support of this position, I would refer to the case of Berkeley v. Hardy (5 B. & Cr. 355). That was an action of covenant, and it appeared that the deed was expressed to be made by A, on behalf of B, of the one part, and C of the other part, A being authorized in writing, but not under seal, to execute the same for him, and the agreement, reddendum, and covenants were expressed to be between B and C only, but A executed the deed, and in his own name only. The Court held that B could not maintain covenant on the deed, and would not, upon the production of an insufficient instrument, presume the existence of another, which would be sufficient.

THE anecdote of Justice HERLE in our last has elicited some more.

It may be interesting to your readers to know something further concerning the Sir William Herle, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, mentioned in the gentleman's letter who signs himself "Hal."

It appears he was a very modest judge! for Sir Edward Coke (10 Rep. 38 b.) says, "Sir William Herle, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in 9 Edw. 3, fo. [illegible], saith, 'that they were wise people who made that statute'" (de donis, 13 Edw. 1, c. 1). No one would of course suspect this learned judge to be administering a dose of self-praise, and yet Coke immediately adds, in his dry way, "And that Sir William Herle himself was at the making of the said statute, it appeareth in 41 Edw. 3, gam. 16." Indeed, Sir William Herle appears to have thought that the having had a share in the making of that statute was a sufficient stock to set up for a wise man; for in the 5 Edw. 3, fo. 14, he is reported to have said "that King Edward the First (who, by assent of his Common Council in Parliament, made the said Act de donis) was the wisest King that ever was."

To Readers and Correspondents.

LONG BENNINGTON v. FOSTAN.—One or two errors crept into our report of this case, which were manifest to the reader. It is, however, worth while stating, that though the rule absolute for a writ of prohibition (against which Kelly, Q. C. shewed cause) was refused, a rule was granted that Dolby, the defendant in the Ecclesiastical Court, should declare in prohibition in the first four days before next Term. We are obliged to our correspondent for enabling us to supply this omission.

W. R. (Mold).—Thanks for the communication, but which is not available, as the case is less of public than private interest, and involves no point of law.

A CONSTANT READER.—The report in the Times escaped our notice. A coroner undoubtedly needs both legal and medical knowledge. He cannot efficiently discharge his duty without a familiarity with both professions.

JOB and OTHERS v. THOMPSON (4 Law T. 121).—In this case Mr. Justice Patteson stated that the proceedings on the part of the plaintiffs were perfectly regular, but he thought no injustice would be done to the plaintiffs by granting a new trial on the payment of costs by the defendant.

We have no doubt our reporter was accurate as to the grounds upon which the rule was moved; but it by no means follows that the grounds were true.

A SUBSCRIBER (A. Z.), Norwich.—The best work on the Poor Laws is the 4th volume of Burns' Justice of the Peace, of which a new edition is just published; but of less costly works, Archbold's Poor Law, edition 1845, is that which gives the most recent and the fullest information.

A STUDENT (J. P., 2, New Millman-street).—The costs are, as nearly as may be, as follows: Stamp for Certificate, 25l.; fees to officers of the several courts, about 6l.; certificate, 6l.; making a total of 37l. or thereabouts.

[illegible] R. (Bideford).—The suggestions will receive early and considerate attention.

THE CERTIFICATE DUTY.

WE return to this subject, for we fear the bulk of the Profession is not sufficiently alive to its importance, and does not feel the urgency of the demand for immediate, energetic, and united action.

Why the lawyers were selected by the legislature as special objects for taxation; in what sleepy moment they tamely permitted the burden to be placed upon their shoulders; and by what charm they have been soothed into silent acquiescence for so long a period; are problems it would be more curious than useful now to solve. Certain however it is, that they have been, and continue to be, unmercifully plucked by the tax-gatherer. The embryo attorney is not permitted to learn his Profession without first contributing 120*l.* to the revenue, nor admitted as a member of it without another good round sum, nor to practise it without a yearly tribute.

If the same tax were imposed upon all professions, the injustice would not be so glaring: but we cannot understand why the pocket of the attorney alone should be subjected to the process of exhaustion.

We presume, for in the obscurity we can do no more than hazard a conjecture, that it was supposed by the Government and the Parliament, that the Profession was a profitable one, and that it enjoyed some pecuniary privileges beyond those that were within reach of the rest of the community. Probably the reasoning, if not avowed in words, ran in this fashion through the brains of ministers and senators:—"We permit to the lawyers a fine harvest in the shape of costly justice and complicated laws. We yield nothing to the idle clamour for Law Reform; they can bear some bleeding; they make their clients pay; there can be no harm in taking a portion of the spoil."

So the taxes were imposed, we may suppose not without some grumbling at the first. But in time they came to be considered as perfectly natural, as a necessary part of legal existence, and from sheer habits their real hardship ceased to be felt. And, indeed, at the period of their infliction, their burden was not in fact so heavy as it has since become. At no period of their existence could we admit their justice or propriety. If the law permitted to the lawyer greater gains than he was entitled to in fairness, it was an odd method of adjusting the balance to tax him beyond his proportion; it was a clumsy contrivance to meet one wrong by another, and very similar to the morality of Eastern despots, who permit their bashaws to plunder a province and then strangle the plunderers, and seize their ill-gotten gains. There is no escaping from the dilemma; the lawyers were either over-taxed or over-paid; if the former, the law plundered them; if the latter, it plundered their clients through them.

But if such was the pretence for these partial taxes at the period of their imposition, that pretence will no longer avail. Successive Governments and Parliaments have curtailed the emoluments of lawyers, and even reduced them below the limits of a fair remuneration for their education, their time, their responsibilities, and their anxieties. But there has been no correspondent reduction of taxes. "Cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex," is a favourite phrase in our books; but it has been forgotten to be applied to ourselves. The reason has ceased, indeed, but the tax remains. It will depend upon the attorneys themselves how long it shall continue to victimize them.

We protest against the taxes altogether, as essentially unjust in principle. But if we take another step, and survey their operation in practice, we shall see still more potent reasons for denouncing them.

The Certificate Duty is a fixed sum, or, at least, it is varied only by two tests:—first, according to place, being 12*l.* in London, and 8*l.* in the country; secondly, according to standing, the attorney for the first four years being graciously permitted his certificate at half-price. Thus is it a poll-tax in its most odious shape; a tax not proportioned to the actual means of the payer, but regulated by distinctions, of which one must be wholly irrespective of means, and the other very partially observant of them. The fortunate man fattening on his two thousand a year pays no more than the unfortunate who pines upon a hundred a year. Surely this is not the British justice upon which British law so prides itself.

We suspect that much of the apathy that has prevailed upon this subject has proceeded from a feeling (for scarcely can it be called an opinion) that in some way or another these taxes deter persons from joining the Profession, and thus prevent competition.

A moment's reflection will shew the fallacy of this notion. Does it, in fact, so operate? Is not the Profession already crowded to suffocation? If gains are to be got in it, would the tax of 8*l*. or 12*l*. per year discourage a single adventurer? Has not every man such a reliance on his own good fortune, that when there is a prize to be won he will still recklessly start for it, though he sees thousands falling round him? In sooth, it is not the tax-gatherer who can keep a Profession select in number or capacity. The former will be regulated, like every thing else in a free country, by the law of demand and supply, with a continual tendency to a surplus of supply: and the standard of qualification will be determined by the bearing of the mass of the Profession, and the position it maintains in public esteem and respect. Taxes, such as those we are denouncing, operate only as a severe burden upon those who can least afford it, without working for the advantage of the Profession, or of any of its members.

The revision of the taxation of the Country, which the renewal of the Income Tax will require of the Government, affords an oppotunity for procuring a redress of the grievance which may not occur again for many years.

We hinted in our last the manner in which the attorneys throughout the kingdom should proceed to work the question. We hope those hints will not be lost upon them. The plan is practical, easy of accomplishment, and sure to be successful.

VERULAM SOCIETY.

The first part of the Practice Cases is published. The second is in the press.

The Magistrates' Cases of the last Term are likewise in the press.

Another number of Criminal Law Cases, one of Registration Appeals, and one of Real Property and Conveyancing Cases are in a state of forwardness.

Simultaneously with the Reports, similar in shape and size, and in like numbers, stamped, it is proposed to issue a miscellaneous collection of Practical Forms and Precedents, gathered from the widest range of authorities, and embracing every subject to which reference is likely to be required in the office.

It is believed that such a work will be of extreme value to practitioners; and by thus publishing it in numbers, similar to the Reports, it will have the advantage of examination by the Profession, of their suggestions for its improvement, and, as we hope that also which will give it incalculable worth, contributions from the members of the Profession throughout the country of the many forms and precedents by the ablest lawyers this kingdom has produced, which must at present be hidden in the dust of their offices.

All will, of course, be carefully revised previous to publication, to see that they are adapted to the existing law, and, wherever necessary or useful, explanatory notes will be added.

May we at once prefer a request to our readers, especially to the members of the Society, to forward any forms or precedents of proved excellence which they may possess, for the work will be begun with the least possible delay, and each number will appear as speedily as materials for each are gathered.

LAWS OF FRANCE.
No. III.

TRIBUNAL DE COMMERCE OF PARIS.

A Frenchman can summon a foreign trader before the French tribunals.

An indorsement given in England, although not fulfilling all the conditions required by the French law, transfers the property to the bearer.

The certificate obtained in England by an English trader, does not free him from his French creditor, who has not been a party to it.

Mr. Balfe, the composer, had been at the head of a theatrical undertaking in England, and failed on the 7th July, 1841.

His creditors authorized and signed at the Bankruptcy Court his act of liberation, conformably to the English Laws, the 25th September, 1841.

By this certificate of conformity, which answers to the concordat in France, Mr. Balfe was released from all debts due by him when he became bankrupt, and from all claims and demands proveable under a commission of a fiat of bankruptcy.

Mr. Balfe owed Mr. D——, an English merchant, a sum of 280*l*. which was on his books, and amongst other bills he had given him a note of hand for 102*l*. 3*s*. payable the 5th July, 1841, and endorsed as follows, by Mr. D——: "M. Chateau, London, 22 May, 1840."

M. Chateau, thus in possession of this draft, demands the payment from Mr. Balfe, who had established himself in France, and summons him before the Tribunal de Commerce of Paris.

On the 12th January, 1844, a judgment of condemnation by default was given against him, in consequence of which M. Chateau seized his rights of authorship at the theatre of the Opera Comique.

Mr. Balfe made opposition to the seizure, and maintained that M. Chateau has only put his name to Mr. D. his brother-in-law; that the real creditor, being an Englishman like himself, the Tribunal de Commerce of Paris is incompetent, and that in fact the indorsement was irregular, since it does not express the value received (a), and is only equal to a power of attorney.

Moreover, as the real creditor was one of those who had signed the certificate before the Bankruptcy Court of London, he cannot, through the medium of a complaisant third, take proceedings which would not be authorized in England. It was further contended, on the part of Balfe, that it is true that in England the law prescribes no formality for the indorsement of drafts, a signature alone being sufficient; but then such an indorsement is far from being as powerful as a regular indorsement in France, and one can always demand of the bearer an account of his possession of the bill, the payment of which he claims.

Mr. Balfe demands, then, of M. Chateau the proof of the value received, and an affidavit of his presence in London on the day of the indorsement, the indorsement being dated London.

Judgment was given by the Tribunal, as follows:—

"The Tribunal admits the opposition of Balfe against the judgment by default given against him the 12th January, 1844, and judging the merits of his opposition:

"Touching the competency:

"Inasmuch as the plaintiff is a Frenchman, and can, in virtue of art. 14 of the Code Civil, summon Balfe, a foreigner, before the tribunals of France:

"Inasmuch as, since Balfe was in trade at the time he accepted the bill of which Chateau is the bearer, the Tribunal de Commerce is competent:

"For these reasons the Court retains the case, and judging—

"Touching the indorsement:

"Inasmuch as it results from the debates and explanations that D—— indorsed the said bill to Chateau the 22nd May, 1841, in London, in payment of a stipend due to the latter for architectural works:

"That if the indorsement of D—— is irregular, and only equal to a power of attorney in the eyes of the French law, according to the English law, this indorsement is sufficient to confer upon Chateau the property of the draft;

"That accordingly, Chateau became the owner of it the 22nd of May, 1841, in London, by the indorsement of D——; that, by coming into France, he cannot have ceased to be the owner of it; that he ought, therefore, to be considered as a legal holder.

"Touching the concordat of Balfe:

"Inasmuch as Chateau was not present at the concordat obtained by Balfe in London, 25th August, 1841:

"That, consequently, he has not contracted towards Balfe any personal engagement of which this latter may claim the fulfilment:

"Inasmuch as, moreover, that this concordat which restrains all creditors in England, whether they have signed or not, has not been acknowledged by a French court.

"That it cannot, therefore, be opposed to Chateau in France, and cannot exonerate Balfe from honouring his note:

"For these reasons,—

"The Court rejects Balfe's opposition to the judgment given against him 12th January, 1844, which is to be executed according to the form and tenour thereof, and condemns him to all expenses."

PRACTICE—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

By Professor Carey.

Delivered at University College, London.

LECTURE XIV.

When the evidence is gone through, the judge, in the presence of the parties, sums up the whole to the jury, stating to them what is the general law on the subject before them, and explaining the precise points on which the verdict is to be given, and shewing how the evidence that has been adduced bears upon the question, with such remarks as he thinks necessary for their direction. In ordinary cases the verdict is given generally for the plaintiff or the defendant; but if there are more issues than one upon the record, it is necessary to enter a separate finding on each issue. Generally when a verdict is given for the plaintiff or the defendant the effect of it is immediately understood, and it is entered on the several issues by the officer of the court. If it is not so clear, a separate finding is required from the jury with respect to each issue. Thus, in an action of debt for goods sold and delivered, if the defendant pleads first, never indebted; secondly, that he was an infant; thirdly, that the debt did not arise within six years; and, fourthly, that he has paid it; four issues are raised for the jury, and the defendant has four separate grounds of defence. In order to be entitled to a verdict the plaintiff must succeed in all the issues; it must appear that the goods were delivered, that the defendant was of age, that the debt was incurred within six years, and that he (the plaintiff) had not been paid. The defendant defeats the action if he succeeds only on one of these issues. So, in an action of quare clausum fregit, if the defendant pleads,—first, not guilty; secondly, that the close did not belong to the plaintiff; and, thirdly, a right of way; if the verdict is found for the plaintiff on the two first, and for the defendant on the third issue, the defendant there actually succeeds. If the burden of proof lies on the plaintiff, and he fails to produce any evidence sufficient to make good his case, he may be nonsuited. You may remember that, originally, at every stage of the proceedings, the parties were required to appear, and if, at the conclusion of the trial, the plaintiff did not appear, no verdict could be given. And for this reason; when the plaintiff said that the case he had brought forward was not sufficient, so that the verdict, if any, would be given against him, and was in hopes that on some subsequent occasion he might be better provided, he left the court; he was then called three times, and on his not answering, he lost his writ of nisi prius. One might infer from that that he only loses the nisi prius record, but in fact he loses the action, and every step that has been taken from the first writ of summons. But he is not finally debarred of his claim, for he may sue the defendant again for the same cause of action: the right remains, though the action is defeated. The words in the formal entry are, "when the plaintiff, being called, comes not; nor does he further prosecute his suit against the defendant,"—he is nonsuited—non prosequitur. When the trial is ended, the result is noted down at the time, and is afterwards entered on the back of the record. The former part of the record sets forth the earlier stages of the proceedings, inclusive of the jury process, and by this entry the cause is continued one step further, by shewing what took place afterwards at the trial. Formerly the proper mode of trial was at the bar of the court at Westminster; but to avoid the inconvenience that resulted from that proceeding, the judges of assize are commissioned to try the issues, and according to the result of this delegated trial, proceeds the judgment of the Court above. The object of the postea is to record the proceedings at the trial, and to shew the result, so that the Court above may have sufficient notice thereof on which to form their judgment. Hence the postea operates as a certificate that the person who succeeded is entitled to judgment, the trial ending in his favour. Hence, also, the party who succeeds is entitled to the postea. If the plaintiff succeed on two issues, and the defendant on the third, that is substantially a finding for the defendant, provided the third issue goes to the whole cause of action, and the defendant is entitled to the postea.

I have supposed the case to go on, and that the investigation is merely one of fact; but frequently questions of law arise. When a question of law arises at Nisi Prius, several methods have gradually grown into use, by which the determination of it is reserved for the consideration either of the Court in which the action was commenced or some higher tribunal. The methods of most ancient date are,—demurrer to the evidence, bill of exceptions, and special verdict. By a demurrer to the evidence, the party admits all the evidence to be true; the whole testimony is entered of record, and the effect submitted directly to the consideration of the Court. An action commenced in the Queen's Bench goes to be tried at Nisi Prius; one of the parties wishes to have all that is proved set forth "of record;" he then refers to the evidence, and says it is not sufficient in law to make out the case of his adversary; that being so, the whole of the evidence is set down on the record, and then carried into the Court of Queen's Bench, from which the cause originally came, and the Court has to decide whether, if the facts be true, they bear out the issue or not. A demurrer to the evidence has nearly the same effect as a demurrer to the pleadings. You will find a case in which the proceedings are set out (Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Blackstone, 187), and also a case of great importance in other respects (Lickbarrow v. Wason, 2 T. R. 63, and 1 H. Blackstone, 358). The question there is as to the right of stoppage in transitu: one of the parties demurred to the evidence, and the question was so brought before the Court. If either party is dissatisfied with any ruling of the judge in point of law, he may tender a bill of exceptions. If the judge says such and such a witness is not admissible, or that such and such is the law with respect to any point brought before him, or if he misdirects the jury in point of law, either party may tender a bill of exceptions, which is a statement in writing of the objection taken to the decision, to which statement, if truly made, the judge is bound to set his seal. In practice, a note of the bill of exceptions is always taken down at the time, and then a formal bill is drawn out involving the point, and tendered to the judge and by him sealed. This proceeding was provided by the statute Wm. 2, and there is a recent case on this point (Wright v. Doe dem. Tatham, 1 A. & E. 3). By this means the ruling of the judge is thus entered of record, for the bill of exceptions when framed, like a demurrer to the evidence, is part of the record. The cause goes on independently of the bill of exceptions. The judge takes his own course, and the cause proceeds according to the directions of the judge. For instance, the judge has admitted a witness, who, one of the parties thinks, ought not to have been admitted; a bill of exceptions is tendered, the judge signs it, and decides that the witness shall be examined; the jury give their verdict on the testimony of the witness, and on that verdict judgment follows. Nothing is done in the court out of which the cause came, but the bill of exceptions is joined to the record, and the party on whose behalf the bill was tendered may move the cause, by writ of error, into the court above; the bill of exceptions goes with it, and then the Court decides whether [illegible] a good witness or not, and if not, the verdict [illegible] aside. (Bulkeley v. Butler, 2 B. & C. [illegible].) It is the duty of the judge to direct the jury in point of law; if the direction is wrong, either party may tender a bill of exceptions; if this is not done, it is the duty of the jury to follow his direction; if they do not, there may be a new trial. If the jury go directly against the decision of the judge in point of law, a new trial will be granted as a matter of course. But if the jury experience any difficulty in applying the law to the facts—if they are not decided as to the effect of the facts in their own mind, or how far they come within the law, they may find a special verdict, wherein they state the facts as proved, and leave the effect of these facts to the consideration of the Court, and the Court decides. In the three modes of proceeding which I have enumerated, the question of law, or the fact on which that question is to be raised will become part of the record; but the opinion of the Court is, in modern practice, taken in a less formal manner. A demurrer to the evidence puts the facts on the record for the Court above; a bill of exceptions puts an exception to the proceedings on the record for the decision of a Court of Error; a special verdict finds the particular facts of the case, to enable the Court to give its judgment whichever way it thinks proper on those facts. Now, instead of a demurrer to the evidence, or bill of exceptions, it is more usual for the judge to reserve the point for the consideration of the Court, and give the party leave to move to enter a nonsuit, as the case may be. Or it may be that the damages are not proportioned to the circumstances of the case, and the judge will then give leave to either party to move to increase or lower them. Applications of this kind cannot be made except by leave of the judge; so, instead of a special verdict, a general verdict is taken, subject to a special case, that is to say, a verdict is taken merely proformâ: the facts on which the question of law arises are set forth in writing by the parties, not formally "as of record," but merely as a memorandum for the parties. The Court above, after hearing the argument, gives its opinion,—it declares on the facts stated what is the legal result; in the meantime the record has been in the custody of the officer, and is finally delivered to the succeeding party, indorsed with the postea. This was found to be the readiest means of deciding disputed questions of law, and it frequently happened that where the parties agreed on the facts, and disputed the legal result, they consented to admit the facts, and to take a formal verdict subject to a special case. Parties thus availed themselves of a formal trial at Nisi Prius in order to obtain the decision of the Court. However beneficial might be the result of this mode of proceeding, it was attended with all the trouble, expense, and delay occasioned by a formal trial. This objection has been obviated by 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 42, s. 25, for upon the pleadings being completed, and issue joined, the parties may, by consent, apply to any one of the judges, and obtain an order to state the facts in the form of a special case; upon which the opinion of the Court is afterwards taken and the judgment entered. The Court, however, will not allow that opinion to be taken on any case that has not actually occurred. The Court sits to administer justice between litigant parties: and if a sham case is got up on special facts, in order to fish for a decision of the Court, the parties engaged in the proceedings will be guilty of contempt. (Re Elsam, 3 B. & C. 597.) Elsam was an attorney, and, anxious to have the opinion of the Court as to a certain will in which he was interested, he got up an action on that will, or another will containing the same words; he was plaintiff and defendant, and the case was stated for the opinion of the Court: the case stated was to be argued by counsel, but somehow or other it was ascertained to be a sham case, and he was fined 40*l.* or to be committed for the contempt.

These are the several ways of raising the point of law on a record,—demurrer to the evidence, bill of exceptions, and special verdict, in order to get the decision of the Court,—the substitute in modern times being the usual practice of reserving the point for the judge on taking a verdict, subject to a special case. There are other ways, however, when the parties are dissatisfied with what has taken place at the trial, of providing a remedy: one of these is by a venire facias de novo. A venire facias de novo is granted where there has been a mistrial, as where the jury have been irregularly retained, or where the verdict they give is one that cannot be allowed by the Court, or where the verdict is, on the face of the record, bad or insufficient. A venire facias is a new awarding of the jury process to summon a fresh jury to try the case over again. A venire facias de novo is not of very frequent occurrence, but it does sometimes occur, and it is deserving of notice, as being probably the first step towards the introduction of trying a case over again when the result of the first appears to be unsatisfactory. One frequent case in which the venire facias is awarded is, where there is, for instance, a declaration containing two counts, and one of these counts is a good count, and the other is a bad one. There are two counts, one setting forth a good cause of action, and the other not; the jury assess their damages on both together; now it is impossible to say on which of these two counts the damages are assessed, and therefore they must go to another jury to ascertain the damages on the good count. (Leach v. Thomas, 2 M. & W. 427; and Empson v. Griffin, 11 A. & E. 186; 2 M. & G. note b, p. 238; also the case of Leek v. Anon. and Mason, 2 East, 19, note.) The defendant, in this case, demurred to the evidence, and the plaintiff was therefore obliged to set out the evidence on the record; it was carried to the Exchequer Chamber, and afterwards to the House of Lords, who decided that the demurrer to the evidence was informal, and they therefore, on that ground, awarded a venire facias de novo. A venire facias de novo can therefore only be obtained on account of some defect apparent on the record. That you find stated in Gee v. Swan (9 M. & W. 685), where there was a defect on the record, though only a formal one; and the Court would not grant a venire facias de novo, but left it to the party to bring a writ of error. In a subsequent case of the same kind the Court allowed the mistake to be amended.

A new trial is a much more expensive remedy. The first instance to be met with in the books of a new trial for matter not apparent on the record was in the case of Wood v. Gunstone, A.D. 1665, in Style's Reports. There are several cases in which a new trial may be now obtained: first, where the judge has improperly admitted or received evidence; and, secondly, where the judge has misdirected the jury on any point of law. Either of these might be the ground of a bill of exceptions, and on either of them, particularly the latter, the point is frequently reserved; still if it is not reserved it is ground for a new trial. (Holliday v. Atkinson, 5 B. & C. 501.) There was a promissory note in favour of a child nine years old, and the judge told the jury that the note, being expressed to defer value received, implied that a good consideration existed, and that gratitude to the infant's father, or affection for the child would suffice. The question was, whether there was a sufficient consideration, and the jury, by direction of the judge, found that there was. "I think this case must be sent to a new trial," says Abbot, J. When a verdict is against the weight of evidence, it will rarely be interfered with, because evidence is peculiarly matter for the jury; and only when the Court conceive they are completely and grossly in the wrong, will it interfere. (Millan v. Taylor, 8 Bing. N.C. 109.) Where a verdict has been obtained by trick or surprise, a new trial will be granted. (Thurtell v. Beaumont, 1 Bing. 339.) Where a witness on a trial has since been convicted of perjury or the like, that will be a ground for applying to the Court for a new trial. (3 Doug. 24.) Where the damages given are excessive, that is a case in which the Court will interfere with the discretion of the jury. (Price v. Severn, 7 Bing. 316.) In this case the language that is used by Tindal, C. J. is nearly the same as that used by him in Millan v. Taylor. An importunate beggar having been given in custody by the gentleman at whose door he was, the beggar brought an action to recover 100*l.* damages, when Tindal, C. J. said, "I think the case must go before another jury." Another case in which a new trial is granted is where the jury misconduct themselves (Rennaye v. Ryan, 9 Bing. 333), where one of the jury, before the trial, expressed which way he should like to give a verdict. The plaintiff sought to recover damages for an article which appeared in the London Medical and Surgical Journal, which was conducted by the defendant Ryan. It is ground for a new trial if a juror, before being sworn, has expressed a determination to bring a verdict one way. This case was argued, but the facts did not quite come up to it. (Hale v. Close, 1 Strange, 642.) When evidence has been improperly rejected, or, having been objected to, has been improperly received, the party suffering thereby is entitled to a new trial. Where the evidence has been improperly received, the Court will not inquire whether, besides this, there was not some unobjectionable evidence sufficient to support the verdict; nor, when the evidence was improperly received, will they inquire what degree of weight was due to it, unless it is clear that any verdict which might be given on the strength of it would be improper and liable to be set aside. The Court will not interfere with the discretion of the jury unless the verdict is contrary to law, as expressed and acted upon by the Court in Doe dem. Taylor, 6 Bing. 551). Subsequent cases have ruled that the Court will not inquire in cases of this kind whether the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict; it must always be a question for the jury. (Creese v. Barnet, 5 Tyr. 458.) This was in the Exchequer; and there is a similar case in the Queen's Bench, reported in 4 A. & E. 53. Where the objection to the former trial is that the verdict was against evidence, the Court will not interfere in an action at Nisi Prius if the action is for less than 20*l*.

There are certain other proceedings that may be taken to obviate the effect of a verdict. Where a verdict has been given for the plaintiff, but, on examining the record, it appears that it does not disclose any sufficient cause of action, the defendant may move in arrest of judgment. The trial has ascertained that the facts are true, but the defendant urges that they are not sufficient in law. The insufficiency of the facts alleged is, we have seen, the ground of a demurrer, and no motion can be made in arrest of judgment except where there is upon the record such an objection as would have been the ground of demurrer. But it is not every ground of demurrer that will support a motion in arrest of judgment. A judgment might formerly have been arrested for a mere formal objection; this has been altered by the several statutes of Joefails and amendment, and judgment will not be arrested unless the objection is one which might be taken on general demurrer. The statute 4th Anne produces that effect, because in matters of form an objection to the demurrer must be special, and if not, no objection can be taken in any form afterwards. And there are also objections which, though fatal if taken on general demurrer, are aided by verdict. For instance, a rent-charge is pleaded: now, a rent-charge can only be granted by deed, and if it is not so alleged, this is ground of demurrer. But if the grant of the rent-charge is put in issue, and found by the jury, this objection cannot be raised in arrest of judgment. The reason of this is, that without a deed there could be no grant. If a deed had not been proved, they could not have found there was a grant. The deed, therefore, must have been given in evidence. The rule is, that where there is any defect, imperfection, or omission, if the issue joined be such as necessarily required on the trial proof of the facts so omitted, or defectively or over-stated, without such proof it is not to be presumed that the judge would have directed the jury to give, or that the jury would have given, the verdict that such defect, imperfection, or omission has cured (1 Wms.'s Saunders, 227, note 1; Dally v. Hurst, 1 Brod. & B. 222); that is, the Court will presume that though the facts may be insufficient, the facts proved must have been such as to support a statement sufficient in law.

The next mode is judgment non obstante veredicto, which is rather the reverse of the arrest of judgment. Where a plea is pleaded by way of confession, and a verdict is found for the defendant, it may happen that the matter so relied upon by the defendant may be an invalid defence in point of law, though true in point of fact. An action was brought against a schoolmaster by the French usher, for discharging him without notice: the schoolmaster pleaded that when the holidays were over, the usher absented himself for two days, whereby the schoolmaster was delayed in his business. The Court held that this was not such an absenting as to put an end to the contract; though it was proved to be true, it was no answer to the action; the plaintiff therefore had judgment, non obstante veredicto. (Tillient v. Armstrong, 7 A. & E. 557.)

Where a verdict has been given on an issue, if the facts put in question by the issue are immaterial to the merits of the action, the Court will award a repleader. That may take place on either side. Where a false step has been made, the judgment will be arrested, and the party who first made it must plead over again. Suppose an action on a bond conditioned to pay money on or before December 5th; plea, payment on December 5th; replication, traversing payment on December 5th, verdict for the plaintiff; i. e. there was no payment on December 5th. The issue is immaterial, for the payment might have been made on another day. (Tryon v. Carter, 2 Strange, 994.)

A Lecture on the Law of Representations in Marine Insurance, with Notes and Illustrations; and a Preliminary Lecture on the Question whether Marine Insurance was known to the Ancients. By JOHN DUER, LL.D. Counsellor-at-Law. New York. Wiley and Putnam, London.

A COMMON system of jurisprudence is a strong tie between nations, and the possession of such a system is one amongst many causes which leads us to hope for permanent harmony between this country and the United States. They drew their first principles from the fountains of English justice, and we now gladly avail ourselves of the acuteness, knowledge, and profoundness of their jurists, not only for deductions, illustrations, and applications of these principles, but also for the elaboration of others which are so much more frequently discussed and called into practical operation, from the complicated relations between the different States of the Union. How great are the obligations of the lawyer of the present day, who seeks to reduce the chaos of cases to fundamental principles, to the works of Chancellor KENT and Mr. Justice STOREY. These two are, in our opinion, the brightest stars in the intellectual world of America. None have achieved for themselves so high and so enduring a reputation.

The reception which their works have met with in England, and the confidence that for such works at least an unprejudiced audience can be found, has probably led Mr. DUER to adopt the course he has done in the book which we have the pleasure of now introducing to our readers, and we may add, to the English public. The nature and object of it are stated in a fair and manly manner in the following Preface.

The Lecture "Of Representations" now published, is extracted from an extensive work on Marine Insurance, which the author during the past year has been engaged in preparing, and to the completion of which all the hours of labour that the immediate duties of his profession may allow him will hereafter be devoted. Although the views contained in this lecture, it is believed, are fully sustained by the authorities, it must be confessed, that in some respects they differ widely from those of former elementary writers, and hence, before he finally adopts them, the author is desirous to submit them to the critical judgment of the profession in England, as well as in the United States. He is also desirous to have the judgment of the profession on the general plan of his intended work, which is meant to embrace a wider range of research, a fuller discussion of principles, and a more thorough and critical analysis of the adjudged cases, than have been hitherto attempted. Of this plan, and of the mode of its probable execution, he is willing that the Lecture now published, with its Notes and Illustrations, shall be regarded not merely as a sufficient, but as a favourable specimen. For its actual imperfections he has no apology to plead. It is not a hasty production, but the result of much labour and of a frequent and careful revision.

In addition to these reasons, the author wished to draw attention to some recent decisions in the United States, which we shall have occasion to notice in a future article. We shall to-day confine ourselves to the preliminary lecture, in which Mr. DUER discusses the vexata quæstio as to the knowledge of marine insurance amongst the ancients, and comes to the conclusion in the affirmative—a conclusion from which we altogether dissent. GROTIUS, BYNKERSHOECK, CLEIRAC, PARDESSUS, PARK, and MARSHALL are among the supporters of the negative; while our opponents can certainly boast of the opinions of PUFFENDORF, LOCCENIUS, BOUCHON, and possibly of EMERIGON in favour of their views. Mr. DUER has certainly argued most ingeniously and resolutely in favour of his hypothesis, but we are only the more convinced that it is without foundation. He commences, like an able tactician, by shewing the egregious blundering of some of his opponents; but he must recollect that destruction of some of their reasonings is not equivalent to building up a new structure. Mr. PARK (and Mr. Serjt. MARSHALL copied) this error, said that the commerce of the ancients was inconsiderable, and comparatively free from danger; at the same time admitting (what we are not inclined to do) that insurance must necessarily have followed the introduction of foreign commerce.

That the dangers of ancient navigation were thought much more of by those who experienced them or heard of their frequent occurrence than by the modern writers on the subject, is plain from the allusions to them in the poets—and numberless other passages familiar to the classical scholar, must have been replaced in the memories of those learned men of the law by the Roes and Does of the reports ere they could have made such a statement. Moreover, that the commerce of the Roman empire was very widely extended, is a fact now universally admitted. Every country in the world was drained to supply the wants and luxuries of the imperial city. The Mediterranean, itself not very free from perils of the sea, was not the limit of their voyages. The Red Sea, the Persian Gulf, the Indian Ocean, were all traversed by the sailors of the empire.

> Suspendisse potenti

The great usefulness of insurance would lead us to give the fullest weight to any probable evidence of its having then existed, but we cannot assume that an extended commerce is impossible without it, and then, with Mr. DUER, allow a few passages of very doubtful import to be of sufficient authority to support a strong presumption that it was known and practised. Still less can we do so when its kindred form of security, bottomry-bonds, are constantly referred to in the ancient writers, and no passage (we shall presently notice the alleged authorities) can be found in which marine insurance is mentioned.

The first passage quoted as a proof of its existence is the account given in LIVY of the means taken to procure a supply of corn for the army in Spain in the early part of the second Punic war. The merchants were invited to lend their money, to be repaid from the first moneys that came into the public treasury. They were to receive no interest, and so far they gave up something for the public good, but they wished for some return—as LIVY says, two conditions were demanded: "Unum ut militia vacarent, dum in eo publico essent: alterum, ut quæ in naves imposuissent ab hostium tempestatisque vi publico periculo essent." (Livy, lib. xxiii, cap. 49.) Their demands were granted, and this, it is said, shews that insurance was known. Now it has been long ago observed, that there was no premium paid; nor does the answer, that in effect there was, because without this arrangement the corn would have been sold higher, meet the objection. For, if so, where was the peculiar advantage to the merchant? Is it not clear that they took the opportunity to obtain a boon,—a security which they had no other means of gaining? If they could have insured, they would have done so, and not exposed themselves to the imputation of preferring their pockets to their country. The transaction proves, in our opinion, the non-existence of any insurance companies or underwriters. It was far more like our system of "bounties," and similarly it led to frauds to obtain a higher bounty than was due. (See Livy, lib. xxv. cap. 3 & 4.) We again admit that Mr. DUER has annihilated the reasoning of his opponents, for it is impossible to agree with Mr. PARK that the government were bound in justice to suffer the risk of the transit. The subsequent account of the frauds shews that they did not buy at Rome, but that the corn-merchants were to be paid for what they delivered, unless the non-delivery was prevented by shipwreck.

A passage in SUETONIUS, relating what was done by the Emperor CLAUDIUS to obtain a more regular supply of corn, in consequence, as that anecdote-loving writer says, of his having been pelted with crusts during a dearth, is also cited as an authority. This, again, proves that insurance did not exist, for CLAUDIUS was anxious to find out some effective bounty system to induce merchants to freight ships even in the winter; and what he did is thus stated: "Negotiatoribus certa lucra proposuit suscepto in se damno si cui quid per tempestates accidisset et naves mercaturæ causa fabricantibus magna commoda constituit pro conditione cujusque civi, vacationem legis Papiæ Poppææ, Latino jus Quiritium, fœminis jus quatuor liberorum, quæ constituta hodieque servata." Would this have been noticed as so extraordinary if a system of insurance had existed? Does it not prove the contrary? The emperor says: "I know you are afraid of sailing in winter, because the risk is so great, and you have no mode of protecting yourselves. I will therefore pay for any loss that you may incur, and will moreover confer great privileges on those who build ships."

The passage in CICERO's Letters (Epist. ad Famil.

2, 17) we shall not quote, as even Mr. Duer admits it has no bearing upon the question; nor could any one, we think, not determined to find support for a preconceived hypothesis, see any evidence in the passage—"Si navis ex Asia venerit—dare spondes—si navis non venit" (quoted by Emerigon)—of any thing approaching to insurance. The context clearly shews it was merely a wager, not like a policy, but a simple bet; for another instance is given in the next line—"Si Titius consul factus sit."

Mr. Duer has taken a different view of the above passages; and having considered that the evidence adduced is sufficient, proceeds to grapple with the strange fact that the Roman law is silent on the subject. He does this in an ingenious and interesting manner. He says—

The grand difficulty of the argument yet remains to be encountered—the entire omission of the subject of insurance in the Roman law—a difficulty much strengthened by the fact that the analogous contract of bottomry is fully and carefully treated. I shall not dissemble the extent of the difficulty, nor deny that, on the first consideration of the subject, the inference seemed to me unavoidable and necessary, that insurance was omitted because it was unknown. It did not then occur to me that any other explanation of the fact could be given. Subsequent reflection and research have led me to a different conclusion. The argument founded on the silence of the Roman law, proceeds on the supposition that the Justinian Code (I use the term in its largest sense, as comprehending the whole body of the civil law) was intended to embrace all laws of a permanent character, that from the time of its promulgation, were to be in force throughout the empire, and to constitute the rules of decision in all its tribunals. That such was the general design of the work cannot be doubted, but, that it was meant to supersede all local laws and usages whatever on subjects not embraced in the code, or not in actual conflict with its provisions, it would be unreasonable to suppose, and for such a supposition there is not, that I am aware, the slightest authority. Now, if marine insurance was known in the time of Justinian, its knowledge and use were probably confined to the maritime cities of the empire, and it existed in each, not by virtue of any positive law, but as a local usage. It was a custom of merchants, and it was either by the merchants themselves, or by local tribunals, that all questions arising under it were probably determined. Such was the form in which insurance arose in modern Europe. Merchants were its sole inventors. The custom of merchants supplied the rules by which it was governed, and, for a long period, all its controversies were exclusively decided, either by the arbitration of merchants, or by tribunals specially established for their use. It was not a subject of positive law, nor within the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of justice. It is highly probable that a similar state of things existed under the empire; and if so, the omission of insurance, in a compilation of its general laws, is readily explained. The contract and the law of insurance were unknown to the tribunals and magistrates, by whom the general laws of the empire were administered, and must have been equally unknown to the jurisconsults at Rome, from whose writings the laws of Justinian were principally extracted.

It may be thought that this reasoning, however specious, is effectually refuted by the fact, that the contract of bottomry, and the laws by which it is defined and regulated, were recognized and adopted by Justinian. Bottomry, it may be said, is as truly a mercantile usage, of the existence and provisions of which it might be presumed that the tribunals and lawyers of Rome were ignorant, as marine insurance. The same causes, whatever they were, that led them to the knowledge of the one, must have led them to the knowledge of the other: nor can it be denied that the law of insurance was just as proper to be inserted in a body of general laws, as the regulations of maritime loans. The conclusions are, that had such a law existed it would have been known; if known, it would have been adopted. It is in these objections that the weight of the opposite argument consists. That they have much apparent force cannot be denied. Yet a reply, not satisfactory, may perhaps be given. The reply will be satisfactory should it appear that the facts, that maritime loans were familiar to the knowledge of the Roman jurists, and a favourite object of their regulation and study, may be explained by reasons that are not at all applicable to marine insurance.

It is well known to scholars, that the patricians and senators of Rome, in the latter days of the republic, and its nobles under the empire, from causes that history too clearly explains, were, in an eminent sense, the capitalists of the world, and that the usual and favourite mode in which they employed and sought to augment their riches, was in loans at a high rate of interest—loans, not confined to the capital, but freely extended to the provinces. It is for voyages of more than ordinary importance that loans on bottomry are commonly needed, and it is the advance of a large sum that is usually required. Such loans the merchants desirous to borrow would very often find it difficult to effect in the cities of their residence, and we may affirm without hazard that it was in Rome itself, the great money-market of the empire, that they were usually sought and obtained: hence the tribunals of Rome necessarily acquired jurisdiction of the subject—hence the learning and sagacity of the Roman jurists, themselves belonging to the class by which the loans were made, were soon employed to define and regulate the interesting contract—a contract not liable to the attaint of usury—such were the early decisions—whatever might be the rate of interest it secured. It is not surprising that this contract became a favourite at Rome, nor that the regulations concerning it, framed with the most attentive care, were incorporated in the labours of Justinian. Although it is probable that maritime loans were usually obtained at Rome, it by no means follows that a resort to Rome was necessary, where the only aid required was that of insurance. If insurance was practised at all, it was probably effected, in ancient as in modern times, either by the mutual guaranty of associated merchants, or by a division of the burden among several individuals, each becoming responsible for a moderate proportion of the sum insured, and hence the merchant, as a general rule, would effect it without difficulty in the place of his residence. Thus it may well have happened that marine insurance, retaining its original form of a mercantile usage, continued a stranger to the laws of Rome, while maritime loans were first adopted, and then protected and cherished by the same laws, with more than ordinary affection and care.

But how will Mr. Duer, and those who espouse his view, explain the equally strange silence of all the Roman writers? We read frequently enough of bottomry-bonds, we hear not a little of usury in its various branches, and the satirists lash unsparingly the money-lenders and their various schemes of becoming rich; yet not a word of insurance. We readily admit that the Pandects did not include all the existing maritime laws. The famed Rhodian code was confirmed by the republication of the edict of Antoninus respecting it (Dig. lib. xiv. tit. 2, l. 9), but not repeated at length; and the regulations as to insurance would have probably been found there, if they ever existed. But although this would in some degree explain the silence of the Roman law, and prevent us from using it against other evidence of the existence of insurance, yet it does not avail much as the argument actually stands. For it is just as consistent with the non-existence of insurance as with its existence.

We have commented at some length upon this preliminary lecture, because Mr. Duer has advocated his views ably, and has brought forward every thing that can be said to support them. We place, however, his conclusion before our readers, and let them judge if we have not shewn it to be erroneous.

In supporting the affirmative of this question, it is a presumption only that I have sought to establish. I have meant only to affirm, and have endeavoured to prove, that this presumption is fair, reasonable, and consistent, and that its force is rarely weakened, far less is it annulled, by the hostile arguments that have been arrayed against it.

In conclusion we will mention that the earliest authentic notice of insurance in modern times is an ordinance of the town of Barcelona in 1435, and that it is not alluded to in the famous Consolato del Mare, nor the laws of Aleron, nor in those of Wisbuy. The Spaniards, therefore, have the strongest claim to the honour of having invented it. In connection with this subject it is worth observing that by the 43 Eliz. c. 12, a court was expressly appointed for hearing questions relating to insurances, but that, singularly enough, not a trace of its proceedings can be discovered. The preamble of the statute spoke of the immemorial custom of insuring, and contained the following curious recitals:—

Whereas, heretofore assurers have used to stand so justly on their credits that few or no controversies have arisen thereupon, and if any have grown, the same have from time to time been ended and ordered by certain grave and discreet merchants appointed by the Lord Mayor of London as men, by reason of their experience, fittest to understand and speedily to decide those causes.

It further recites—

That of late years divers persons have withdrawn themselves from that arbitrary course, and have sought to draw the parties assured to seek their moneys of every several assurer by suits commenced in her Majesty's courts, to their great charges and delays.

The probable reason of the failure of this city court is to be found in the enactment that no fees were to be taken.

We shall, in a future article, examine the more strictly legal portion of this work, in which Mr. Duer discusses the interesting and important doctrine of "Representations."

The Law Review and Quarterly Journal of British and Foreign Jurisprudence.

[CONCLUSION.]

The sixth article discourses of the Joint Stock Companies Acts, a paper which departs altogether from the proper plan of this Review, and the next in like manner notes the recent alterations in the alien law. The eighth reviews Lord Denman's speech on the relief of persons from taking oaths, and the ninth is nothing more than a Report from a Committee of the Law Amendment Society on the propriety of establishing a board for revising and settling Public Bills in Parliament. Of the necessity for some such revision there cannot be two opinions.

The tenth article is a short Memoir of the late Lewis Duval, esq. of which we extract a considerable portion.

MEMOIR OF MR. DUVAL.

Mr. Duval was the son of an eminent diamond merchant, settled in this country, but of Genevese origin, with a pedigree of some syndical dignity, and, we believe, connected by marriage with the family of the celebrated Monsieur Dumont. He was sent early to Cambridge, and entered at Trinity-hall; and as the members of that college generally, as it is termed, go out in law, his attention was not particularly turned to the study of mathematics, and it is not understood that he applied to any particular subject during his residence beyond the usual college exercises. Some few elementary books on the civil law were read during his time, and some courses of lectures were attended; but he did not in after-life pretend to have derived much benefit from his elementary studies in civil law. Soon after leaving college he was elected a fellow, and until his marriage, long after, continued many years at Christmas to join the party of lay-fellows who regularly attend during the Christmas holidays. Here he formed a close intimacy with the late respected master, Dr. Le Blanc. On leaving college he became a pupil of Mr. Charles Butler, who entertained the highest opinion of his industry and talents, often saying that he was a draftsman by intuition. It may be presumed that the hesitation in his speech determined the branch of the profession which Mr. Duval was to select, though perhaps it was expected when he entered Trinity-hall (the College where the civilians are usually educated) that he might have overcome this defect, and have been enabled to practise at Doctors' Commons. After remaining with Mr. Butler somewhat more than two years, he began to practise for himself, but was not immediately called to the bar; a course at that time common with conveyancers; and it is understood that during the early years of his professional career he was much employed by Mr. Butler in the preparation of such of his drafts as required elaborate care. Some adverse circumstances in the affairs of his father rendered him very early almost entirely dependent on his profession; and, perhaps, in the particular branch to which he devoted himself, never was there a more steady and complete conquest of all the difficulties which beset the path of the early practitioner. When he commenced practice, Mr. Butler and the late Mr. Shadwell were at their greatest eminence. Mr. Hargrave also was in full practice as a conveyancer, and the late Mr. Sanders and Mr. Preston were, with others, rising into eminence. The merits of Mr. Duval were early discovered by all these persons, but especially by the late Mr. Sanders, a conveyancer of great skill and profound learning, and with whom Mr. Duval continued on intimate terms of friendship till the death of the former. In a memoir which we intend to give to our readers, we propose to shew what was the state of practice amongst conveyancers when Mr. Butler first began his career, and to set forth what were his labours, and to what extent his peculiar practice had the effect of improving the system in the preparation of legal instruments.

The system, for the improvement of which Mr. Butler did so much, was in a great degree adopted by Mr. Duval, and, in many respects, as his experience increased, he was enabled to introduce important amendments of his own. Unlike Mr. Butler, Mr. Hargrave, Mr. Sanders, Mr. Preston, and other eminent conveyancers, Mr. Duval owed his rise entirely to his skill as a chamber practitioner. He never published any professional work; and, indeed, it is believed that the only articles from his pen which are in print are the very celebrated reasons in the appeal case of Scarisbrooke v. Scarisbrooke, and the greater part of the Second Report of the Real Property Commissioners which relates to the establishment of a general registry of deeds. It is known that Mr. Duval, who was one of the Real Property Commissioners, took a leading part in the discussions relating to this measure, and it is understood that his reasoning tended much to bring round the late Mr. Bell and Mr. Sanders to his views. The plan of this registry, and the reasons in support of it, were mainly his. Beyond the accidental contact at an occasional consultation, up to the time of his becoming a member of the Real Property Commission, he had been confined to the perusal of abstracts, and the preparation of drafts, and the answering of cases. On joining the commission, he felt, perhaps for the first time, fully his own superiority on general subjects connected with jurisprudence; till then he had scarcely looked beyond the acquiring the law necessary for his immediate wants; but having entered on the subject of a registry, he applied the whole energies of his profound and clear mind to it, and produced a plan, and reasons in support of it, which obtained the respect and applause of all, as well as the approbation of many of the most eminent lawyers of the day. If it had a defect, it was too perfect; every detail was so elaborated, that persons studying the plan were startled at its apparent complexity and difficulty, and it was only on a laboured and minute examination that its entire merits and completeness were discovered. Indeed it is apprehended that the plan in question is the plan for a registry, and that any scheme founded on other principles will be erroneous, as all existing registries are without question erroneous as well as defective. With the plan as to the registry, his particular interest in the Real Property Commission seems to have ceased, though he entered largely into the discussions of the various recommendations contained in the other Reports. On the retirement of Mr. Butler, Mr. Sanders, and Mr. Preston, Mr. Duval came to be considered as the head of the Profession, and perhaps no one of his predecessors held that situation so completely without a rival and by universal consent as he did. His clearness, caution, and great practical experience, combined with his patience and extreme urbanity, rendered him eminently suited to this important situation—and we say important advisedly, because one who holds such a rank as he did, and who has the entire confidence of both branches of the Profession, becomes in fact a judge in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred which are brought before him; and where one case relating to real property is settled by a court of law, a hundred are decided by the opinion of the leading conveyancer of the day. He would have been a bold man who, except under very particular circumstances, advised his client to undertake a suit in the teeth of a clear opinion of Mr. Duval.

He early took pupils, as is the custom of all conveyancers, and many very eminent practitioners studied under him. Amongst the earliest of his pupils were the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Mr. Tinney, Mr. Bellenden Kerr, Mr. Christie, and Mr. Loftus Wigram, all of whom, we know, were affectionately attached to him, and entertained the highest respect for his professional attainments. He died on the 11th of August, 1844, in his 70th year. His death was almost instantaneous, arising from affection of the heart.

Mr. Duval had not the slightest pretensions to scholarship, but was not wanting in the attainments necessary to constitute a well-educated gentleman. In writing he expressed himself with perfect precision, and with the utmost purity and elegance. He had read most of the popular English classics, and had a considerable tincture of French literature. In his latter years he sedulously avoided all unprofessional reading which did not directly minister to his amusement. Having carefully read all the great English poets and novelists of the last forty years, he testified much gratitude to a friend who directed his attention to Balzac, and the other leading French novelists of the day; and the leisure hours of the last two years of his life were devoted to a considerable extent to their not very improving pages. No man could be less liable to the charge of any grossness or excess in his enjoyments; but Mr. Duval was epicurean in his disposition, and a careful economist of his pleasures. He loved port wine, but always drank claret; he dined well, and prolonged his dinner, and read books of amusement with deliberation, for he would not dispatch an enjoyment which might be protracted.

Mr. Duval was not what is called a learned lawyer; he was not very familiar even with the cases decided in his own time; but no man's eminence rested on a more solid foundation. To a competent supply of legal learning he added vast experience, and the comprehension and clearness with which his mind took in the extensive and complicated matters with which he had to deal could not be exceeded. He possessed a quick and subtle apprehension of legal principles, and a natural logic which was never at fault. To all this he added infinite caution, and a patience which could not be tired out. Candour was, with him, rather a necessary consequence of the frame of his mind than a virtue. His understanding was so just, that conviction inevitably followed the propounding of sufficient reasons; and he would have shrunk from being guilty of the absurdity of withholding his assent after good grounds for yielding it were presented to him. In his intercourse with his friends he was in a high degree kind and confiding; and in his attachments was wholly devoid of changeableness or caprice. His personal demeanour was eminently conciliating; and, whilst he was universally looked up to as the great light of the day in conveyancing lore, he was in an equal degree loved and esteemed by the whole profession for his kindness and urbanity.

The eleventh article is devoted to the topic of "Legal Education." It condemns with justice the present system of no education pursued by the Inns of Court. A very discursive range of study is recommended to students for the Bar, and especially physical and moral science, and polite literature. Attendance at debating societies is strongly urged. We take a scrap of excellent

ADVICE TO YOUNG ADVOCATES.

But the circuits, and first of all sessions, are important in another view. It is here that he will have in all probability his first taste of business. The first brief is a grand event in his life; and it demands his utmost attention. Never let him be above anxiously and minutely making himself master of every part, every line, every word of it. Whatever he would have more fully explained, he has a perfect right by the most rigid rules of a jealous profession to get explained by either speaking to his client, the attorney, in court, or by sending for him to his lodgings. He will thus prove useful to his leader and his client; but he will also prove useful by noting on the blank pages of the brief any observation both on the law and the fact that may occur to him in studying its contents. Don't let him either be so much above his business or his own standing as to despise this study, and to refrain from consulting his seniors on the circuit (not in the cause), on any difficulty that occurs to his mind. Don't let him be afraid of setting down needless references to authorities. These will sometimes be puerile enough, and, were he to shew them all to his practised leader, who goes instinctively through his case, might draw a smile over his countenance at the innocence of youth, of an age which he hardly can now recollect. But a little attention and acuteness at consultation will shew him what are of any use and what are but burning daylight; and his client will be all the better pleased with his diligence when he receives back his brief, and possibly will suppose the references to be of much importance, from their being new to him.

When he is in consultation or in court, never let him on any account keep back any really useful suggestion from his leader; nor withhold a point, that he may make it when heard (as however rarely happens) to support an objection; nor above all withhold a view of the case, when he has to follow in a motion, or in shewing cause at Westminster. The leader and the client have a right to all, and are unjustly dealt with, if any thing is "bottled up" for the junior's own separate use.

The time is now come when, by the accidents of business, he is to lead himself. Then double care is required. Above all, he must be prudent, circumspect, and never sacrifice the cause to any display. But also he must not be fastidious, and afraid of seeming to over-do and over-labour. It is not for him to have the confidence which experienced leaders derive from long use. He must supply this necessary deficiency by double labour and attention; and never let him for one moment imagine that by an absurd, a misplaced, an unreasonable imitation of the practised leaders, he can impose upon his clients, and make them take him for an experienced man, and overlook the fault of carelessness, which in even old leaders is no grace, in young ones, who have not the same excuse, an inexcusable fault.

The twelfth article treats of the "Recent Alterations in Conveyancing Forms," and the thirteenth of the "Writ of Certiorari in Criminal Cases," in which the following amendments are urged:—

If then, an act were passed enabling special jurors to be summoned to attend these courts, and authorizing the presiding judge of every court which is competent to try an indictment, as also the several police magistrates, to make such orders respecting views as the justice of each case demands, it is clear that the necessity for obtaining a writ of certiorari, to remove proceedings from the assizes, or from the Old Bailey, would in all cases be obviated, while, even from the sessions, such writs would be rendered so much the less frequent, in proportion to the number of applications to remove, in which the necessity of obtaining a view is a material ingredient. As to the very few cases in which it would be proper to remove indictments found at the sessions, either on the ground that abstruse points of law were likely to arise at the trial, or that the facts were such as ought to be submitted to the superior intelligence of a special jury, provision might be made for these, by authorizing the justices at sessions to transmit the indictments to the assizes, and in the event of their refusing to do so, by further empowering either party to apply to one of the superior judges for an order to that effect.

The last article reviews the recent changes in the law of Bankruptcy and Insolvency, and is a somewhat lame attempt at a defence of the blundering measure of the last session.

A selection of adjudged points is appended; but these are out of place in such a Review; they should be left to periodicals whose express purpose it is to expound the existing law. They occupy much space that might be more usefully filled, are of no value, add to the bulk, and therefore to the cost of The Law Review, and we hope in the next number to find them omitted, and the entire of the pages dedicated to the one object for which The Law Review will be read—as the best, indeed the only, repertory of jurisprudence, practical and theoretical. If it attempt to combine that with professional law, it will assuredly fail; for the lawyer will object to the jurisprudence, and the jurist to the law. In its own sphere its success is certain.

FORMAN v. NEVILLE.

Mortagor—Purchaser for value—Pleading—Supplemental answer—Retracting admission—Production of papers—Parties—Practice on appeal—Right to begin.

A purchaser for value will not be compelled to produce documents which have been left with him by the vendor for safe custody only, in a suit instituted by persons claiming a mortgage paramount to his purchase.

Where an admission is made it must be taken together with the explanation accompanying it.

On an appeal against the whole order made upon exceptions, the excepting party, though the respondent, begins, it being a re-hearing.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of Vice-Chancellor Wigram, upon exceptions taken by the defendant to the Master's report, that his answer was insufficient; the Vice-Chancellor had allowed the exception.

The plaintiffs, Thomas Seaton Forman and Thomas Stanley Benson, had filed their bill to establish as against the defendant Nevill certain old mortgages upon leasehold lands and collieries in Carmarthenshire to which they claimed title. The mortgages had been executed more than 40 years ago, and had been subsisting charges during a series of complicated transactions, in which the owners of the collieries, Alexander Raby and his son Arthur Turnour Raby had been involved. The defendant Nevill had, in 1826, purchased the collieries from Messrs. Raby, and now asserted that no claim had been made by the plaintiffs in respect of their mortgages since 1818, when they accepted a composition from Messrs. Raby, in common with the rest of their creditors. Alexander Raby was dead, and A. T. Raby was made a defendant, and alleged to be out of the jurisdiction. Nevill, by his first answer set forth the documents in his possession in the usual way, but subsequently to the filing of his answer, he discovered, or recollected, that he had also in his possession eight boxes of papers which had been left in his charge by Arthur Turnour Raby in 1826, and had remained in his care ever since. Accordingly, in April, 1842, Nevill obtained leave to file a supplemental answer, by which he said, "that since putting in his former answer he had discovered that he had in his possession eight boxes containing other documents, papers, and writings, which, or some of which, might relate to or concern the matters in the said bill stated and charged on some of such matters; and that such boxes were deposited with him in the year 1826, by the said A. T. Raby, for safe custody only; and that he, Nevill, had no personal knowledge of the purport or contents of the documents, papers, or writings contained in the said boxes: that he had caused the said boxes to be marked with the letters A, B, and C, and that he was ready and willing to produce and leave the same in the hands of his clerk in court for the usual purposes."

To that answer the plaintiffs excepted, and their exceptions were allowed.

A further supplemental answer was then filed, in which the defendant Nevill said, "That the said eight boxes mentioned or referred to in or by the supplemental answer of this defendant, filed in this cause on the 19th day of July, 1842, and in such answer stated to have been deposited with this defendant by Arthur Turnour Raby, another defendant in the said bill named, for safe custody only, belong as between this defendant and the said Arthur Turnour Raby, solely and exclusively to the said A. T. Raby, and that this defendant has no right, title, or interest to or in the said boxes, or, according to the best of his belief, to or in the contents of the same or any of them, save and except only in his this defendant's character or capacity of a depositary for safe custody; and that he, this defendant, is responsible to the said A. T. Raby for the safe keeping, and also for the due return on demand of the said boxes and the contents of the same respectively; and that this defendant will be bound and compellable to deliver up the said boxes and the contents thereof to the said A. T. Raby; and this defendant further saith, that he is not, and to the best of his belief never was, authorized by the said A. T. Raby to part with the said boxes or the contents thereof, or any of them, or to disclose or communicate the contents of the said boxes, or any of them, to any person or persons whomsoever, nor to take, or permit to be taken, any copies or extracts of or from such contents, or any of them, without the express sanction or consent of the said A. T. Raby first had and obtained; and this defendant further saith, that he, this defendant, has, as stated by him in his said former supplemental answer to the said bill, no personal knowledge whatever of the contents of the said boxes, or any of them, and is unable to state as to his knowledge, remembrance, information, or belief, whether such contents, or any of them, are in any manner material for the purposes of the complainants in this suit, or whether the same do or do not relate to or concern, or in any manner affect, the matters in the said bill mentioned, or any of them, or whether thereby or any of them, if the same were produced, the truth of the several matters in the said bill mentioned, or any of them, would appear; and this defendant, in consequence of the manner in which the said A. T. Raby had been connected with the matters in the said bill mentioned and charged for that reason, only supposed that the same, or some of them, might relate to or concern the matters in the said bill stated and charged, or some of such matters; and this defendant further saith, that when he made the offer in his said former supplemental answer contained, of producing and leaving the said boxes with his clerk in court for the usual purposes, he, this defendant, conceived that this Court would protect him from being called upon or required to do more in regard to producing and leaving the said boxes, or the contents thereof, with the clerk in court, than this Court might think he was in strictness bound or compellable to do, and could safely and properly do, as such depositary for safe custody only as aforesaid; and inasmuch as the said A. T. Raby was and is a party defendant in this said suit, this defendant is advised that this Court could not, and would not, act upon such submission without notice to the said A. T. Raby, whereby as between this defendant and the said last-mentioned defendant, this defendant would be fully protected, as at the time of putting in his said former supplemental answer he believed he would be; and this defendant further saith, that for greater certainty and security he hath caused the said boxes to be sealed up; and this defendant saith, that except in respect of such sealing up the said boxes and the contents thereof respectively, are, according to the best of this defendant's belief, in precisely the same state and condition as the same were at the time of putting in his further supplemental answer."

The plaintiffs then again excepted to the further supplemental answer, and the Master allowed their exceptions. The defendant, Nevill, then excepted to the Master's report, which exceptions were allowed by the Vice-Chancellor.

Heathfield, for the defendant, claimed to begin, although the respondent; the appeal being against the whole of the Vice Chancellor's order.

Koe, for the plaintiffs, contended that the rule did not apply to exceptions, but

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is a rehearing of the exceptions, and it is most convenient that the excepting party should begin.

Heathfield contended that Nevill had no right to open the boxes or disclose the contents, as he had never been authorized to do so.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—He might have had an action brought against him if he had opened the boxes without authority.

Heathfield.—It would have been a gross violation of duty. (Christian v. Taylor, 11 Sim. 401.) The defendant asserted that he was only a depositary in each of his answers.

Koe and Collins contended that Nevill had notice of the plaintiff's claim at the time of his purchase from Raby, and that the allegation of want of authority from Raby to produce the boxes was a mere colour. In his first answer the defendant had made an admission of his possession of the papers, and had offered to produce them for the usual purposes; he would not therefore be permitted to withdraw therefrom, and retract by his subsequent answers. (East India Company v. Keighley, 4 Madd. 16; M'Carthy v. M'Carthy, 1 Molloy, 187.) He only speaks to his own personal knowledge; but he should have carried it further, and denied that his solicitors or agents had no knowledge of the contents of the documents. It would be consistent with the answer that the defendant's solicitor might have a schedule of the documents contained in the boxes. (Glengall v. Frazer, 2 Hare, 99; Tipping v. Clarke, 2 Hare, 383.)

Heathfield, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The only point is, whether the defendant Nevill, having once admitted by the first answer that the deeds contained in these boxes may relate to the matters in question in the cause, he is at liberty to retract such admission. He explains, however, that the boxes were only deposited with him for safe custody by Raby, and that Raby is a co-defendant. It must be recollected that the admission is accompanied by an explanation that he is only a depositary, and that the person who is stated to have the right to the papers is a co-defendant. The defendant Nevill, by his first answer, says that he is willing to place these documents in the hands of his clerk in court for the usual purposes; but he says the documents are not his, they belong to a co-defendant; that he is a mere depositary. So far as he is concerned, he had no objection to leave them with the clerk in court. That is the only part of the answer in which there was supposed to be any inconsistency between the first and the supplemental answers. Upon the principal point I think the defendant ought not to produce these documents, and that he cannot be compelled to do so. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor must be affirmed, with costs.

A motion by the plaintiff's counsel, for time to amend, which was granted; but the costs were held to follow the fate of the appeal, the motion being the consequence of the appeal, and that in the result was wrong.

November 18 and 23.

DUKE OF LEEDS v. LORD AMHERST.

Will—Construction—Bequest of portraits—evidence. Under the words of a will, which bequeathed all the testator's portraits of several of his ancestors whom he enumerates, a large equestrian picture, in which one of those ancestors constituted the principal figure, and which had been deemed to be a portrait, was held to pass.

In construing the meaning of a will, the evidence of those most conversant with the subject of the bequest will be resorted to.

How far etymology will be used in construing the meaning of a bequest.

This was an appeal from the Vice-Chancellor of England. The bill was filed for the administration of the estate of the late Duke of Leeds, and the question at issue between the parties was raised on exceptions to the Master's report. The Duke of Leeds, by his will, left all the real property of which he had the power to dispose to Sackville Lane Fox, esq. the husband of his daughter, and he also left him all his personal property in Hornby Castle, the family residence of the Duke and his ancestors, to the exclusion of his son, the Marquis of Carmarthen. The testator, by a codicil to his will, directed that the trustees were to have all the pictures, busts, and ornamental furniture at Hornby Castle, valued, and offered to his said son for purchase, at twenty per cent. less than the amount of the valuation. It happened that amongst the ornamental furniture was a picture of the great Duke of Schomberg, a maternal ancestor of the testator, let into the wainscot over the fire-place in the hall of the castle. This picture the present Duke of Leeds wished to purchase, but Mr. Lane Fox denied his right, on the ground that it was not a portion of the ornamental furniture, but included in a specific bequest to him of certain portraits in the will. The clause on which the claim was founded gave Mr. Fox all testator's portraits of his mother and brother, of the Lord and Lady Holderness, his grandfather and grandmother, and of the Duke of Schomberg. There were in Hornby Castle three pictures representing the Duke of Schomberg; the first, the large equestrian portrait fixed over the fire place in the hall; the second a half-length portrait in one of the bed-rooms; and the third a portrait in crayons, hung in the drawing-room. Mr. Fox claimed all the three as passing to him under the bequest of "portraits" of the Duke of Schomberg; but the present Duke of Leeds asserted that the first of them, the equestrian picture in the hall, did not come under the denomination of a portrait, but was an historical piece, and as such included amongst the ornamental pictures and furniture which he had the option of purchasing. Upon a reference to the Master, he reported that there were three "portraits" of the Duke of Schomberg in Hornby Castle, according to the evidence brought before him. To that report the plaintiff, the present Duke of Leeds, took exceptions; but the Vice-Chancellor, after a full argument, overruled those exceptions, and expressed an opinion in a very elaborate and critical judgment, that the picture in question was beyond doubt a portrait. From that decision the plaintiff appealed.

Bethel and Lloyd, for the appeal, contended that the picture was plainly a historical one, and could never have been intended by the testator to pass under the designation of a portrait. They cited Thompson v. Lawley (5 Ves. 476); and Watkin v. Lee (6 Ves. 633, 1 Mer. 654).

Stuart and G. L. Russell, for the defendants, insisted that there was nothing in the picture to prevent its passing as a portrait, and referred to catalogues of paintings and writers upon art to shew that in the strict technical sense it was a portrait.

Bethel, in reply.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after a statement of the facts and a most elaborate review of the arguments on both sides, held the picture in question to be a portrait, and as such to have passed by the will of the testator to Mr. Fox. His Lordship referred to the portrait of Charles the First, at Hampton Court; to that of Napoleon crossing the Alps; of the Duke d'Angoulême; of the Duke of Wellington, by Lawrence, in the possession of Sir Robert Peel; Lord Ligonier, in the National Gallery; and several others, as illustrating the artistical accuracy of the Vice-Chancellor's view, whose decision was affirmed.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Tuesday, Nov. 19.

PALMER v. PATTERSON and TURTON.

Practice—Double Administration—Interpleader.

A person going by the name of C. P. died in India intestate. Some time after advertisements had been published in England for the next of kin of C. P. without any claimant coming forward, F. P. obtained letters of administration to the effects of C. P as his next of kin, and claimed the fund that had been remitted by D, the registrar of the Supreme Court at Calcutta, to his agents F. and Co. in England, but which had been sent back by them to India. Upon the death of D, Sir T. T. (one of the defendants) having succeeded to the situation of registrar in his stead, transferred the fund again to this country to his agents Messrs. P. & Co. (the plaintiffs), accompanied with a letter directing them to hand over the property in question to the defendant F. P. administratrix to the estate of C. P. she proving his title, and giving a legal discharge. C. P. failing to prove her title to the satisfaction of the plaintiffs, and several other claimants appearing, F. P. commenced an action at law against the plaintiffs for the property of the intestates in their hands. In the meantime it having appeared, through inquiries instituted in India, that the intestate's real name was A. K. a native of Zante, the defendant Sir T. T. put in his claim to the intestate's property as administrator. Whereupon the plaintiffs P. & Co. filed their bill of interpleader against F. P. and Sir T. T. Upon the chief question, whether the letter instructing P. and Co. to pay the money to F. P. under the conditions therein contained, was a promise upon which she could sustain her action at law against the plaintiffs P. & Co. sufficient to destroy their right of interpleader. Held, that the letter so remitted raised the very question, viz. whether the estate administered in India was that to which administration had been granted in England, and therefore that the plaintiff was entitled to an inquiry before the Master as to that fact.

This being an interpleader suit was commenced under the following circumstances. A person who passed under the name of Charles Patterson died in Calcutta in the year 1825 intestate, leaving considerable personal property, which he had accumulated during his residence in India. A Mr. Dickens, the Ecclesiastical Registrar of the Supreme Court of Bengal took out letters of administration to the personal estate and effects of the deceased. This property, which amounted to about 3,000*l.* was transmitted, in 1837, by Mr. Dickens to his agents, Messrs. Fletcher and Co. residing in England. The usual advertisements, addressed to the next of kin of Charles Patterson, were published by Fletcher and Co. but no person appeared to claim the fund in answer to such advertisements, whereupon they remitted the property to India, as unclaimed in England. In the meantime the defendant, Frances Patterson, procured letters of administration to be granted to her out of the Prerogative Court in this country as next of kin to the intestate, and claimed the fund so remitted. Dickens died, and Sir T. Turton who had been appointed to the situation of Registrar of the Supreme Ecclesiastical Court in the room of Mr. Dickens, transferred the fund again to this country to Messrs. Palmer and Co. his agents here, with written instructions requesting them to hand over the property in question to the defendant, F. Patterson, administratrix to the estate of Charles Patterson, on being satisfied of the administration having been granted to her, and her giving a legal discharge to the registrar. The claim of Mrs. Patterson gave rise to a lengthened correspondence between the parties in England and the authorities in India. The principal reason for such intercommunication was the difficulty under which Mrs. Patterson laboured in proving the identity of the intestate, C. Patterson, to the satisfaction of Messrs. Palmer and Co. By this time several counter claimants appeared in respect of the intestate's property, which occasioned a suit in this country, and Mrs. Patterson commenced an action at law against the plaintiff's for the amount of the intestate's effects in their hands. In the meantime, fresh inquiries having been instituted in India at the instance of Sir T. Turton it was discovered that the intestate merely passed on his voyage to India, and during his residence in that country, under the name of C. Patterson, although he was in fact a native of Zante, by name Antonius Kommooto, and had been buried according to the rites of the Greek Church under that name. Sir T. Turton now, therefore, put in his claim to the intestate's property as administrator; whereupon Palmer and Co. filed the present bill, to compel the defendants to interplead. The principal question raised by the parties was, whether the letter written by Sir T. Turton to Palmer and Co. contained sufficient instructions to them to pay the remittance to the defendant Frances Palmer, coupled with the condition contained in the latter part of the letter, that they were to be satisfied that administration had been granted to her, and to take a proper legal discharge was a promise upon which she could sustain her action at law against the firm of Messrs. Palmer and Co. sufficient to destroy their right of interplender.

Bethel and R. Palmer, for the plaintiff, contended that it was a clear case for an interpleader; that Sir T. Turton has placed his agents in England in a situation which rendered them liable to an action at law by a third person, in respect of the fund in question. The answers of Mrs. Patterson and Sir T. Turton shewed that they both admitted a claim; moreover there was no distinct title in either, for that all the letters giving directions to the plaintiff as the agent of Sir T. Turton were merely written upon the assumption that Mrs. Patterson was really the character she pretended to be. (Stevenson v. Anderson, 2 V. & B. 407.)

Lowndes and Stinton, for the defendant, Mrs. Patterson. The title cannot be tried here. The plaintiff has made, or endeavoured to make, a case against us, which he has no right to do for interpleader. At law we have proceeded to trial, and the plaintiffs filed their bill of injunction to restrain the action, which was dismissed with costs. As to the conduct of plaintiffs towards Mrs. P. after the money had been returned to Calcutta, the plaintiffs wrote to Turton to retain the money "on behalf of the legal personal representative of C. Patterson." The money was again remitted by Turton to the plaintiffs requesting them to pay the same to Mrs. P, upon her procuring letters of administration. Turton, as registrar of the Supreme Court of Calcutta, was official administrator in India. Upon his letter to his agents, Palmer and Co. we have an action at law. In Crawshcy v. Thornton (1 M. & C. 7 Sim. 391), there was a similar letter written, and if we recover at law against Messrs. Palmer and Co. that will be a good defence in an action by Turton. The bill, as a bill of interpleader, is demurrable.

Stuart, for Sir T. Turton, urged that as the defendant and the plaintiffs were the same, and had no beneficial interest in the fund, Mrs. Patterson, the first defendant on the record, must establish her right.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—My opinion is this, that the letter of 18 Oct. 1841, written by Sir T. Turton to his agents in England, raises the very question, whether the estate to which he had administered in India, is the same to which Mrs. Patterson has administered in England, and that therefore the plaintiffs have a right that a reference should be made to the Master to institute this inquiry.

WATSON v. ENGLAND.

Practice—Presumption of death—Exceptions.

M. B. left her father's house many years ago, and the last communication or tidings of her was in 1814. Upon a reference to the Master, he certified that M. B. was dead, but that there had not been sufficient evidence laid before him to enable him to find when she died, or whether or not she died unmarried or without issue.

The statement of one of the witnesses, upon whose evidence the Master had found his report, was, among other facts, that about four or five years ago, his brother W. B. (the father of M. B.) had told him that he had intelligence that his daughter M. B. was dead.

Exceptions having been taken to this report—1st, that the Master ought to have found that M. B. was dead, and that she died some time previous to the end of the year 1821; 2nd, that he ought to have found that she died unmarried and without issue. Held, that the evidence in support of the facts was insufficient. The first exception overruled, but the second one allowed.

This was a case which arose upon the presumptive death of a party who had not been heard of for many years; it came before the Court in February last,(a) upon exceptions to the Master's report, who had found that Mary Bilton (the party in question) was dead, and that she died in the year 1821 (seven years after the time she was last heard of) without issue and unmarried.(b) To this report an exception was taken upon the ground that he had improperly raised a presumption of Mary Bilton's death without issue and unmarried.

Bethel and Hubback, on that occasion, appeared in support of the exceptions, and Wakefield and Cankrien for the Master's report.

The result was, that the exception was allowed, and it was referred back to the Master to issue advertisements as he should think fit, and be at liberty to exhibit interrogatories.

The Master, in his report dated July 1st, found that Mary Bilton left her father's house at Cottingham, in the county of York, in the year 1810, or thereabouts, and that she was then unmarried and without issue, and that she had not been heard of by any member of her family since the year 1814; the Master, therefore, found that she was dead, but that there had not been sufficient evidence laid before him to enable him to find when she died, or whether or not she died unmarried and without issue. Two exceptions were, therefore, taken to this report—the first exception was, that the Master ought to have found that Mary Bilton was dead, and that she died some time previous to the end of the year 1821. The second exception was, that he ought to have found that she died unmarried and without issue.

The evidence which the Master had taken in his inquiries, whereon to ground his report, and upon which the excepting defendant, J. Snowball, now relied, consisted of the depositions of Peter Bilton, the brother of William Bilton, Mary Bilton's father, and William Mutch. Peter Bilton deposed that "I have known my said brother from the time of his marriage, which took place in the year 1787, down to the time of his death, which occurred in the year 1842, and I have been in the constant habit of associating with him and his family during that time; I knew one of the daughters of the said William Bilton, who was called Mary Bilton. She left her father's house when she was about sixteen or seventeen years of age. The said William Bilton was then living at Cottingham. I think the said Mary Bilton left her father's house about the year 1813 or 1814. I do not know the reason why the said Mary Bilton left home, but she went to London. She was not married when she left home; she never returned afterwards to her father's house. I never heard the said William Bilton, nor any of the sisters of the said Mary Bilton, say that they had heard or believed that the said Mary Bilton was married, or to that purport or effect, or that she had any lawful issue, or to that purport or effect. But I have heard them say that she was single and unmarried. About four or five years ago, and after the said Mary Bilton left her father's house, my brother, William Bilton, told me, that he had intelligence by a man who came from London that his daughter, the said Mary Bilton, was dead. Some

(a) Vide the circumstances of the case, vol. 2, 455.

(b) The true principle of presumption, however, appears to be this. If a party has not been heard of for seven years, the presumption of his being alive continues during that period, and the burden of proof lies upon those who attempt to set up his alleged death. But after that period another presumption arises, viz. the death of the party at or from the time he was last heard of, and the proof of his being alive must be shewn by those whose interest it is to sustain that fact.

[illegible] my brother informed me that his [illegible] Margaret had had a letter from Mary at [illegible]. I do not believe that the said Mary Bilton ever had any lawful issue, because I do not believe that she was ever married. I believe that she is dead."

The affidavit of William Mutch went to establish the same facts. There was, however, this discrepancy, namely, his deposing that Mary Bilton left home in 1810, and that she was then about fifteen years of age, and that she left home to pursue a dissolute course of life.

Wakefield and Cankrien, in support of the exceptors.—There existed no presumption that Mary Bilton, from her mode of life, was ever married. If a person is not heard of for seven years, his death is presumed. We want, therefore, to presume that she died before the end of the year 1821. The only other question is, whether Mary Bilton left issue; and we submit that the onus lies upon those who would set up that fact to prove it.

Bethel and Hubback, against the exceptions.—We submit that, although the rule of law allows the presumption of death after seven years, yet no authority allows one to carry it beyond that period. There was no such evidence before the Master, enabling him to ascertain the time of Mary Bilton's death. There is a difference between saying to the Master, "You ought to presume that she died after seven years," and telling him that he ought to state at what particular time she died. The evidence of her uncle, Peter Bilton, goes to shew that she left her father's house in or about 1814; now in or about, in respect of a day, means by extension four or five days, and the same latitude in years may be extended to four or five years, i. e. about the year 1818. How are we, according to the testimony, to fix the last time of her being heard of? [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The unfortunate part of this case is, that if I presume her death she might walk into Court and disprove all.] Her uncle says she left her father's house in 1813 or 1814; the next witness states that it was in 1810. In ordinary cases you may draw a conclusion, but when you embark on such a sea of uncertainty, to steer to the point of time when she was actually heard of, it is impossible. (Dixon v. Dixon, 3 Bro. C. C. 510.)

Wakefield.—The Master has found that she was last heard of in 1814.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The Master's finding that she was last heard of in 1814 is founded upon that which discloses fresh intelligence, i. e. the father telling his brother, four or five years ago, that she was dead.

Bethel.—The next question, whether she died unmarried and without issue, is an immaterial exception; the other is the important one, viz. that which relates to her death.

Hubback.—The Court will lean against presumption of failure of issue. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—There is no evidence to induce me to believe that she was ever married.] If any evidence existed it would be received by parties interested in suppressing that evidence; therefore both exceptions ought not to be allowed. [His HONOUR here intimated that he would hear Wakefield upon the first, but not on the second exception.]

Wakefield.—There is always a difficulty in these cases of presumption. The law presumes that if a party has not been heard of for seven years he is dead—because if he had been living, tidings would have been received of him. The presumption in our case, therefore, is, that Mary Bilton was dead in 1814. The moment you arrive at the conclusion of death you may take any time between the years 1814 and 1821 for any thing we care. Our object is to prove that at all events she was dead prior to the end of the year 1821. The Master has found that she left her father's house in 1810, and has not been heard of since 1811; the presumption, therefore, is, that she died seven years before the latter part of 1821.

Cases cited: Doe v. Griffin (15 East, 293); Doe v. Nepier (5 Bar. & Adol. 86); Webster v. Birchmore (13 Ves. 362).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The evidence before the Master created a difficulty in finding that Mary Bilton was dead before the year 1821. I am aware that he finds that she had not been heard of since the year 1814; but the question before him was as to when she was last heard of alive; and it is to this circumstance—viz. as to hearing of her being alive—the Master directs his attention in his finding; because it is manifest that she has been heard of as dead since that period, namely four or five years ago, upon certain information given to her uncle, P. Bilton, by her own father, derived from a third party. Now, take it to be four or five years ago, that would bring it up to 1839, which would make it about eighteen years from 1821, when her death is supposed to have taken place. It is very strange that in such a case the first intelligence of her death, had she died in 1821, should have been communicated by the father as a circumstance of recent occurrence. It is a great pity that a further inquiry was not made; the parties have been proceeding in the dark, without knowing what evidence would be required. It must go back upon the second exception, which is allowed. The first exception must be overruled.

Refer it back to the Master to prosecute the inquiry, with liberty to state special circumstances.

ROLLS COURT.

Monday, Dec. 2.

TREVANION v. TREVANION.

The general rule is, that a solicitor should have a written authority before instituting a suit, and the contrary course is only excusable in cases of imminent danger and risk to the interests of the party; but even then the sanction of the party should be obtained at the earliest moment possible, or the suit dropped.

Mr. Trevanion, a gentleman residing in Bruges, had considerable estates in Cornwall, but greatly incumbered. Some of them were conveyed to the trustees of his marriage settlement; and for the purpose of liquidating his debts, it became necessary to convey to trustees to sell. Accordingly he conveyed several of his estates for that purpose, with the necessary powers, &c. and appointed J. Davis to manage and act for him, and Messrs. Pyne and Richards were the solicitors. In the course of proceedings objections were raised by purchasers on the ground of its not being clear, from the wording of the marriage-settlement, whether it did not include some of the estates proposed to be sold. A bill was accordingly filed by Richards to ascertain the point, but without the particular retainer of Mr. Trevanion in that case, and the latter now moved to have the bill taken off the file. It was alleged that the general authority given to Davis as manager, &c. coupled with the fact of Mr. Trevanion being aware of the mistake in the marriage-settlement, and of his having sent his son over to put in an answer in the suit justified the solicitor in filing the bill in his name. The letters, however, shewed that the suit Mr. Trevanion understood was being instituted was one "by you (Richards) to set right some few words in the marriage settlement," and not this particular suit; and that he even refused to sign an authority sent over to him for that purpose. Something was said also as to his being an outlaw, and of Mr. Richards not being an attorney at the time when the bill was filed, because of the certificate not being duly taken out, but that was not noticed in the judgment.

Kindersley and Bevan, for the motion.

Turner and Willcock, contrà.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I must do as all before me have done; that is, consider not whether the prosecution of the suit is profitable or otherwise, but whether, on the evidence before me, I can ascertain that an authority has been actually given. I will not, however, on this occasion, say as to solicitors, that, though the general rule requires written authority, they may not, in cases of great and pressing emergency, file a bill without a special retainer, but they always do so on their own responsibility; and, as just and honourable men, they ought to get the sanction of their client as soon after as they possibly can, and if not, then they should immediately stop proceedings. Now how does the matter stand here? Mr. Trevanion is abroad in difficulties, and it might be of importance to file a bill. But the bill here was filed on the 21st of March, and on the 4th of April he first was told of it, and that it was necessary to rectify the settlement. His answer is in the form of a disclaimer of all knowledge of what is wanted of him; and to a subsequent application for a direct authority he gives a flat refusal. Is that a sanction? I grant the motion with costs.

Dec. 2 and 3.

DALTON v. HAYTER.

The six days within which, by the 5th General Order of 1828, exceptions to an answer for insufficiency are to be referred to the Master, reckon from the expiration of the eight days, after which, by the same Order, an order of reference may be obtained, and not from the date of the order itself, the whole time from the date of the exceptions being taken till they are supposed to be abandoned being fourteen days.

Exceptions were taken to the answer in this cause on the 8th of November, 1844, and on the 18th of the same month an order to refer them to the Master was obtained, and served on the 23rd. A motion was now made to discharge the order for irregularity, it being too late, according to the 5th General order of April, 1828. It was contended, on the one hand, that the six days mentioned in the Order commenced to run from the date of the Order of reference to the Master; and on the other, that it commenced to run after the eight days after which the order may be obtained. In this case also the 17th happened on a Sunday.

Kindersley and Bevan, for the motion, cited Attorney-General v. Clark (1 My. & Cr. 367); Taylor v. Harrison (8 Sim. 21, 1 My. & Cr. 274); Hunter v. Capron (5 Beav. 96).

Wood, contrà.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—If the cases cited shew that the whole time allowed by the 5th Order is fourteen days, and that the six are in continuation of the eight, there is an end of the matter. The first part of the Order is prohibitive—not to be within the eight days; the other is declarative—shall be within the six days. The question is, What do "the next six days" mean? I shall mention it to-morrow.

Tuesday, Dec. 3.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I think it is to be inferred from what is said, though it is not directly expressed, that in the case cited the judge understood the whole number of days to be fourteen, and consequently the six reckon next after the eight. I must grant the motion.

Saturday, Dec. 7.

HOLLAND v. GWYNNE.

Re BYRCH.

An order of course to tax a solicitor's bill of costs in one cause, and to deliver up all papers, &c. belonging to his client, there being papers, &c. in other matters as well as that particular suit, is irregular.

Mr. Byrch was the solicitor of the plaintiff in this, as well as in another cause of Holland v. Roper, and also transacted other business for him, not in any cause. This particular suit had been going on from 1819 till 1841, when all of a sudden the plaintiff asked Mr. Byrch for his bill of costs in it, for the purpose, as he alleged, of understanding the state of it, as it was of so long standing. Accordingly, Mr. Byrch desired his clerk to make it out, but without the charges to the several items. This the clerk did, but by some mistake he put down the charges also, but did not cast them up. The bill was then so given to the plaintiff, and by him to Mr. Fiddy, who did not immediately take any step, but some time afterwards, as the solicitor of the plaintiff, he applied for and obtained an order for taxation of the bill, and, upon payment thereof, for the delivery up upon oath, by Mr. Byrch, of all papers, &c. belonging to the plaintiff. It was now moved that the order so obtained upon the petition of the plaintiff, Francis Holland, be discharged for irregularity.

Turner and Malins, for the motion, insisted that the bill was not made out with a view to delivery as such, or to taxation and payment, and that payment was of course never demanded. Besides, before the order was obtained, Byrch offered to strike out any objectionable item. And moreover the petitioner asked too much, namely, all papers, &c. belonging, &c.

Lowndes and Tomano, contrà, contended that it was only all the papers of that suit that were asked, and at all events they did not seek more. Moreover, the plaintiff was a trustee for his sister, and permitted her to use his name in the suit of Holland v. Roper.

Turner, in reply. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Mr. Turner, you would not have called it an irregular order, if they had only asked for the papers in that suit?] No.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—It is certainly irregular to ask in this case for all the papers belonging to the plaintiff. It is by no means an order of course. I will not, however, preclude Mr. Lowndes from explaining if he can, and for that purpose will allow it to stand over.

Saturday, Dec. 7, and Tuesday, Dec. 10.

MATTLEBURY v. HAYWARD.

The 18th Order of 26th Oct. 1842—Change of solicitors.

Mr. Thomas, the solicitor in this cause, having taken his son into partnership, Bilton moved that the name should be changed from Thomas to Thomas and Son, to comply with the 18th Order of 26th Oct. 1842. That Order is, "That a party suing or defending by a solicitor shall not be at liberty to change his solicitor in any cause or matter without an order of the Court for that purpose, which may be obtained by motion or petition, as of course; and that until such order is obtained and served, and notice thereof given to the clerk of records and writs, the former solicitor shall be considered the solicitor of the party." Bilton stated that he had obtained a like order from the Vice Chancellor of England in the cause of Mahon v. O'Grady.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I will consider and let you know; accordingly,

Tuesday, Dec. 10.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—If you ask the order, Mr. Bilton, I will grant it, as no harm can come of it. His Lordship, however, gave no reason.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

Thursday, Dec. 12.

GLOVER v. COCKERELL.

Practice—13th amended order of April 1828.

After the expiration of six weeks from the time the defendant's answer shall have been deemed sufficient, an application to amend the bill, though it may be the first application, must be made upon the special affidavit required by the 13th amended order of April 1828.

The plaintiff in this case obtained an order to amend his bill after six weeks had elapsed from the time the defendant's answer had been deemed sufficient. This order was obtained upon an affidavit applicable only to an application made within the six weeks, according to the 13th amended order of April 1828. The defendant, however, had been served with notice of the intended application, and had instructed counsel to appear and oppose it, but through inadvertence the order had been obtained in the absence of defendant's counsel. A motion was now made, on the part of the defendant, to discharge the order, on the ground of its irregularity, and the defendant also moved to have the bill dismissed, or that the plaintiff should give the usual undertaking to speed the cause.

Wigram and Cockerell, for the defendant, contended that the order to amend was irregular, as by the 13th amended order of April 1828, a special affidavit was required after the expiration of six weeks from the time the answer was deemed sufficient, &c. and that in this case the amendments had not been of mere clerical errors.

Russell and Lloyd, for the plaintiff, argued that the order being made on a first application to amend, no special affidavit was necessary.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that a party taking an order to amend upon affidavit of service, must take it at his own peril. He made the order supposing that the party served did not intend to appear. He was of opinion that, even on a first application to amend, if the six weeks had elapsed, there must be a different affidavit from that required on an application within the six weeks. The order, therefore, was irregular upon the face of it, and the plaintiff must pay the costs of that order or of the motion to discharge it. He should, however, allow the amendments to remain on the record as if made on that day. The motion to dismiss must be refused without costs.

Friday, Dec. 13.

TURNER v. SAMPSON.

Practice—Demurrer—Costs.

Where a plaintiff neglects to set down a demurrer for argument within twelve days, according to the 34th Order of August 1841, the defendant may obtain an order for his costs, upon an ex parte application.

The defendant in this suit filed a demurrer to the bill, which the plaintiff did not cause to be set down for argument within the twelve days required by the 34th Order of August 1841.

Rogers, for the defendant, now moved ex parte, that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the cause. He cited Mackenzie v. Cloridge (6 Bea. 123).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he should follow that authority.

QUARRILL v. BINMORE.

Practice—Guardian—Reference.

A husband and wife, parties to a suit, being minors, and the wife having no guardian, the Court directed a reference to the Master to appoint a guardian for her, and that the Master should give a preference to her father-in-law, if there appeared to be no objection to him.

Two of the parties in this suit were a husband and wife, both minors. The husband's father was living, but the guardians of the lady were dead. One of the objects of the suit was to appoint a guardian for the lady, and it was proposed that the husband's father should be the person.

Terrell, for the plaintiffs.

Elwin, for the defendants.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR at first said that he would appoint the father-in-law guardian to the young lady without a reference; but as it appeared afterwards that a reference to the Master would be necessary to appoint a guardian for another infant party, his Honour directed that there should be a reference in both cases, but that as to the young lady, the Master should give a preference to her father-in-law, provided there appeared to be no objection to him.

Tuesday, Dec. 17.

ROBINSON v. BODKIN.

Pleading—Demurrer for want of equity.

The bill in this case was filed by Robinson and Wright on the 8th Nov. 1844, against W. H. Bodkin and Harriett, his wife, and Thomas Blyth, and stated that in March 1811 Bodkin represented to the plaintiffs that he was a proprietor of, and absolutely entitled to, one-ninth part or share of and in two estates, called Boxell and Mary's Hope, situate in the Dutch settlement of Surinam, subject only to the mortgage and legacies affecting the entirety of the estates, and thereinafter mentioned, and that, in reliance upon such statement the plaintiffs agreed with Bodkin for the purchase of the one-ninth share, subject as aforesaid, but free from all other incumbrances, in consideration of 8*l.* per month to be paid to Bodkin during his life. The bill then stated the instrument of conveyance, which is called a deed of session and transport, and bears date the 10th of March, 1841, and appeared to be a conveyance of the share, subject to the mortgage and legacies affecting the entirety, but free from all other incumbrances. The deed contained a delegation of authority to two persons, named M'Donald and Lemon, to appear before any court, or judge registrar, or other proper officer of Surinam, to "make, declare, and perfect the cession and transport, according to the true intent and meaning of the said agreement," so that the same might be valid, according to the laws and customs of the settlement of Surinam. Shortly after the execution of the deed, the plaintiff, Robinson, proceeded to Surinam, for the purpose of perfecting the cession and transport, and before his arrival there Lemon died. The plaintiff, Robinson, called upon M'Donald to perfect the deed of cession and transport, and to deliver up possession of the one-ninth share, which he refused to do, on the ground that Bodkin had before the sale contracted debts which were registered, and, according to the laws of Surinam, chargeable on the produce of the share in the estates. These debts were distinct from the incumbrances mentioned in the deed. After some legal proceedings, and the payment of some of these debts, the plaintiff Robinson obtained possession in April 1842. The monthly payment of 8*l.* was afterwards refused by Wright, and the defendant Bodkin commenced an action against him for it. The bill, after stating the above facts, proceeded, amongst other things, to charge that it was alleged that the monthly payment of 8*l.* had been assigned to Blyth, another defendant, as a trustee for Bodkin's wife; and also that, by reason of the existence of the debts, the cession or transport, or conveyance of the said one-ninth part or share to the plaintiffs, had not then been perfected. The bill prayed an account of the sums paid, and costs incurred by the plaintiffs, and that the amount might be treated as a set-off against the monthly payments of 8*l.*; that Bodkin might be decreed to pay off all the remaining debts charged upon the one-ninth share not mentioned in the deed of cession and transport, and in default, that they might be paid out of the accruing payments of the monthly sums of 8*l.*; that Bodkin might be decreed to perfect the cession, transport, and conveyance of the share, and that the defendants might be restrained from prosecuting the action in any other action against the plaintiffs in respect of the monthly payments.

To this bill the defendant Bodkin and his wife filed a demurrer for want of equity.

Wigram and Steere, for the demurrer, cited White v. O'Brien (1 Sim. & Stu.); Ranson v. Samuel (Cr. & Ph. 161); Darthez v. Clemens (6 Bea. 169); Cator v. Lord Pembroke (1 & 2 Bro. Ch. Ca.); Buchanan v. Rucker (9 East); and Gordon v. Pynn (3 Hare, 223).

Russell and Prior, for the bill, were not heard.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, after reviewing the various allegations in the bill, observed, that without saying that every equity alleged was sustainable, he was of opinion that there was sufficient upon the bill to shew an equity against Bodkin, and that his wife had such an interest as to render her a proper party.

Demurrer overruled; costs reserved.

Wednesday, Dec. 18.

LLOYD v. WARING.

Practice—Official assignee.

The provision in the 6 Geo. 4, c. 19, for the non-abatement of suits by the death or removal of assignees, parties thereto, held to extend to official assignees.

By the 6 Geo. 4, c. 16, s. 67, it was enacted, that suits should not be abated by the death or removal of an assignee who might be a party to the suit, but that, upon suggestion of such death or removal, the name of the surviving or new assignee should be substituted in the place of the former. By the 1 & 2 Wm. 4, c. 56, s. 22, the office of official assignee was created, but the Act contained no provision for the substitution in a suit of a new official assignee, where a former one had died or been removed. By the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 48, the appointment of official assignees was extended to country fiats. In this case Mr. John Follett, the official assignee for the Liverpool district, was a plaintiff, and upon his removal to London Mr. Morgan was appointed in his place.

Dean now moved for the substitution in the pleadings of the name of Mr. Morgan in the place of that of Mr. Follett. He stated that, on the 26th of April last, a similar order had been made by Lord Langdale, in a case of Norraille v. Flight, where an official assignee had died.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR accordingly made the order.

STEELE v. MAUNDER.

Parties—Foreclosure suit.

In a foreclosure suit, where it appeared that, after the mortgage a marriage settlement of the estate was made by the mortgagor, under which his wife and children alone took a benefit, and the mortgagor consequently became insolvent, his assignees were held not to be necessary parties.

This suit, which was a foreclosure suit, had been set down under the 39th order of August 1841, upon an objection for want of parties, taken by the answer of the trustees of a marriage settlement affecting the mortgaged estates. The objection was, that the mortgagor was insolvent, and that his assignees ought to be made parties. The mortgage was made in 1825, the marriage settlement in 1827, and the insolvency was subsequent to the settlement. The wife and children, who alone took a benefit under the settlement, were already parties to the suit.

Fooks, for the plaintiff.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that upon the statements in the pleadings the objection must be disallowed, without prejudice to any question in the cause.

Costs reserved.

VICE-CHANCELLOR WIGRAM'S COURT.

Thursday, Dec. 19.

MACKENZIE v. MACKENZIE.

Practice—Executors—Conversion of assets.

Where a difference of opinion exists between two executors as to the propriety of converting assets at any particular period, the Court will not adjudicate upon the question on petition any further than to refer it to the Master to inquire what course would be most advantageous for the estate.

In the administration of the testator's estate in this suit, a reference had been made to the Master to inquire whether it would be for the benefit of the persons interested under the will of the testator, that an immediate sale should be made of the various securities in which his property was at the time of his death, and still continued to be invested, regard being had to that portion of the will which, while it contemplated at some future time a sale and conversion of all his property into government securities, yet had given the executors a wide discretion both as to the varying of the interim investments as well as to the period when the ultimate conversion was to be made. The Master had reported in favour of an immediate sale. The property inter alia consisted of Real del Monte shares, New Jersey Canal shares, and Alabama Stock. At the date of the Master's report the Real del Monte would have realized only a nominal sum, whereas they had cost upwards of 1,300*l.*; they would now produce considerably more than at the date of the Master's report. The gross income derivable from these sources exceeded 600*l.* per annum, and that which would be derived from the government securities purchaseable with the proceeds of these foreign stocks would be little more than 200*l.* per annum. The executors had concurred in opposing the Master's report so far as it advised an immediate sale at the time when such report came on before the Court, and they obtained an order authorizing them to sell from time to time as they should deem it most expedient. The rise which had taken place in the first-mentioned securities, added to the present features of the money market, was looked upon by one of the executors as a favourable opportunity for a general sale and conversion, which was resisted by the other, and the present petition was presented by the former for a sale.

Heathfield, for the petition.

R. Palmer, contra, cited Buxton v. Buxton (1 M. & C. 96), and contended that it was competent for his client to exercise a discretion in the matter, and that he was not bound to surrender his own judgment because his co-executors entertained a different opinion from himself on the nature and prospective value of the securities; he further stated that the income at present derived was barely sufficient to pay the incumbrances and the sum which had been awarded by the Court for maintenance of an infant party in the suit. Under these circumstances the Vice-Chancellor could only refer it again to the Master, and at the request of Heathfield, in the event of the Master's opinion coinciding with his client's, a sale was to ensue, without requiring the parties to come before the Court again.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Monday, Nov. 25.

YOUDE v. JONES.

By marriage articles, in the year 1773, certain estates, not including P. M. an estate of the intended wife, were agreed to be settled in a certain manner in case the marriage took place. The marriage having taken place, no settlement was made in pursuance of the articles; but in 1802 the estates so agreed to be settled, and also the estate of P. M. were afterwards conveyed to J. to make him tenant to the præcipe, and the uses of the recovery were declared to be such as T. Y. and his wife, and T. W. Y. should appoint, and in default to the use of T. Y. and his wife for their joint lives, and on the death of either of them to such uses as T. W. Y. and the survivor of them should appoint, and in default to the use of such survivor for life, and then as T. W. Y. should appoint, and in default upon the same powers, provisoes, &c. as the said hereditaments and premises were limited to by the articles of settlement of 1773. T. Y. died.

By deed of appointment and release, in 1800, between Mrs. Y. of the first part, T. W. Y. of the second part, and other parties, Mrs. Y. and T. W. Y. appoint to the uses therein mentioned. S. Y. also releases (except P. M. for her life) all her estates to trustees for 1,000 years, upon certain trusts, and subject thereto, to the use of T. W. Y. in fee.

Held, that no estate at law passed in any of the estates, particularly in P. M. under the last limitation in the deed of 1802, having reference to the articles of 1773.

Held, also, that the exception in the deed of 1809 of the life estate, and the term of 1,000 years, was repugnant and void at law.

This case was sent by the Vice-Chancellor of England for the opinion of this Court. The facts appear fully from the judgment.

Kelly, for the plaintiff, citing Smith v. Parkinson (3 Atk. 134); Moseley v. Mattocks (10 M. & W. 231).

JUDGMENT.

Mr. Baron Parke.—This case, which was sent for the opinion of this Court by the Vice-Chancellor of England, was argued a few days ago before my brothers Gurney, Rolfe, and myself, and I have now to state the reasons for the certificate which we are about to transmit to his Honour. By the case it appears that the Rev. Thos. Youde, being entitled in fee simple to certain freehold estates in the county of Denbigh in the year 1773, married Sarah Edwards, who had freehold estates in the county of Montgomery, and also in the county of Denbigh, including Plas Madoc, situate in the latter county. Prior to the marriage, articles were executed between these parties and Messrs. Parry and Middleton on the 18th Oct. 1773, by which it was stipulated that in case the marriage took place Mr. Youde's estates should be settled, subject to terms of 500 years, and Mrs. Edwards's (not including Plas Madoc) to the use of Mr. and Mrs. Youde for their lives and the life of the survivor, and to the use of the first and other sons of the marriage successively in tail, and in default of such issue to the first and other sons of Mrs. Edwards by any future marriage, with divers limitations over, and with powers of exchange, &c. There were children of this marriage, two sons, Thomas Watkin Youde and Edward, and also two daughters. Thomas W. Youde attained his majority before August 1801, and on the 11th and 12th of that month the property of Mr. Youde, the father, was by indenture of lease and release conveyed to Whitley for 2,000 years by way of mortgage, and subject to that term, to such uses as Thomas Youde and his wife, and Thomas Watkins Youde during their joint lives by deed should appoint, and in default to the use of Thomas Youde and wife for their lives and the life of the survivor, and afterwards to such uses as Thomas Youde should appoint, and in default to such uses as the said estates then stood limited and settled. On the 1st and 2nd April 1802, by deed of lease and release between Thomas Youde and his wife, and Thomas Watkin Youde of the first part, Thomas Jones of the second, and Thomas Skye of the third; Thomas Youde and wife, and Thomas Watkin Youde, conveyed to Jones and his heirs all the estates of Thomas Youde and wife, and Thomas Watkin Youde, or any or either of them in Montgomery or Denbigh, and certain tithes theretofore, the inheritance of Mr. Youde, in order to make Jones tenant to the præcipe, and the uses of the recovery were declared to be as follows:—To such uses as Thomas Youde and wife, and Thomas Watkin Youde, by any deed, &c. during their joint lives should appoint, and in default to the use of Thomas Youde and wife during their joint lives, and on the death of either, to such uses as Thomas Watkin Youde, and the survivor of Thomas Youde and wife, should by deed appoint; and in default to the use of the survivor of Thomas Youde and wife; and after their decease as Thomas Watkin Youde should appoint; and, in default of appointment, then to, for, and upon such and the same powers, provisoes, limitations, and agreements as the said hereditaments and premises were and stood limited to immediately before the execution of that indenture, by virtue of the articles of settlement, meaning those of the 18th Oct. 1773, or to, for, and upon such and so many of them as should be then existing undetermined and capable of taking effect. Common recoveries were accordingly suffered in 1802, and Thomas Youde died shortly afterwards. The first question proposed by the Vice Chancellor is as to the effect of the last-mentioned deed, and the recoveries suffered in pursuance of it. It is, "Whether, under the said indentures of lease and release of the first and second days of April, 1802, and the said common recoveries suffered in pursuance thereof, or any of them, the said Sarah Youde was entitled to any and what estate or estates of and in the said capital, messuage, or mansion, with the lands, buildings, gardens, and appurtenances thereto belonging, called Plas Madoc estate, in the parish of Rhuabon, in the county of Denbigh, and other the said messuage, lands, and hereditaments situate within the said parish of Rhuabon, and the said mines of coal, iron, and minerals in or under the said lands or hereditaments in the said parish of Rhuabon, or of or in any and which of them; and whether under the said indentures and recoveries, or any of them, the said Edward Youde took or was entitled to any, and what, estate or estates, of or in the said capital, messuage, or mansion house, with the lands, buildings, gardens, and appurtenances thereto belonging, called Plas Madoc, and other the said messuages, lands, and hereditaments, situated within the said parish of Rhuabon, and the said mines of coal, iron, and minerals, in or under the said lands in the said parish of Rhuabon, or of or in any, and which of them." We proceed first to answer this question. We can have no doubt what the parties to the deed of 1802 intended by that deed to have done; it may be said to be certain that they meant to settle all the wife's property to the uses specified in the articles of 1773. But the question in this and all other cases of construction is, not what the parties intended to have done by the instrument executed by them, but what the meaning of the words of the instrument is? There is no question as to the effect of the instrument of 1802, and the recovery was in limiting the wife's estates to herself and her husband for their lives, and to the survivor for life, subject to the powers of appointment mentioned in the deed of 1802. The doubt that has arisen is as to the meaning of the subsequent provision. It seems to us that after the determination of those estates, and in default of appointment, the deed of 1802 and the recovery do not operate so as to create any other legal limitations. By the words of the deed of 1802, which are clear, the estates are limited to the same uses as they stood limited to before by virtue of the articles of settlement of October 1773, and no others; but those articles contained no legal limitations of these estates; nor, indeed, do they comprise Plas Madoc at all; and consequently all the estates, and particularly Plas Madoc, were unaffected by the provisions of the deed of 1802 at law. The articles were obligatory upon the parties as a contract which equity would enforce against them and their representatives, and those claiming the estate under them with notice, but they did not otherwise affect the estates. We must construe the words of the indentures of 1802, as we find them, and we are not at liberty, in order to effect what we may well suppose the parties meant to do, to alter the language of the deed, and read it as if it had contained, instead of its present terms, a provision "that in default of appointment, the estate should be held on such and the same uses as are mentioned and described in the articles of settlement of October 1773 with respect to the hereditaments therein mentioned." We shall therefore answer the first question of the Vice-Chancellor in conformity with what I have stated. The second question of the Vice Chancellor relates to the effect of a deed of appointment and release dated the 22nd day of Dec. 1809, and made between Sarah Youde of the first part, Thomas Watkin Youde of the second part, and other parties. It is a deed of appointment by Sarah Youde to Thomas Watkin Youde, reciting to the deed of 1802, and reciting it, and reciting that Plas Madoc was subject to a mortgage, and reciting a contract by Thomas Watkin Youde to purchase the life interest of Mrs. Youde in the estates therein mentioned for an annuity of 400*l.* per annum, and the payment of her debts. By this deed Sarah Youde and Thomas Watkin Youde exercised their power of appointment given by the deed of 1802 over all the estates in the county of Denbigh (except Plas Madoc and the mines and minerals, which excepted hereditaments are stated to be thereinafter more particularly described, but are not), and appoint to the uses thereinafter mentioned and declared. And by the same deed Sarah Youde releases all her estates (save and except to her and her assigns during her life Plas Madoc, the mines and minerals) to Evan Jones and his heirs to the use of trustees for a term of one thousand years, which is to secure to her 500*l.* per annum, and 5,000*l.* and for the children of the marriage, and subject to this term to the use and intent that Mrs. Youde might receive an annuity of 400*l.* a year, with powers for the recovery thereof, and subject thereto, to the use of Thos. W. Youde, his heirs and assigns for ever. The second question of the Vice-Chancellor is "whether under and by virtue of the deeds of lease and release and appointment of December 1809 Thomas Watkin Youde took any and what estate in Plas Madoc, and in the mines and minerals?" We are of opinion that as Mrs. Youde was entitled to Plas Madoc and the mines, in fee simple, at the time of the execution of those deeds, and as that estate was excepted from the appointment, and passed under the conveyance from her to Thomas Watkin Youde, in fee, subject to the mortgage affecting that estate, that the term for 1,000 years, and the exception of the life estate to Mrs. Youde, was repugnant and void. The result, therefore, of our opinions will be in accordance with what I have stated.

HARGREAVES v. PARSONS.

Where a contract has been made between A and B for the performance by B of certain matters therein contained, A may transfer his interest in that contract to a third party, and may guarantee the performance of it by B without a contract in writing, and such guarantee is not a promise to be answerable for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another within the Statute of Frauds.

Where a plea alleges that an agreement was made without the knowledge of the defendant between the plaintiff and another person, a traverse that it was made modo et formâ puts in issue the knowledge of defendant as well as the making the agreement.

Watson, Q. C. moved for a new trial, or to enter a nonsuit pursuant to leave reserved at the trial.

The case was tried before Cresswell, J. at the last assizes at Liverpool, and a verdict found for the plaintiff. There were two contracts of a similar nature. The first count stated that before making the agreement therein mentioned between the plaintiff and the defendant an agreement had been made between C. P. and the defendant, whereby in consideration of a certain sum C. P. had agreed either to take from or to deliver to the defendant on or before a certain day, at a certain price at the option of the defendant, fifty shares in the Havre and Rouen Railway. The contract was what is commonly called in the share market put and call. The declaration went on to state, that afterwards, and before the day, and before defendant had exercised his option, a certain other agreement was made between plaintiff and defendant, by which plaintiff bought of defendant his right and property in the said agreement between defendant and C. P.; and the defendant guaranteed the performance of the said agreement by C. P. in consideration of a certain sum then paid by plaintiff to defendant. It was then averred that plaintiff had performed his part of the contract, and had elected to receive the shares of which he gave notice to C. P. and the defendant; yet neither C. P. nor defendant supplied the shares.

The second count stated the original contract, and the transfer of it, and guarantee from defendant to plaintiff in the same manner; but it further alleged that before the day arrived, at the request of defendant, it was agreed between all the parties that the delivery of the shares should be postponed till a further day, and should take place at the house of Lafitte and Co. at Paris, and that the defendant guaranteed the performance of that contract.

There were several issues, but the principal one was raised by the sixth plea, which alleged that the plaintiff and Parker agreed without the knowledge of the defendant to postpone the delivery of the shares.

There was also a traverse of notice to defendant on the first contract.

Before granting a rule, the Court took time to consult the learned judge, and now delivered judgment:—

JUDGMENT.

Parke, B.—In this case a motion was made by Watson for a nonsuit upon a point reserved, or for a new trial on misdirection, upon the case tried before my brother Cresswell at Liverpool. The Court wished to look at the judge's notes, in order to ascertain the facts more perfectly, and understand the objection raised. It was an action by the plaintiff against the defendant for the breach of a contract made by him with the plaintiff on the assignment of two other contracts between the defendant and one Parker to take from and deliver to the defendant at his option certain shares in a foreign railway at a fixed premium on or before the 18th of February, 1844, and the defendant agreed to guarantee the delivery by Parker to the plaintiff. There were counts on each contract, and also on a variation from that agreement by a subsequent one, by which it was stipulated that instead of the shares being delivered in England on the 18th of February they should be delivered in France on the 2nd of March by Parker. Several issues were raised on each count; one was as to the allegation in third and fourth counts of the declaration, that the defendant guaranteed to perform the new agreement by Parker; and another was, that no notice was given to Parker to deliver the share; another plea (the sixth) was, that after the notice to Parker it was agreed between the plaintiff and Parker without the knowledge or consent of the defendant that the delivery should be postponed. The issue thereon in the replication was, that it was not so agreed modo et formâ. It appeared on the trial that notice was given by the plaintiff to the defendant before the 18th of February to deliver the shares on that day, and a like notice of the defendant to Parker's broker; and that by and at the request of the plaintiff at some conversation at which the notice was given, the defendant procured Parker's broker to deliver the shares at Paris on the 2nd of March instead of delivering them in England on the 18th of February. This agreement was by parol. Three objections were made by Mr. Watson at the close of the plaintiff's case, and the points were reserved by the learned judge. The first and the most important was that the note in writing was necessarily under the Statute of Frauds, because the agreement or guarantee by the defendant for the performance by Parker of the new agreement was a promise to answer for the default of Parker. The learned judge intimated his opinion that this was not a case within the statute, but an original promise, and we are of the same opinion. The statute applies only to a promise made to a person who is already, or to another who is to become answerable. It must be a promise to be answerable for debt or default of some duty by that other person. This was decided, and no doubt rightly, by the Court of Queen's Bench in Green v. Cresswell (10 A. & E.) In this case Parker had not contracted with the plaintiff, nor was it contended that he had. There was no privity between them. The non-performance of Parker's contract with the defendant would be no default towards the plaintiff, and consequently the undertaking by the defendant was no promise to answer for default or miscarriage by Parker in any debt or duty towards the plaintiff. It was an original promise that a certain thing should be done by a third person. The next objection was, that there was no proof of notice to deliver on the 18th of February, because in the same conversation the 2nd of March was substituted. We agree with the learned judge that there was proof of notice, though it was afterwards withdrawn. The last point was, that the verdict ought to have been in favour of the defendant on the issue on the sixth plea, because the agreement was only said to be put in issue, and not the want of knowledge or consent of the defendant; whereas we think this objection cannot be supported, because both circumstances were, in our opinion, in issue, and certainly both were not proved. There must, therefore, be no rule. Rule refused.

Tuesday, Dec. 10.

BROWN v. FULLERTON.

The Court will amend the writ of summons, by insertion of the name of a party to be co-plaintiff, to save the Statute of Limitations.

Gray shewed cause against a rule nisi obtained by Hugh Hill in this case, calling on the defendant to shew cause why the plaintiff should not be at liberty to amend the writ of summons and subsequent proceedings in this case, by adding the name of William Turquand to that of the plaintiff's.

The plaintiff was creditor's assignee, and had given directions to his attorney to issue the writ in this case. The writ was accordingly issued, but it was issued without the joinder of the name of the official assignee with that of the plaintiff's. The fault was discovered, but in the meantime the Statute of Limitations had run as to 50*l.* part of the claim. Thence arose the present question.

Gray argued that the Court had no power to evade the Uniformity of Process Act, which they would do by an alteration of the writ, and that no indictment would lie upon any affidavits taken in the action before the alteration, if the writ was altered; and that if they had power they would not exercise it in this instance.

Hugh Hill, contrà, relied upon the cases in which alterations had been made.

C. 633); Roberts v. Bate (6 A. & E. 778); Eubank v. Owen (5 A. & E. 298); Eccles v. Cole (8 M. & W.); Williams v. Williams (10 M. & W. 476); Mayor v. Spalding (1 Dowl. & Lound. 878); Billing v. Flight (6 Taunt. 419); Storr v. Watson (2 Scott 842).

Cur. adv. vult.

At the Sittings, 10th December, in Vacation after Michaelmas Term, Parke, B. delivered the judgment of the Court.

PARKE, B.—This is a case in which there was an application made by Mr. Hill to amend a writ of summons and subsequent proceedings, by adding the name of the official assignee to that of the plaintiff's. It appeared, in that case, that if the amendment was not made, the Statute of Limitations was a bar. Some doubt has been entertained as to whether we ought to accede to this motion; but in compliance with the precedents in this Court, which are acted upon in many cases in other courts, the Court think that the rule ought to be made absolute.

Rule absolute with costs.

FRANKLYN v. NEATE.

A right of property remains in the pawnor of goods—He may sell the goods pending the pawn: and the vendee may maintain trover against the pawnee on the refusal of the pawnee to redeliver the goods after tender of the amount due.

Petersdorff shewed cause against Humfrey's rule obtained in this case.

This was an action of trover for a chronometer. The question arose on the plea of not possessed. The chronometer had been deposited by one David Gilbert with the defendant, who was a pawnbroker, as a collateral security for the repayment of the sum of 15*l.* and interest, with authority to sell at the end of the year in case the property should not be redeemed in the meantime. A memorandum of the transaction, which the defendant delivered to Gilbert at the time of the pawning, disclosed this. The year elapsed, but the chronometer was not sold, and the plaintiff brought the action on the strength of an assignment thereof to him by Gilbert, and the refusal of the pawnbroker to deliver it to him, though he tendered what was due.

The jury found that Gilbert had sold the chronometer to the plaintiff as fully as he could sell it.

Verdict was entered for defendant on the plea of not possessed, with leave reserved for verdict to be entered for plaintiff if the Court should be of opinion that the sale passed the property in the chronometer to the plaintiff.

Petersdorff, for the defendant.—The 14th section of the Pawnbrokers' Act, which imposes a penalty for not delivering up the pawned property; and the 15th section, which enacts, that the holder of the duplicate shall be deemed the owner, evince that at common law the property in the goods does not pass by the assignment of the pledge. The question is, whether the vendee of the pawnor's right to redeem can maintain trover against the pawnee. The contract is a contract to deliver to the pawnor on payment of a given sum: there is no contract to deliver to any one else. The bailor has no property in the thing pledged, save the right to restitution. (See 2 Blackst. Com. 395, 452; Jones on Bailments, p. 80; Hartopp v. Hoare, 3 Atkyns, 36; and 1 Atkyns, 167.) Could the vendee of the pawnor's interest sue for injury done to the property during the pledge? Suppose the property consisted of divers articles, could the pawnor sell them to different persons, and give several rights of action to each? The passage in Jones on Bailments was first impugned by Storey, J. (On Bailments, p. 237), where he says, that subject to the rights of the pawnee the pawnor may sell, and the vendee redeem and bring action; but for this he only cites Kemp v. Westbrook (1 Ves. sen. 278), which was the case of a bill filed against the pawnee by the assignee of a bankrupt, and is no authority, since this assignee stands by statute in the position of the pawnor. In Rich v. Aldred (6 Mod. 216), when detinue was brought for Oliver Cromwell's pictures, it is said, assignee of bailor cannot maintain trover against bailee. I do no not argue that a bailment for safe custody is a case in which my arguments would apply.

POLLOCK, C. B.—Does a man by pawning reduce his right to the mere right of bringing an action on the contract? or does he retain such a property in the goods as he may transfer? Suppose consignor sends goods to a factor, and draws on him for a small amount, consignor, according to you, could not sell these goods?

Petersdorff.—The cases are parallel.

Humfrey, in support of the rule.—By the civil law pledgee had nothing in the goods save the right of detainer. (Storey on Bailments, 206.) Our common law was an innovator, but it only gave a special property. (Ratcliffe v. Davis, Bulst. : ; Cro. Jac. 245.) A mortgage transfers the property in the thing mortgaged; but in a pledge a special property is all that is taken. The general property is in the owner, and on mere tender he has the absolute property back again.

POLLOCK, C. B.—Whatever be the decision in this case, and however the decision in it may extend to some other cases, it cannot affect property in the hands of consignees, or goods in dock warehouses, and the like. A recognized practice of sale, notwithstanding consignment, exists.

PARKE, B.—The question is, whether this is a simple case of lien. Cur. adv. vult.

At the sittings Dec. 10 in vacation after Michaelmas Term, Rolfe, B. delivered the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

ROLFE, B.—This was an action of trover for a chronometer. It appeared at the trial that the chronometer in question had been pawned, and at the time of the pawn the owner delivered to the defendant a written paper authorizing him to sell the chronometer if it should not be redeemed within a year; the owner afterwards sold the chronometer to the plaintiff, subject to the right of the pawnee; the plaintiff then, after the year had expired, tendered to the defendant the amount due on the pawn, but the defendant denied the plaintiff's right to redeem, and refused to deliver up the chronometer, and therefore the plaintiff brought this action. On this state of facts a verdict on the issue on the plea, denying the plaintiff's possession, was taken by my brother Parke, who tried the case, for the defendant, with liberty nevertheless to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him with 19*l.* 10*s.* damages in case the Court should be of opinion that he had proved that issue. The learned judge was inclined to think that this was not a case of simple pawn, but the terms on which the chronometer was pledged were such as to give the defendant something more than the right of a pawnee, and that this operated as a mortgage. If he was a mortgagee, and an absolute property was transferred to him defeasible upon the repayment of the money advanced, the assignee had only the right of redemption which remained in the original owner, and could have maintained no action of trover after tendering the money. But on considering the terms of the instrument which accompanied the deposit, we all agree in thinking, that although it gave more than the ordinary right of a pawnee—that is to say, a right to sell, which, being part of the security for the advance, was recoverable by the pledgor or the assignee,—it did not constitute a mortgage or transfer of the entire legal property in the chattel itself. The case, therefore, stands on the same footing, so far as relates to the rights of a pawnor, as an ordinary pledge. A rule nisi having been granted pursuant to leave reserved, Mr. Petersdorff shewed cause, and contended that the verdict was right, on the ground that a pawnor cannot transfer to another such a right of possession as enables him to bring an action of trover. There is very little to be found in the books on the subject of the right of a pawnor over a chattel pawned; but this is very clear, that, notwithstanding the pawn, the pawnor still retains a qualified property. In the absence of a direct authority on this point, this seems decisive in favour of a right to sell; but the sale transfers to the purchaser his qualified property in the goods pawned, together with all the rights incident thereto. The case was argued for the defendant as if what the pawnor transferred, or sought to transfer, was a mere right of action. This is not so; he transferred the property in the chattel, qualified, indeed, by a right existing in the pawnee; but still the right of property and the right of action afterwards exists in the purchaser, not in consequence of it being transferred to him by the original pawnor, but by reason of the pawnee having wrongfully converted to his own use that which by sale became the property of the purchaser. We do not feel at all pressed by the argument ab inconvenienti, urged by Mr. Petersdorff. "If several chattels," he asks, "afterwards should be pawned for one sum, could several sales be made to different purchasers?" The answer undoubtedly is, they may. A pawnee will not of course be bound to part with any one of the chattels till the whole debt is paid, but will hold them subject to the claim of the pawnor to the same right over each chattel separately which he had before the pawn was made. Again, it is said, suppose the chattel is injured by the fault of the pawnee while in his custody, who is to sue the pawnee—the original pawnor or the purchaser? The answer is obvious. The person with whom the original contract is made; that is, the original depositor is the proper plaintiff, if an action be brought for a breach of contract, express or implied. Unless a new contract be made with the purchaser, the owner for the time being is the proper plaintiff, if the injury be by destruction or conversion of a chattel; just as, in the case of a carrier, the original owner is the person to sue for loss or negligent carriage, or other breach of contract, or for a subsequent conversion after the purchase. That in ordinary cases of a bailment not by way of pawn, the bailor may sell, is a proposition admitting of no doubt, and is even assumed by Lord Holt, in one of the cases relied upon by Mr. Petersdorff, Rich v. Aldred (6 Mod. 216), where he says, "If A bail goods to C, and afterwards give his whole right in them to B, A cannot maintain detinue for them against C, because the special property he acquires by the bailment is thereby transferred to B." There does not seem to be any well-grounded or any solid ground of distinction in this respect between a bailment by way of pawn, and any other bailment, but with the older and direct authority we must act, on the general principle that a pawnor, like every other bailor, retains his property in the goods pawned, subject to the qualified property transferred to the pawnee, but as an incident to such property he has the right of sale, and after the sale the purchaser has the same interest in the chattel which the pawnor had, and this rule must therefore be made absolute.

MAHON v. DUMBERLEY.

In this case Hoggins moved on November 12 for a new trial. The case stood over in order that the Court might consult the notes of Cresswell, J. before whom the cause was tried, to see whether there was any evidence to go to the jury.

The COURT now said that there was no such evidence, and they could grant no rule.

Rule refused.

COURT OF REVIEW.

Thursday, Dec. 12.

Ex parte HURST re LETT.

Sale of mortgaged property—Reference to commissioner.

Where the assignees declined, upon the petition of the mortgagee, to assent to a sale of the mortgaged property, but asked that the Court should exercise a discretion as to the propriety of the sale, a reference for that purpose was directed to the commissioner.

This was a petition for the ordinary equitable mortgagee's order for a sale of the subject of the mortgage, &c.

Renshaw, for the petition.

Fooks, for the assignees, declined to assent to the immediate sale of the property, but wished that the court might exercise a discretion as to the propriety of the sale. He stated that it was a mortgage in the legal form of equitable property, with a proviso for redemption, but no power of sale. After the proviso for redemption there was a special provision that, if default were made, the mortgagee should receive the subject of the mortgage, pay himself what was due, and pay the remainder to the mortgagor. A sale immediately would cause much loss to the bankrupt's estate. He cited Sampson v. Pattison (1 Hare, 533), as to the effect of the peculiar form of mortgage.

Renshaw, in reply, objected to the postponement of the sale, and urged that the Court would not, on the application of the assignees, postpone a sale asked for by a mortgagee. (Ex parte Belcher, 2 Dea. & Ch. 587.)

The Chief Judge, however, directed a reference to the commissioner to inquire and report what course it would be proper to take with reference to the property, due regard being had to the rights of the petitioner and the assignees.

Ex parte Hammond re Hammond.

Trader—Market gardener.

Cultivation and sale of vegetables incidental to a farming business not a trading within the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 10.

This was a petition by a bankrupt to annul the fiat on the ground of his not being a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt laws. The alleged trade of the bankrupt was that of a market gardener, the carrying on of which is, by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, s. 10, made a trading, subject to the operation of the statutes relating to bankrupts. From the affidavits filed in this case, it appeared that Samuel Hammond the younger was the lessee of a farm at Upminster, in Essex, of 138 acres of arable and meadow land, at a rent of 316*l.* 8*d.* The lease was subject to the usual covenants for cultivation, &c. Upon twenty acres of the land Hammond had cultivated green peas, and on ten acres, new potatoes. The produce of these acres had been sent to market, and disposed of through various salesmen. It was proved that peas and potatoes were, according to the custom of the county of Essex, used as clearing crops, and it was alleged that these thirty acres had been so cultivated by Hammond. These acres had also been cultivated by means of the plough, instead of the spade, which is ordinarily used in market gardens. Hammond was in his neighbourhood generally known as a farmer, was so assessed to the income tax, and so described on his carts.

Anderdon and Rett, for the petitioner.

Russell and Chandless, for the petitioning creditor.

Glasse, for the assignees.

The Chief Judge.—The exact definition of a market gardener within the terms of the Act it might be difficult to give, and it is not my intention to give it, though it would be easy to say in a variety of instances what a market gardener is not. I am satisfied that Samuel Hammond, the younger, is a farmer, but, perfectly consistent with that, he might also be a market gardener. I am satisfied, from the facts deposed to in the case, that he was not a market gardener within the meaning of the Act, and shall therefore annul the fiat.

Ex-parte Garnett. Re Garnett.

Insolvent Debtors Act—Fiat.

Where some of the petitioning creditors to a fiat had adopted an assignment of the bankrupt's estate under which proceedings had been taken in the Insolvent Debtors Court, the fiat was notwithstanding held to be valid.

In this case, which was a petition by a bankrupt to annul a fiat, among other grounds urged in support of the petition, it appeared that four of the six petitioning creditors had adopted a deed of assignment of the bankrupt's estate and effects, under which proceedings had been taken in the Insolvent Debtors Court. Under the former Bankrupt Act the Lords Commissioners had, in the case of Ex-parte Barrington (1 Deacon, 3) affirmed a fiat similarly circumstanced on this point with that now in dispute. The question was whether the present Bankrupt Act had effected any alteration in this particular, but

The Chief Judge considered the decision in Ex-parte Barrington to be applicable now.

Bacon, for the respondents.

COUNTRY COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

BRISTOL DISTRICT BANKRUPTCY COURT.

Wednesday, Dec. 18.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Stevenson.)

Re Lewis.

Having incurred debts and liabilities by acting as an executor de son tort, without fraudulent intention, is not a sufficient objection to an insolvent's passing.

The insolvent's mother had died, leaving a little property and a great many debts, amongst which was one of 70*l.* for rent of a farm. The landlord of the farm, after her death, threatened to distrain for his rent, and the insolvent, fearing that if the assets of the deceased were sold under a distress they would barely satisfy the rent, borrowed 70*l.* from a friend, and paid the rent. He then remained in possession of the farm until the crops were ripe, when he made them over to the person who had advanced the 70*l.* who took such crops at the sum of 40*l.* in part payment, and insolvent paid 30*l.* the residue, with his own money in cash; he also sold all the remaining assets of the deceased, and divided the whole produce among his mother's creditors.

Bachelor, of Bath, solicitor, now appeared for the landlord, and opposed on the ground of the removal of the crops from the farm, and the acting as executor de son tort.

Homes, in support of the insolvent, urged that this was a mere error of judgment, without fraudulent intention; that insolvent had honestly administered his mother's effects, without appropriating a farthing for his own benefit, and that he had paid part of her debts with his own money.

His Honour.—The insolvent has not acted with any fraudulent intention, nor has he appropriated any of the assets. The bare fact that he has acted as executor de son tort is not a sufficient objection to my naming a day for the final order.

Thursday, Dec. 19.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Serjt. Stephen.)

Re Whistance.

Omission in insolvent's petition fatal.

The insolvent came up for his first hearing, when Homes, for an opposing creditor, pointed out an omission in the insolvent's petition. In that part of the form which runs thus, "That your petitioner is not a trader within the meaning of the statutes now in force relating to bankrupts," the petitioner had struck out the word "not," but had omitted to add, after the word "bankrupts," the words, "but owing debts amounting in the whole to less than 300*l.*" The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 2, enacts, that if the petition shall not be in the form prescribed, it must be dismissed.

His Honour.—This omission is fatal; the petition must be dismissed.

Petition dismissed accordingly.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.

DEVON WINTER ASSIZES, 1844.

Exeter, Tuesday, Dec. 17.

(Before Mr. Baron Alderson.)

Reg. v. Corfeli.

Practice—Right to reply.

Counsel for the prosecution has a right to reply generally, even where witnesses to character only are called for the defence. It is in the discretion of counsel whether he will exercise that right, and it will be sanctioned by the Court where the counsel for the prosecution is of opinion that a fallacious argument has been used for the defence.

Stone, for the defence, called a witness to character.

Bird, for the prosecution, asked the Court to permit him to reply to some fallacious arguments employed by the counsel for the prisoner.

Alderson, B. Certainly. It is entirely in the discretion of counsel. I have been always of opinion that the right to reply is general, and that counsel should exercise their full discretion whether, under the circumstances, they will resort to it or not.

Bird then replied. Verdict—Not guilty.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

LANCASHIRE WINTER CIRCUIT.—LIVERPOOL.

(Before Mr. Baron Gurney.)

Reg. v. Pigot.

In an indictment for uttering false money after a previous conviction under 2 Wm. 4, c. 34, s. 7, the indictment set out the previous indictment in the past tense, but copied verbatim the allegation therein contained, that the offence was committed "within the jurisdiction of the Court." Held, that in the present indictment those words must mean the Court of Assize now held, and that there was a variance.

The prisoner was indicted for feloniously uttering, after a previous conviction for uttering as a misdemeanour.

The indictment set forth the previous conviction as follows:—"The jurors, &c. present that heretofore (to wit at the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace of our lady the Queen, held at Liverpool in and for the borough of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, on Monday, the 18th day of March, in the seventh year of the reign of our sovereign Lady Victoria, by the grace of God, &c. and A.D. 1844, before Gilbert Henderson, esq. Recorder of the said borough, and justice of our said Lady the Queen, assigned to hear and determine divers felonies, trespasses, and other misdemeanors in the said borough committed), Michael Pigot, by the name and description of Michael Pigot, late of the said borough, labourer, was in due form of law tried and convicted by a certain jury of the county duly taken and sworn between our said Lady the Queen and the said Michael Pigot, in that behalf, upon a certain indictment then and there depending against him the said Michael Pigot, for that he, the said Michael Pigot, on the seventh day of February, in the seventh year, &c. at the borough aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this Court, one piece of false and counterfeit coin, resembling and apparently intended to resemble and pass for a piece of the Queen's current silver coin called a sixpence, unlawfully, &c. did utter and put off to one H. C. well knowing the same to be false and counterfeit, in contempt, &c. and against the peace, &c.; and it was then considered and adjudged by the said Court, &c. (reciting the sentence) and that afterwards, &c. the said Michael Pigot, at, &c. did feloniously utter, &c. against the peace, &c."

Upon the production of the record of the conviction at the Liverpool sessions, it appeared that the words "within the jurisdiction of this Court," which were used in that indictment, referred to the Court of Quarter Sessions.

James, for the prisoner, now submitted that there was a variance. In this indictment, which is a proceeding in your lordship's court, the words, "within the jurisdiction of this Court," must be taken to mean your lordship's court, and it would appear from the indictment so read that the indictment at the sessions alleged an offence within the jurisdiction of your lordship's court. But upon the production of that indictment it does no such thing. It merely alleges an offence within its own jurisdiction, and makes no allusion to the court of your lordship. The mistake appears to have been made from simply copying the former indictment, without accommodating its allegations to the past tense in which it is recited.

Cobbett and Whigham, contrà, for the prosecution.

Gurney, B. thought the objection fatal to the indictment. —— Prisoner acquitted.

Reg. v. Cook.

Practice—Right of prisoner to examine witnesses.

The prisoner, at the end of the examination in chief of the first witness for the prosecution, began to examine the witness. Upon his asking the first question, he was interrupted by Gurney, B. who said, "You must put your questions through me, if you wish to put any." Upon the prisoner's attempting again to put a question, the learned Baron interrupted him with some energy, saying,

"Prisoner, if you wish to put any questions, you must put them through me. I have told you so two or three times, and you shall not do it yourself."

Prisoner.—"I wish to ask the witness what clothes I had on."

Gurney, B.—Witness, did you know the prisoner by his clothes or by his face?"

Witness.—"By both, my lord."

Gurney.—"Now, prisoner, I have asked your question. Have you any more?"

Prisoner.—"No, my lord."

The above case is reported, because it is in accordance with the universal practice of the same learned judge throughout the present circuit, a practice which is believed to be somewhat unusual.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

No incident of the week calls for notice.

NEW STATUTES.

Of the Session 8 Victoria.

[In this record of actual Legislation, we adopt the plan of giving the titles alone of the statutes of no general or professional interest; and analyses of the more important changes in the law, printing at length such statutes or parts of statutes only as are of particular interest to our readers.]

28. Notices to joint proprietors of shares.—And be it enacted, That with respect to any share to which several persons may be jointly entitled, all notices directed to be given to the shareholders shall be given to such of the said persons whose name shall stand first in the register of shareholders; and notice so given shall be sufficient notice to all the proprietors of such share.

29. Receipts for money payable to minors, &c.—And be it enacted, That if any money be payable to any shareholder, being a minor, idiot, or lunatic, the receipt of the guardian of such minor, or the receipt of the committee of such idiot or lunatic, shall be a sufficient discharge to the company for the same.

30. Company not bound to regard trusts.—And be it enacted, That the company shall not be bound to see to the execution of any trust, whether express, implied, or constructive, to which any of the said shares may be subject; and the receipt of the party in whose name any such share shall stand in the books of the company shall from time to time be a sufficient discharge to the company for any dividend or other sum of money payable in respect of such share, notwithstanding any trusts to which such share may then be subject, and whether or not the company have had notice of such trusts; and the company shall not be bound to see to the application of the money paid upon such receipt.

31. Power to make calls.—And be it enacted, That from time to time the directors may make such calls of money upon the respective shareholders, in respect of the amount of capital stock respectively subscribed by them, as they shall think fit; and whenever execution upon any judgment against the company shall have been taken out against any shareholder, the directors, within twenty-one days next after notice shall have been served upon the company of the payment of any money by such shareholder, his executors or administrators, in or toward satisfaction of such judgment, shall make such calls upon all the shareholders as will be sufficient to reimburse to such shareholder, his executors or administrators, the money so paid by him or them, and all his or their damages, costs, and expences by reason of such execution, and shall apply the proceeds of such calls accordingly; and every shareholder shall be liable to pay the amount of every call, in respect of the shares held by him, to the persons, and at the times and places, from time to time appointed by the directors.

32. Interest on calls unpaid.—And be it enacted, That if, before or on the day appointed for payment, any shareholder do not pay the amount of any call to which he may be liable, then such shareholder shall be liable to pay interest for the same at the yearly rate of five pounds in the hundred from the day appointed for the payment thereof to the time of the actual payment.

33. Enforcement of calls by action.—And be it enacted, That if at the time appointed by the directors for the payment of any call the holder of any share fail to pay the amount of such call, the company may sue such shareholder for the amount thereof in any court of law or equity having competent jurisdiction, and may recover the same, with interest at the yearly rate of five pounds in the hundred from the day on which such call may have been payable.

34. Declaration in action for calls.—And be it enacted, That in any action to be brought by the company against any shareholder to recover any money due for any call it shall not be necessary to set forth the special matter, but it shall be sufficient for the company to declare that the defendant is a holder of one share or more in the company (stating the number of shares), and is indebted to the company in the sum of money to which the calls in arrear shall amount, in respect of one call or more upon one share or more (stating the number and amount of each of such calls), whereby an action hath accrued to the company by virtue of this Act.

35. Matter to be proved in action for calls.—And be it enacted, That on the trial of such action it shall not be necessary to prove the appointment of the directors who made such call, or any other matter, except that the defendant at the time of making such call was a holder of one share or more in the company, and that such call was in fact made, and such notice thereof given, as is directed by this Act; and thereupon the company shall be entitled to recover what shall be due upon such call, with interest thereon.

36. Proof of proprietorship.—And be it enacted, That the production of the register book of shareholders of the company shall be evidence of such defendant being a shareholder, and of the number and amount of his shares.

37. Forfeiture of shares for nonpayment of calls.—And be it enacted, That if the holder of any share fail to pay a call payable by him in respect thereof, with the interest, if any, that shall have accrued thereon, the directors, at any time after the expiration of six calendar months from the day appointed for payment of such call, may declare such share forfeited, and that whether the company have sued for the amount of such call or not; but the forfeiture of any such share shall not relieve any shareholder, his executors or administrators, from his and their liability to pay the calls made before such forfeiture.

38. Notice of forfeiture to be given before declaration thereof.—And be it enacted, That before declaring any share forfeited the directors shall cause notice of such intention to be left at the usual or last place of abode of the person appearing by the Register Book of shareholders to be the proprietor of such share; and if the holder of any such share be not within the United Kingdom, or if the interest in any such share shall be known by the directors to have become transmitted otherwise than by transfer, as hereinbefore mentioned, but a declaration of such transmission shall not have been registered as aforesaid, and so the address of the parties to whom the same may have been transmitted shall not be known to the directors, the directors shall give public notice of such intention in the London Gazette; and the several notices aforesaid shall be given twenty-one days at least before the directors shall make such declaration of forfeiture.

39. Forfeiture to be confirmed by a general meeting. Sale of forfeited shares.—And be it enacted, That such declaration of forfeiture shall not take effect, so as to authorize the sale or other disposition of any share, until such declaration have been confirmed at some general meeting of the company, to be held after the expiration of two calendar months at the least from the day on which such notice of intention to make such declaration of forfeiture shall have been given; and it shall be lawful for the company to confirm such forfeiture at any such meeting, and by an order at such meeting, or at any subsequent general meeting, to direct the share so forfeited to be sold or otherwise disposed of; and after such confirmation the directors shall sell the forfeited share, either by public auction or private contract, within six calendar months next after the confirmation of the forfeiture; and if there be more than one such forfeited share, then either separately or together, as to them shall seem fit; and any shareholder may purchase any forfeited share so sold.

40. Evidence as to forfeiture of shares.—And be it enacted, That a declaration in writing by some credible person person not interested in the matter, made before any justice of the peace, or before any Master or Master Extraordinary in the High Court of Chancery, that the call in respect of a share was made, and notice thereof given, and that default in payment of the call was made, and that the forfeiture of the share was declared and confirmed in manner hereinbefore required, shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated; and such declaration, and the receipt of a director or manager of the company for the price of such share, shall constitute a good title to such share, and thereupon such purchaser shall be deemed the holder of such share discharged from all calls made prior to such purchase; and a certificate of proprietorship shall be delivered to such purchaser, and he shall not be bound to see to the application of the purchase-money, nor shall his title to such share be affected by any irregularity in the proceedings in reference to any such sale.

41. No more shares to be sold than sufficient for payment of calls.—And be it enacted, That the company shall not sell or transfer more of the shares of any such defaulter than will be sufficient, as nearly as can be ascertained at the time of such sale, to pay the arrears then due from such defaulter on account of any calls, together with interest, and the expenses attending such sale and declaration of forfeiture; and if the money produced by the sale of any such forfeited share be more than sufficient to pay all arrears of calls, and interest thereon, due at the time of such sale, and the expenses attending the declaration of forfeiture and sale thereof, the surplus shall, on demand, be paid to the defaulter.

42. On payment of calls, forfeited shares to revert.—And be it enacted, That if payment of such arrears of calls, and interest and expenses, be made before any share so forfeited and vested in the company shall have been sold, such share shall revert to the party to whom the same belonged before such forfeiture, in such manner as if such calls had been duly paid.

43. Service of notice on the company.—And be it enacted, That in all cases wherein it may be necessary for any person to serve any notice, writ, or other proceeding at law or in equity, or otherwise, upon the company, service thereof respectively on the manager or any director for the time being of the company, by leaving the same at the principal office of the company, or, if the company have suspended or discontinued business, by serving the same personally on such manager or director, or by leaving the same with some inmate at the usual or last abode of such manager or director, shall be deemed good service of the same on the company.

44. Existing companies may continue their trades until twelve months after the passing of this Act.—Provided always, and be it enacted, That every company of more than six persons, for the formation or establishment of which proceedings had been begun or taken before the sixth day of May last, and which before the fourth day of July then next following was registered at the Stamp Office, and on the fourth day of July actually carried on the said trade or business of bankers in England, although under a covenant or agreement of copartnership made or entered into on or after the sixth day of May last, may continue to carry on the said trade or business under any such agreement or covenant of copartnership for any time not exceeding twelve calendar months next after the passing of this Act, in the same manner in all respects as they legally might have done before the passing of this Act, and after the expiration of the said twelve calendar months, in case the company shall not be incorporated under this Act, shall have, for the purpose of closing their trade or business, but for no other purpose, the same powers and privileges which they would have had if this Act had not been passed.

45. Existing companies may be brought under this Act.—And be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for any company of more than six persons carrying on the trade or business of bankers in England before the said sixth day of May, or any company which by the provision hereinbefore in that behalf contained is enabled to carry on the said trade or business of bankers in England for a time not exceeding twelve calendar months next after the passing of this Act, to present a petition to her Majesty, praying that her Majesty will be pleased to grant to them letters patent under this Act; and if, upon their compliance with the provisions hereinbefore contained with respect to companies formed after the said sixth day of May, her Majesty shall be pleased to grant to them letters patent under this Act as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for them thereafter to carry on their trade and business of bankers as aforesaid according to this Act, and not otherwise: provided always, that a majority of the directors of any such company for the time being, with the consent of three-fourths in number and value of the shareholders present at a general meeting of the company, to be specially called for that purpose, may resolve to make any alterations in the constitution of such company, or otherwise, which may be deemed necessary or expedient for enabling such company to come within the provisions of this Act; and the majority of the directors of such company may, in pursuance of the resolutions of such meeting as aforesaid, execute a new deed of partnership on behalf of such company, and it shall not be necessary for such deed to be executed by any other shareholder of such company; and it shall thereupon be lawful for such company to present such petition as aforesaid, and a copy of such resolution and of such new deed of partnership so executed by a majority of the directors of the company as aforesaid shall be annexed to such petition; and if her Majesty shall thereupon grant letters patent to such company under this Act, all the shareholders of such company at the time of the grant of such letters patent shall be deemed to be incorporated under such letters patent, and to be the first shareholders in such incorporated company; and the said new deed of partnership so executed by a majority of the directors as aforesaid shall have such and the same effect, to all intents and purposes, as if it had been executed by all the shareholders.

46. Agreements entered into with companies after their incorporation to be enforced as if made before incorporation.—And be it enacted, That notwithstanding the incorporation of any company under this Act, all contracts and agreements entered into by and with such company shall continue in force as between such incorporated company and the parties with which the company entered into such contracts and agreements before the incorporation thereof, and may be enforced in like manner as if the company had been incorporated before the making of any such contract or agreement, and that no suit at law or in equity by or against such company shall be abated by reason of such incorporation; but on the application of either of the parties to such suit to the Court in which such suit is pending, at any time before execution on any judgment in such suit shall have been issued, it shall be lawful for the Court to order that the corporate name of such company be entered on the record, instead of the name of the plaintiff or defendant representing such company before the incorporation thereof, and thereupon such suit may be prosecuted and defended in the same manner as if the same had been originally instituted by or against the said incorporated company; and where execution on any judgment in such suit shall have issued before such application, execution of such judgment may be had as if such company were not incorporated as if this Act had not been passed.

47. Existing companies to have the powers of suing and being sued. 7 Geo. 4, c. 46.—And be it enacted, That after the passing of this Act every company of more than six persons established on the said sixth day of May for the purpose of carrying on the said trade or business of bankers within the distance of sixty-five miles from London, and not within the provisions of this Act, shall have the same powers and privileges of suing and being sued in the name of any one of the public officers of such copartnership as the nominal plaintiff, petitioner, or defendant on behalf of such copartnership; and that all judgments, decrees, and orders made and obtained in any such suit may be enforced in like manner as is provided with respect to such companies carrying on the said trade or business at any place in England exceeding the distance of sixty-five miles from London under the provisions of an Act passed in the seventh year of the reign of King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act for the better regulating Copartnerships of certain Bankers in England; and for amending so much of an Act of the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Years of the Reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled 'An Act for establishing an Agreement with the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, for advancing the Sum of Three Millions towards the Supply for the Service of the Year One thousand eight hundred,' as relates to the same;" provided that such first-mentioned company shall make out and deliver from time to time to the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes the several accounts or returns required by the last-mentioned Act; and all the provisions of the last-recited Act as to such accounts or returns shall be taken to apply to the accounts or returns so made out and delivered by such first-mentioned companies, as if they had been originally included in the provisions of the last recited Act.

48. Banking companies to be deemed trading companies.—And be it declared and enacted, That every company of more than six persons carrying on the trade or business of bankers in England shall be deemed a trading company within the provisions of an Act passed in this Session of Parliament, intituled "An Act for facilitating the winding up the Affairs of Joint Stock Companies unable to meet their pecuniary Engagements."

49. Interpretation of Act.—And be it enacted, That in this Act the following words and expressions shall have the several meanings hereby assigned to them, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction, (that is to say,)

Words importing the singular number shall include the plural number, and words importing the plural number shall include the singular number;

Words importing the masculine gender shall include females:
The word "plaintiff" shall include pursuer and petitioner:
The word "defendant" shall include defender and respondent:
The word "execution" shall include diligence or other proceeding proper for giving effect to any judgment, decree, or order of a court of justice.

PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS.

EXCISE AND CUSTOMS DUTIES.—Some returns of the amount of Excise and Customs duties received in the United Kingdom during the years ending the 5th of January 1842, 1843, and 1844 (in continuation of the Parliamentary paper No. 45, of Session 1843), have been printed, on the motion of the Hon. John Stuart Wortley, M.P. for the West Riding of Yorkshire. As regards the excise duties, we find that the amount charged in 1843, in the whole of the United Kingdom, was distributed as follows:—viz. on auctions (amount of sales), 284,655*l.*; on bricks, 363,375*l.*; on flint glass, 83,454*l.*; on plate glass, 65,909*l.*; on crown glass, 394,542*l.*; on German sheet glass, 112,498*l.*; on green glass, 123,595*l.* (making a total amount, on glass alone, of 779,900*l.*); on hops, 243,796*l.*; on licenses, 1,021,082*l.*; on malt, 4,827,950*l.*; on paper, 678,888*l.*; on post-horses (amount of duty) 162,198*l.*; on post-horse licenses, 4,400*l.* (in neither of the two preceding items does Ireland figure at all); on hard soap, 1,081,337*l.*; on soft soap, 67,349*l.*; on spirits, 4,903,201*l.* (viz. 3,025,253*l.* in England, 1,025,529*l.* in Scotland, and only—thanks to Mr. Matthew—852,418*l.* in Ireland!); on medicated spirits and sweets, 970*l.*; on British manufactured sugar, 4,843*l.* (on 3,843 cwts.); on vinegar, 26,256*l.*; and on game certificates in Ireland (3,756) 11,831*l.*; making altogether for the past year, a grand sum total for excise duties alone amounting to 15,471,831*l.* We have neither time nor space at present to institute a comparison between the excise duties received in 1843 and those received in the years 1841 and 1842, excepting that in the following articles, viz. auctions, bricks, glass, hops, licenses, malt, post-horses, spirits, and vinegar, the difference of duty is, between the two extreme periods, in favour of 1841, but of course this fact is utterly insufficient to warrant any inference; we merely mention the circumstance en passant. As regards the Customs duties, the total amount of duty received in the year 1843 was 22,636,659*l.* against 22,596,263*l.* in the year 1842, and 23,606,124*l.* in the year 1841. The details of the separate articles of import, and the duties received on each, are given at length in the return before us, but it is manifestly impossible to transfer them to our columns.

Merchant Seamen.—An account of the income and expenditure of the corporation for the relief of seamen in the merchant service, from the 1st day of January to the 31st day of December, 1843, has just been presented to both Houses of Parliament, pursuant to the Act 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 52. It appears from the return before us, which has been printed, that the total amount of the sums received during the year 1843 as income by the president and governors of the above corporation was 18,485*l.* of which 15,464*l.* arose from duties; 605*l.* from dead men's wages; 384*l.* from benefactions; and 2,031*l.* from the interest on capital. The total amount of the sums concurrently expended was 20,697*l.* of which 15,687*l.* was appropriated to pensions, 2,466*l.* to temporary relief, 439*l.* to the Seamen's Hospital Society, and 2,104*l.* to the expense of management; leaving a surplus of expenditure amounting to the sum of 2,212*l.* The general account of the receipts and payments of the corporation shews a total amount of 21,731*l.* received, and one of 20,330*l.* paid away, leaving a balance in hand of about 1,400*l.* Of the sums paid, it appears that 11,245*l.* was appropriated to London pensioners; 3,903*l.* to outport pensioners (1812); 1,596*l.* to temporary relief in London; 891*l.* to temporary relief in outports; 1,427*l.* to the charges of management in the metropolis; and 637*l.* to the charges of management at the outports, &c.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

We have brought up a long arrear of material that has been waiting leisure to make its appearance, that we may begin the next Term with unencumbered columns.

The following timely hint has appeared in the daily papers; we transcribe it:—

MASTERS IN CHANCERY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—By the 17th section of the statute 2 & 3 Wm. 4, c. 94, it is enacted, that each of the Masters, within the first four days of Michaelmas Term in every year, shall present to the Lord Chancellor a report in writing, stating the days on which he shall have attended at his office during the preceding twelve months, specifying the number of hours occupied in each of such day's attendance; and shall annex to such report a list or schedule of the several causes and matters then pending in his office, shewing the then state and stage of the same respectively; and the Lord Chancellor may order such list or schedule to be published in such manner as he shall think fit.

This is a most useful provision, and, if carried out to the letter, would prove highly beneficial to the suitors. Can you inform me whether any of the lists or schedules have ever been published?

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
An Inquirer.

REVIEW OF THE CASES DECIDED IN ALL THE COURTS OF COMMON LAW,

During Michaelmas Term, 1811.

In commencing our Reviews of the Decisions in the Courts of Common Law for the second year, we may be pardoned for giving the following illustration of their usefulness. We find, on examination of the standard reports, that out of forty-four cases we noticed in our Review of Michaelmas Term, 1843 (2 Law T. 290) thirty-one have been since reported; and of the remaining thirteen, several, if not all, will most probably be reported; for they comprise important judgments in the Exchequer Chamber, and neither the reporters of the Queen's Bench or Common Pleas have yet reached to the end of that Term. In the present Review we have equally aimed at practical usefulness, and we trust not without success.

ARBITRATION.

Setting aside for misconduct.—It is well settled that conduct may amount to legal misconduct in an arbitration, however free from suspicion or blame the arbitrator may be (Phipps v. Ingram, 3 Dowl. P. C. 669); but in some instances the courts have supported awards made under circumstances which would now be held to amount to legal misconduct, because there was no imputation of moral misconduct, as in Atkinson v. Abraham (1 B. & P. 175), where a witness had been re-examined after the case had been closed, and in the absence of the parties (and see Hewlett v. Laycock, 2 C. & P. 574). In Dobson v. Groves (4 Law T. 155), however, these cases were disregarded, and the rule laid down by Lord Eldon, in Walker v. Frobisher (6 Ves. 69); Featherston v. Cooper (9 Ves. 68) declared to be the true principle. The examination of a single witness in the absence of the other party is, therefore, a fatal irregularity, although the award may appear to be perfectly just, and the arbitrator swears that the evidence so improperly obtained had no influence upon his decision. For, as Lord Eldon observed, "No court could permit an arbitrator to decide so delicate a question as whether a witness examined in the absence of the other party had an influence on him or not." It seems, however, that an irregularity of this kind may be waived by delay in making the objection, or proceeding with the case before the arbitrator. (Kingwell v. Elliot, 7 Dowl. P. C. 423; Bignall v. Gale, 2 Man. & G. 830.)

Finality.—In Angus v. Redford (11 M. & W. 69), Parke, B. differed from the majority of the Court upon the construction of a clause in the order of reference, empowering the arbitrator to determine "what he shall think fit to be done by either of the parties," and gave it as his opinion, that, in addition to disposing of the action referred, he was bound to give some directions. On this opinion, in Makepeace v. Lorraine (1 Law T. 113), it was sought to set an award aside, in which an action for obstructing a stream was referred to an arbitrator with power to give such directions as he should think proper consistently with the legal rights of the parties. But the Court of Common Pleas held that the power was enabling, and not obligatory, confirming, therefore, the views of the majority of the Court of Exchequer.

Costs in the cause.—These words do not include the costs of witnesses called before the arbitrator, whether the action alone, or other matters in difference, be referred. (Brown v. Nelson, 4 Law T. 139.)

Practice when award is referred back again.—Under the clause which has been lately introduced to enable the Court to refer the award back again to the arbitrator to be amended, if it is referred back to him generally, he is bound to hear fresh evidence if offered to him. (Nichalls v. Warren, 4 Law T. 156.)

Signature by arbitrators.—In Little v. Newton (2 Man. & G. 351), an objection was raised to an award, because it had not been signed by the arbitrators at the same time. It became unnecessary for the Court to decide on the validity of the award in that respect, but the inclination of their opinion seemed to be in favour of the objection, on the ground that the act was a judicial, and not a ministerial act, and there are several cases which establish that such an act must be done by both at the same time, as the signature of justices to a parish indenture. (Rex v. Hamstall Ridwares, 3 T. R. 380.) In Stalwart v. Ings (4 Law T. 159), an application to set aside an award on this ground was refused, not because the Court of Exchequer thought differently, but because they did not wish to deprive the parties of a writ of error, and they therefore left the award to be enforced by action, saying that they thought it was a judicial act. It may be observed that, according to the analogy of the case of Rex v. Winwick (8 T. R. 454), the subsequent signature of the second arbitrator would be good if given in the presence of the one who had first signed. (See Battye v. Gresley, 8 East, 318, and the note there.)

ATTORNEY AND SOLICITOR.

On the subject of taxation we shall also notice the decisions in equity.

Delivery of bill.—The new Act relaxed the strictness required for the delivery of a bill; but questions will still arise upon the construction of the words used. Re Bush (4 Law T. 131) deserves therefore to be noticed. The Master of the Rolls decided that a delivery to the solicitor of the party chargeable, at his request, was a delivery within the statute; and that to shew that they came to the hands of the solicitor through his agents, amounts to a delivery to him directly. It was unnecessary to decide whether for this purpose the delivery to the agent by the direction of the solicitor would be a sufficient delivery to the party chargeable; but it is apprehended that the general principle of delegatus non potest delegare would apply, and make it insufficient. At any rate it would be imprudent to run the risk.

Power to tax.—It having been clearly settled that the Courts had no common law jurisdiction to tax bills containing no taxable item, either before or after action brought (Williams v Griffith, 6 M. & W. 32), it is somewhat surprising that any attempt should have been made under the new Act to obtain from a court of common law taxation of such a bill. But as this attempt was made, we here refer to the case, to prevent any similar mistake. The Court of Common Pleas, in Bush v. Sayer (4 Law T. 135), recognized the old rule, and decided that they had no more jurisdiction since the statute 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, than before, under such circumstances.

That the statute must be looked upon as the sole authority now, is also shewn by Ex parte The Great Western Railway Company (4 Law T. 99, 138). Under the company's Act (and some other similar Acts, we believe) it had been usual for bills as to expenses under the Act to be taxed on the equity side of the Court of Exchequer. It was now sought to obtain taxation in the Exchequer, rather than before the Master of the Rolls under the new Act. The Court, however, decided that they had no jurisdiction, none of the items being for business transacted in any court of law.

Special circumstances.—In Whicher v. Thomas (4 Law T. 159), the definition given by the Court of Exchequer to "special circumstances," after verdict, was, fresh facts or circumstances coming to the knowledge of the party which he was not aware of pending the action. There the application was refused, because, according to defendant's own statement, he could have resisted the action with success, and he must therefore suffer for his own neglect.

Taxation precluded by agreement.—Payment under an agreement between the parties that there shall be no taxation will be so far binding that taxation cannot be obtained in the usual course. (Re Whitcombe, 4 Law T. 130); and settling an account by the solicitor and client, in which the bill of costs is an item, is an appropriation of moneys of the debtor equivalent to payment. (Re Cattlin. 4 Law T. 152.) Such agreements, however, would almost inevitably be set aside by bill in equity. (See Scougall v. Campbell, 3 Russ. 545, and other cases cited in Drax v. Scroupe, 1 Dowl. P. C. 69.)

Negligence.—We have before had occasion to draw the attention of our readers to the importance of attending to the real construction of the 2 Wm. 4, c. 39, s. 10, as to writs to save the Statute of Limitations (2 Law T. 448), and in now noticing the case of Hunter v. Caldwell (4 Law T. 155), for a different reason, we wish again to point out that the note in Archb. Prac. p. 922, is incorrect, and that the second and subsequent writs must contain a memorandum of the dates of the return of the first writ as well as of the writ itself. (See as to amendment of writs, Mavor v. Spalding, 2 Law T. 448, and 1 Dowl. & Lowndes, 878.) In Hunter v. Caldwell an action was brought against an attorney for negligence in not having filed the pluries writs within five months of the time that they issued. The words of the statute require every writ "to be returned non est inventus and entered of record, within one calendar month of the expiration thereof, including the day of such expiration." It appears that the practice has not been uniform as to filing; and the Court of Queen's Bench expressed great doubts whether the omission could be held to be such gross negligence as to render the attorney liable. We may here remark that in several cases, the erroneous construction of a statute has not been deemed crassa negligentia so as to disentitle the attorney to recover for work and labour, as in Elkington v. Holland (9 M. & W. 659), as to the construction of the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, on attestation of warrants of attorney, of a standing order of the House of Lords (Bulmer v. Gilman, 4 Man. & G. 108), or to render him liable to an action, as in Kemp v. Burt (4 B. & Ad. 424). As Alderson, B. said in Shilcock v. Pressman (7 C. & P. 289), "It is not every mistake or misapprehension that will make him liable in an action for negligence, and the question is for us to consider whether he has used reasonable skill and reasonable care." It would seem to be quite clear that if he follows a statute literally, he would not be liable. (Per Patteson, J. in Kemp v. Burt.) In Davies v. Jenkins (1 Dowl. & Lownd. 321; 11 M. & W. 745), an attorney was held not to be liable in case for bringing an action and issuing execution by mistake, and without malice, against the wrong person.

Privilege.—The privilege of an attorney to be sued in his own court was formerly lost when he was sued with an unprivileged person, except where both parties could be sued by the same process. (Ramsbottom v. Harcourt, 4 M. & S. 585.) And following this principle, it was held in Keep v. Biggs (2 Dowl. P. C. 278) that, when jointly sued, an attorney was not liable to be arrested, because, under the Uniformity of Process Act, one might be arrested and the other only served upon the same process. Hence, in Rastrick v. Beckwith (4 Law T. 114), the inference was sought to be established that an attorney sued with an unprivileged person could now retain his privilege of being sued only in his own court. The Court of Common Pleas, however, decided that he did lose his privilege by being sued with an unprivileged person. There is no privilege from arrest under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. (Flight v. Cook, 1 Dowl. & L. 714, confirming Thomson v. Moore, 1 D. N. S. 283; see 1 Law T. 612.)

BANKRUPTCY.

Simultaneous proceedings under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 112, s. 11, and by action.—In Covington v. Hogarth (4 Law T. 157), the power given of summoning a trader under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 122, was decided to be so completely a collateral proceeding, that if an action has also been commenced, the trader is not entitled, after payment in the Bankruptcy Court, to stay the action, except on payment of the costs incurred.

Power of Commissioners to remand after refusal of final order under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. Construction of proviso at the end of s. 28.—Re Partington (4 Law T. 172—see p. 1) is an important decision upon one of the most obscure parts of the too notorious Act of last session. It determines—1. That where a prisoner has got out of prison by an interim order, to which, in fact, he was not entitled—as, for instance, being a trader with debts above 300*l.*—the commissioners have power to remand him to his former custody after the expiration of the interim order. 2. That the power of the commissioners is not confined to the cases mentioned in sec. 24, but extends to false statements in the points essential to the title of the prisoner to the benefit of the Act. 3. That their decision, if it can be reviewed anywhere, is not liable to be so by the Court of Queen's Bench. 4. That the proviso "that no debtor shall be imprisoned for more than twelve months," is to be construed with reference to the former part of the 28th section, and as a limitation upon the power given to the commissioners to imprison for a period, by the indirect method of granting a protecting order to date from a certain future day, and to remand in the meantime. We have before expressed our inability to comprehend what the Legislature meant by this proviso (3 Law T. 496), nor do we now feel quite sure that we have understood this decision rightly upon this point.

CONTRACT.

Acceptance and delivery within Statute of Frauds and 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, s. 7.—The distinction between an order for a chattel to be manufactured and a purchase of a specific chattel already in existence, is well established. In the latter case, the property passes by the contract; in the former, the chattel must be finished and delivered, or at least ready for delivery, and approved of by the purchaser. (Laidler v. Burlinson, 2 M. & W. 601; and Clarke v. Spence, 4 A. & E. 448.) The delivery may in some instances be constructive, where it is clear that there was an appropriation by the vendor of the finished chattel to the purchaser, with his consent. This was the case in Carruthers v. Payne (5 Bing. 270), where, after payment for, but before the actual delivery of a chariot ordered to be made, a front seat was directed to be added by the purchaser. This was not done; but the builder promised to deliver it, thereby recognizing the property to be in the purchaser, and on his becoming dissatisfied, the builder, according to his direction, placed it in his warehouse for sale. The builder became bankrupt, and the purchaser was held to be the owner of the chariot, and that he was therefore entitled to maintain trover against the assignees. So in Wilkins v. Bromhead (2 Law T. 328) the property was held to have passed, where, without having seen the finished chattel, the vendee had paid for it on the application of the vendor, upon whose premises it continued to remain. Since the action for goods sold and delivered of course only lies where the property has been so changed, the case of Bax v. Beetham (4 Law T. 112) is well deserving of our notice, as a similar state of circumstances must often occur. The defendant had ordered a cloak to be made with a particular lining, which was to be paid for in ready money. When the tailor brought it home, the defendant told him to take it back, and make the lining into a chaise-cloth, and put a silk lining instead. This was done, and when both were brought home the defendant objected to the fit of the cloak, but wished to retain the chaise-cloth. The tailor refused to leave them without the money, and took both back. An action for goods sold and delivered was then brought, and the Court held that the jury were quite right in considering that there had been a delivery and acceptance within the statute. This may at first seem to clash with the cases of Atkinson v. Bell (8 B. & C. 277); Maberley v. Sheppard (10 Bing. 99); Baldey v. Parker (2 B. & C. 37), but they are distinguishable. In Atkinson v. Bell, although it is true alterations were directed and made, yet the machines never left the possession of the maker, and there was no delivery to divest his lien. In Maberley v. Sheppard the additions were made to the cart during the time it was being constructed, and it also was never out of the possession of the maker. So in Baldey v. Parker the dealing with the goods took place in the shop of the vendor, and whilst they were in his possession, but the vendee refused to accept them as soon as they were sent home. There was a willingness to deliver, but not to accept; and to constitute a contract there must be both delivery and acceptance. (Bill v. Bament, 9 M. & W. 37; Dixon v. Yates, 5 B. & Ad. 340.) It is not indeed quite clear how in the principal case the owner had so parted with his possession as to lose his right of lien, which the last-cited cases shew is necessary to constitute a delivery. But we apprehend the ground of the decision was, that since the cloak, when sent home, was finished just as the defendant had directed, and was then accepted without any objection, except so far as his opinion of the suitableness of the lining had changed, nothing remained to be done to complete the original agreement, and the sending it home was an appropriation by the vendor, the effect of which was not to be qualified by the subsequent alteration of the lining.

Company—Liability of person not a partner who interferes in the preliminary proceedings.—The liability of persons connected with unincorporated companies depends upon the circumstances in each case, and it is for the jury to determine whether a person sought to be charged either was a partner, or, by holding himself out as one, is liable for the contracts of the company. And there is also a distinction between members of a company actually formed, and members of a company which commences operations before the conditions upon which subscribers joined it have been fulfilled. (See Fox v. Clifton, 6 Bing. 776; Pitchford v. Davis, 5 M. & W. 2.) But still it is useful to notice any new case on the subject, as it will throw light upon the subject generally. With this view we wish to call attention to Lake v. The Duke of Argyll (4 Law T. 171). It appeared that the Duke of Argyll had consented to be named as president of an emigration society, and had attended a meeting in that capacity, and signed a resolution that certain papers should be printed. He was at first a proprietor, but ceased to be so, and the society was never formed according to its intended constitution. The duke had been sued in the Common Pleas for work done for the company, but had obtained a verdict, no partnership, either actual or implied, having been proved. He was now sued for printing and other work connected with the preliminary proceedings of the Company. The jury found against him, and on motion for nonsuit or new trial, Lord Denman, C. J. said:—

When persons meet to prepare measures for calling a society into existence, attendance upon such meeting, and concurrence in such measures, may be strong evidence that any individual there present held himself out as the paymaster to all who executed their orders, and, although not liable as a member or shareholder, yet his declared intention to become president, or to take shares, may be material to shew he authorized contracts with those whose services were required by what may be called the constituent body. In this case the work done by the plaintiff was obviously necessary for the objects of the society. Part of it was ordered by a resolution read by the duke from the chair. The proof was certainly not conclusive, as the plaintiff might have been informed, or he might believe that others were to pay, and that the duke is merely giving his name to promote the general objects of the society.

His Lordship also observed, that this decision did not establish that the Duke was liable upon contracts, similar to that which was unsuccessfully attempted to be enforced against him in Wood v. The Duke of Argyll (see 2 Law T. 311).

Husband and wife.—The later cases have very much qualified what Lord Ellenborough laid down in Waithman v. Wakefield (1 Campb. 120), that "where a husband is living in the same house with his wife, he is liable to any extent for goods which he permits her to receive there." Seaton v. Benedict (5 Bing. 20), and Atkins v. Curwood (7 C. & P. 756), may be particularly cited to shew that the suitableness of the goods supplied, both in number and quality, are material questions in cases of implied liability of the husband. In Freestone v. Butcher (9 C. & P. 613), Lord Abinger went even further than these cases, and held, that although cohabitation was good ground for inferring authority for necessaries in the absence of any contrary evidence, yet excess in the extent of the order or extravagance would be sufficient to repel the inference of the wife's agency. As in Lane v. Ironmonger (4 Law T. 117) that case was fully upheld, we give the words of Lord Abinger at length. Pollock, C.B. had read them as part of his charge to the jury, and a motion was made for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, but refused. Gurney, B said he was glad that this case might now be added to Freestone v. Butcher. The passage is as follows:—

In the cases of orders given by the wife in those departments of her husband's household which she has under her control, the jury may infer that the wife was the agent of her husband till the contrary appear. So, for such articles as are necessary for the wife, such as clothes, if the order is given by the wife, and she is living with her husband, and nothing appear to the contrary, the jury do right by inferring the agency; but if the order is excessive in point of extent, or if, when the husband has a small income, the wife gives extravagant orders, these are circumstances from which the jury would infer that there was no agency. The tradesman who supplies the goods takes the risk, and if the bill is of an extravagant nature, such as the husband would never have authorized, that would alone be sufficient to repel the inference of agency.

Promise to pay for support of bastard child need not be in writing.—It is important to remark the case of Baxter v. Cope (4 Law T. 121). The putative father of a bastard child had verbally promised to pay so much a week towards its maintenance in the house of its mother's father. It was contended that as the mother was, under the Poor Law, primarily liable to the support of the child, this was a promise for the debt in default of another, and should therefore have been in writing. But Patteson, J. held that it was an original and not a collateral contract, and therefore sufficient.

On this subject another case must be added, reported in the LAW TIMES of this day. In Hargreaves v. Parsons, it was decided that where a contract has been made between A and B for the performance by B of certain matters therein contained, A may transfer his interest in that contract to a third party, and may guarantee the performance of it by B without a contract in writing, for such guarantee is not a promise to be answerable for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another within the Statute of Limitations. See the recent case of Butcher v. Stuart (11 M. & W. 857).

Restraint of trade.—Two cases have occurred in connection with this subject, one a direct decision, on a point not before clearly decided; the other defining the meaning of the word "London." In Rennie v. Irwin (4 Law T. 133) the question was whether an agreement on the sale of a goodwill of a trade, that the vendor should not supply any of the customers then dealing at the shop without the consent of the vendee, was a valid restriction of trade. The principles upon which certain restraints of trade are held legal have been much discussed within the last few years in the cases of Hitchcock v. Coker (6 A. & E. 438); Warde v. Byrne (5 M. & W. 548); Proctor v. Sargent (2 M. & G. 89); Mallan v. May (11 M. & W. 653). The general rule is, that all restraints, though only partial, if nothing more appear, are presumed to be bad. (See Pragnell v. Close, Aleyn, 67; Horner v. Graves, 7 Bing. 744.)

But contracts for partial restraint are upheld, because it is for the benefit of the public that they should be enforced, as through them the goodwill of a business becomes valuable, and knowledge, skill, and experience are made more useful to the community by being imparted to others without risk to the teacher or employer. These restraints, however, must not be "larger and wider than the protection of the party with whom the contract is made can possibly require." (See Tindal, C. J. in Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 A. & E. 438, adopted by Parke, B. in Ward v. Byrne, 5 M. & W. 548.) Accordingly, an absolute restraint from carrying on trade for any time would be bad; as that of a coal merchant for nine months, in Ward v. Byrne, or a dyer for six months (Year Book, 2 Hen. 5, pl. 26), where Mr. Justice Hale thus vehemently expressed his opinion—"La condition encount' common ley: et per Dieu si le pl' fuit icy, il irra al prison, et uny: il ust fait fine au roy." But many restrictions limited as to space have been held good. In Davis v. Mason (5 T. R. 118) Thetford, and ten miles round; in Hayward v. Young (2 Chit. 407) twenty miles round a place was held a reasonable limit in the case of a surgeon; in that of an attorney, London and 150 miles round (Pasmore v. Gun, 4 East, 190); and in Proctor v. Sargent (2 Man. & G. 20; 2 Scott, N. R. 289) five miles from Northampton square, in the county of Middlesex, was held reasonable in the case of a milkman. In Hunlocke v. Blacklocke (2 Wms. Saunders, 156) a covenant "not to exercise the trade of a tailor with any of the customers named in the schedule," seems to have been considered valid, and the learned editor there adds in a note, "it seems that a bond covenant or promise not to use a trade with particular customers by name, if founded upon good consideration, is also valid. Good consideration, it must be remembered, means a consideration; for the Courts will not entertain the question of its adequacy. (Hitchcock v. Cocker, 6 A. & E.) The doctrine laid down in this note has been settled by Rennie v. Irvine, 4 Law T. 133; 8 Jur. 1051.

The Court of Common Pleas there decided that a restriction not to deal with any of the customers of the vendor was valid; for it was, in fact, as much a limited restriction as if the customers had been named in a schedule. Their number and names were known to the vendor, and were in his books, and it was a proper and salutary restriction. The judgment on a demurrer to the declaration setting out such an agreement was given, therefore, for the plaintiff, and the learned counsel for the defendant, Serjeant Byles, by obtaining leave to amend upon undertaking not to bring error, seems to have acquiesced in the correctness of the decision. It appears to us fully in accordance with the principles established by the previous cases, although the effect of the agreement might possibly, under extraordinary circumstances, be a greater restraint than was necessary, as if, for instance, both vendor and customer went to a distant part of the country. "I do not see why," said Tindal, C. J. "if the contract is reasonable at the time it was made, we are bound to see any extravagant supposition or contingency which may possibly arise, but must be very rare in order to render the contract void."

Mallan v. May (4 Law T. 174) was a question arising out of a proceeding in Chancery between the same parties as the case of Mallan v. May (11 M. & W.) It had been there held that a restriction not to carry on business as a dentist in London, or in any of the towns or places in England or Scotland, where the plaintiff or the defendant on their account might have been practising, was good as to London, but bad as to the other towns. It was now decided that "London" meant only the city of London, and did not include what was popularly called London, and that therefore practising in Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, was not within the restriction.

COSTS.

Attorney and Client.—Notwithstanding the direction to taxing-masters of Hil. Vac. 4 Wm. 4, the Master may in taxation between attorney and client allow for higher fees, if they have been distinctly agreed upon by the client after due explanation that they will not be recoverable from the opposite party. (Re Smith, 4 Law T. 159). As to the difference between plaintiff's and defendant's costs under this rule, see 2 Law T. 293, and 3, 308.

Certificate.—If a judge enter in his notes, "certificate for costs if necessary;" this, if occasion arise to require that certificate to be granted, is enough to authorize its being given. (James v. Jones, 4 Law T. 138.)

Under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24.—We may here again repeat what has been long ago made known to our readers (supra 2 Law T. 323, 3, 308), that this statute does not apply to judgment on demurrer, but at the same time the plaintiff is only entitled to the costs of the demurrer without a certificate. (Poole v. Grantham, 4 Law T. 157.)

Married Woman.—According to an Anonymous Case (4 Law T. 143), a married woman succeeding on plea of coverture, which must be pleaded in person, is entitled only to costs out of pocket.

Postea.—Where the defendant has substantially succeeded in the action, costs of obtaining the postea are costs in the cause. (Rocksedge v. Chandler, 4 Law T. 139.)

EVIDENCE.

There are not many decisions to notice under this head, although some important questions remain, as the admissibility of Lloyd's List and the evidence of underwriters in Eccles v. Harvey (4 Law T. 99), and the effect of an admission upon the record in Gale v. Lewis (4 Law T. 110). Norton, or Lawton v. Sweeny (4 Law T. 98, 8 Jur. 964) must, however, be mentioned. In action for money lent, the only evidence was, that the defendant having asked the plaintiff for some money, the latter handed him a note, which was believed to be a bank note, but the amount of which did not appear, it was held that the jury were rightly directed to presume it to have been a note for 5*l.* as being the smallest note in circulation in this country. This is analogous to the case of Clunness v. Pezzy (1 Campb. 8). That was an action brought by a liquor merchant, who was proved to deal in several kinds of liquor, and the only evidence against the defendant was, that the plaintiff had caused to be delivered to the defendant a certain quantity of some liquor, the nature of which did not appear. On this it was held that the liquor ought to be presumed to have been the cheapest liquor which the plaintiff dealt in.

Inferences by jury.—Although an elementary rule, we may quote here what Pollock, C. B. said in Cook v. Stratford (4 Law T. 138), on the right of the jury to draw inferences in the absence of distinct evidence. Whenever a person, reasonably acting in his own concerns, would draw a conclusion, the jury are to draw the same conclusion, if they think proper.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

Rights of out-going tenant.—According to Griffiths v. Bulestock (4 Law T. 115), the out-going tenant entitled to emblements is legally in possession of the land until all that he is entitled to do by the custom of the country is done; and therefore his vendee is entitled to enter for the purpose of removing the crops.

Lease or agreement.—In the construction of documents purporting to be agreements or leases, it is often by no means easy to determine whether there is a present demise or not. According to Patteson, J. in Jones v. Reynolds (1 Q. B. 506) in all those cases where it has been held that a present demise took place, there was either, on actual present demise, immediate possession given, or something to shew that possession and the relation of landlord and tenant were to commence before a lease was executed."

In Doe dem. Morgan v. Powell (4 Law T. 134), Tindal, C. J. considered that the words "I agree to let and grant a lease," coupled with an agreement to execute a formal lease as soon as it could be prepared, did not amount to an actual demise.

What effect the 4th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 86 will have upon agreements of this kind is as yet very doubtful. After providing that no lease in writing shall be valid except it shall be made by deed, it enacts that the person who shall be in the possession of the land, in pursuance of any agreement to let, may, from payment of rent or other circumstances, be construed to be a tenant from year to year.

INTERPLEADER.

In Apstead v. Tickener (4 Law T. 154), proceedings were stayed in an action brought by the successful party under an interpleader rule, to recover the difference between the amount for which the goods had been sold under the direction of the judge and the value when seized. The Court would not say whether a recovery under the Interpleader Act was a bar in all cases; but they seemed to rely much upon the assent of the claimant and the now plaintiff to the order for sale made by the judge. In the argument in Whitmore v. Black (4 Law T. 99), which we heard, it was assumed that it was not a bar; although in that case the assignees were held not entitled to recover the difference.

MANORIAL CUSTOMS.

Period for admittance.—In Doe dem. Tresidder v. Tresidder (1 Q. B. 416), it was decided that if a copyholder leases for years without license of the lord, a custom authorizing such lease, the lessee had a title against every one but the lord, and could maintain ejectment, the lease being only voidable, and not void; and Doe dem. Warwick v. Coombs (4 Law T. 156) may be noted as supporting this principle. It was there held, that the non-observance of the custom of the manor, as to the period of admittance, did not render a subsequent admittance invalid. The custom was for the benefit of the lord only, which he could waive, as in this case he had done, by admittance.

PLEADING.

Judgment recovered against a joint contractor.—The principal decision in pleading which we have to notice is that of King v. Hoar (4 Law T. 174). It was there held, and it appears to be the first decision on the point, that it is a good plea to an action ex contractu against one of several joint contractors, that a judgment has been already recovered against another of them. For the reasoning we refer our readers to the judgment of Parke, B.

We may also refer to Nichols v. Payne (4 Law T. 114), as to the plea of bankruptcy; Marriage v. Marriage (4 Law T. 133) as to pleading payment to a bond of a peculiar nature; and Beckett v. Bradley (4 Law T. 131, 8 Jur. 1073), as to estoppel on the record.

PRACTICE.

We have more cases than usual to notice under this division, and some of great importance. As before, we have arranged the subject alphabetically.

Acknowledgment under Fines and Recoveries Act.—The certificate of an acknowledgment under 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 74, s. 84, taken under a special commission, purporting to be the certificate of two of the commissioners, is good, although it be signed by more. (Watt and Others v. Smith, 4 Law T. 158). In the same case it was held to be no objection to the affidavit verifying the acknowledgment, that it was made before one of the commissioners being qualified to take oaths.

Affidavit.—It is a fatal defect in an affidavit to omit the words "before me" in the jurat, and cannot, therefore, be amended. (Reg. v. Bloxham, 4 Law T. 132.) It may be well doubted whether the omission of the place where the affidavit is sworn would again be held an amendable defect, as it was in Cass v. Cass (1 Dowl. & Lownd. 698).

Amendment of rules.—The Courts are becoming much more strict in all matters of form, and defective rules will not, in general, be allowed to be amended, because they do not suit exactly the purpose of the parties who obtain them. In such case, the proper course is to give notice of motion to discharge the rule with costs, and then to bring forward a new motion for another rule. (Reg. v. Mayor and Corporation of Dover, 4 Law T. 93.) But in Dailey v. Loveday (4 Law T. 139), a rule for judgment non obstante veredicto was allowed to be altered, at the hearing, to rule for verdict for the plaintiff, it being considered a mere clerical error.

Amending writs to save Statute of Limitations.—In Brown v. Fullarton (4 Law T. 139, and report of this day), the Court of Exchequer, after taking time to consider, have decided that they will amend writs of summons by insertion of a co-plaintiff to save the Statute of Limitations.

Charging prisoner in execution.—In our Review of Hilary Term (2 Law T. 448), we noticed the decision in Ireland v. Berry, since reported (1 Dowl. & Lowndes, 866), in which it was held that the rule of T. T. 3 Wm. 4, requiring that prisoners should be declared against in the Term next after the arrest, did not apply to a defendant in custody by virtue of a writ of capias issued under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 3. But the 85th rule of H. T. Wm. 4, which requires the prisoner to be charged in execution within two Terms inclusive after trial or judgment, does apply to the case of a person arrested under this statute, and against whom judgment has been obtained. (Walker v. Richment, 4 Law T. 132; 8 Jur. 1016). And judgment in debt by default in which costs have not been taxed, is final judgment within the rule.

Discontinuance. — In Goodenough v. Buller, 3 Dowl. P. C. 751, it was said by Parke B.—"That a rule to discontinue was never granted after a general verdict; but while the Court of Queen's Bench refused such a rule in Young v. Hickens (4 Law T. 151), they seemed to imply that, under very peculiar circumstances, they must grant such a rule if applied for in due time.

Discontinuance does not prevent error being brought.—The discontinuance of an action, upon which there are issues of fact outstanding after judgment on demurrer, does not preclude the parties from bringing a writ of error; and the proper course, under these circumstances, is to tax the plaintiff's costs, and to tax the defendant's, and not to set them off, but to leave each to his remedy to gain them: the defendant, by writ of error, to dispute those on demurrer by disputing the judgment.

Distringas.—A distringas will not be granted upon an affidavit of calls at the office of the party to be served, although it appears that a communication of the fact has been made to him by his clerks. (Russel v. Knowles, 4 Law T. 113; 8 Jur. 1050.) That two calls only are necessary. (See Gregory v. Eastabrook, 1 Dowl. & Lowndes, 881.)

Elegit.—In an inquisition on an elegit taken since the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 11, it is not necessary to set out the land by metes and bounds. It is sufficient to describe it in such a manner as would be sufficient to identify it in a conveyance. (Doe dem. Roberts v. Barry, 4 Law T. 97; 8 Jur. 963.)

Indorsement on writ of summons.—The rule of H. T. 2 Wm. 4, c. 111, requiring the amount of debt to be indorsed upon every bailable writ and warrant, and upon the copy of any process served for the payment of any debt, does not apply to qui tam actions, but only to suits arising out of a contract between the parties. (Hobbs v. Young, 4 Law T. 111; 8 Jur. 1029.)

Irregularity.—The well-known rule is, that an irregularity is waived by delay; but as there is no fixed time within which the irregularity must be taken advantage of, each instance may with advantage be observed. Thus where an execution was levied on the 7th of November in an action where no notice of declaration had been served, and eleven days elapsed before the affidavit to ground the motion to set it aside was made, and thirteen before the motion was made, the application was held to be too late. (Cooke v. Peace, 4 Law T. 111.) So also an application on the 16th of November to set aside a judgment signed on the 10th of August, and execution issued thereon on the 21st August, was too late. (Austin v. Darcy, 4 Law T. 160.)

New trial.—In two cases on the same day (Geach v. Ingell, 4 Law T. 98, and Watson v. Whitmore (4 Law T. 99), the Court of Exchequer explained the principle upon which new trials were granted for misdirection. The application being in substitution for a bill of exceptions, a new trial would not be granted where it would not lie, as, for instance, on a misdirection unobjected to, nor unless manifest injustice were done. Thus they refused to grant a new trial because the party had been deprived of the right to begin at the trial.

When a cause in the superior courts has been tried before the judge of the Sheriffs' Court, the counsel who attended the trial may move for a new trial without the production of the judge's notes. (Tanley v. Evans, 4 Law T. 100).

Peremptory undertaking.—The Court of Exchequer, in Smith v. Lloyd (4 Law T. 99), seemed to think that an affidavit that the action was brought solely for the purpose of arresting the defendant, and so obtaining payment, and that since 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96 it was useless to proceed, the sum, being under 20*l*., was sufficient ground for discharging a peremptory undertaking.

Rescinding judge's order.—The Court of Exchequer have directed that in future motions to rescind a judge's order made at chambers, all the materials should be brought before the Court in the first instance. (Stedman v. Barnett, 4 Law T. 119.)

Staying proceedings for evasion of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96.—A mode has been adopted of evading the Act for preventing imprisonment on debts under 20*l*. by suing upon the judgment, where, as is usually the case, by the addition of the costs, it is above 20*l*. An application was made in the Court of Exchequer to stay proceedings in an action so brought, on affidavit that the defendant believed it was brought solely for the purpose of imprisoning him, but refused. The Court said that, even supposing they had any power of interfering, it could only be after the arrest. (Hopkins v. Francis, 4 Law T. 117.) It is not easy to see on what principle they could interfere to supply this casus omissus. The course is not likely to be frequently adopted, as the costs of the action in the judgment would hardly be allowed under 43 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 4.

Staying proceedings upon payment of debt and costs.—Where a payment had been made by a defendant of the amount of damages and costs indorsed upon a writ of summons more than four days after the service of the writ to the clerk of the plaintiff's attorney, who gave a receipt for the amount, and the attorney himself afterwards repudiated such payment but retained the money, the Court would not disturb an order of a judge staying further proceedings in the action, without the money was returned. (Hodding v. Stuchfield, 4 Law T. 95; 8 Jur. 988.)

Subpœna.—We wish particularly to draw attention to Edgell v. Curling (4 Law T. 135), as it shews that what we believe to be very commonly the practice with reference to subpœnas is erroneous. It decides that the Uniformity of Process Act does not apply to writs of subpœna; and that, therefore, they can only be tested in Term time. If tested in vacation, the writ is absolutely void, and no action could be maintained against the witness for non-attendance. So in Seaton v. Heap (5 Dowl. P. C. 217), a scire facias was held void for being tested in vacation.

Venire and jury process—Variance.—In Codrington v. Lloyd (8 A. & E. 449), the omission of the tam quærendum clause in the jury process was held to be irregularity, for which the issue and notice of trial were set aside; but in Wood v. Peyton (4 Law T. 117), after trial, the Court of Exchequer refused to set aside the trial, leaving the defendant to bring a writ of error coram nobis.

SHERIFF.

Bound by admission of under-sheriff.—The rule as to the effect of admission by the under-sheriff in binding the sheriff, was laid down in Snowball v. Goodricke (4 B. & Ad. 451) to be, that an under-sheriff is not competent to charge the sheriff by his declarations, unless they accompany some official act, or unless they tend to charge himself, he being in truth the real party in the cause. Such an official admission is an answer to an inquiry as to who is in possession of the goods seized (Cheston v. Gibbs (4 Law T. 115).

Liability for neglecting to arrest.—The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98, s. 31, has taken away the right of bringing debt on an escape against the sheriff, and he is now liable only to an action upon the case for damages sustained by the execution creditor. It appears, however, that actual damage is not necessary, but that the plaintiff will be entitled to nominal damages, although the jury negative actual damage. (Clifton v. Hooper and Another, 4 Law T. 92; 8 Jur. 958.) This is in accordance with the principle established by Marzetti v. Williams (1 B. & Ad. 415), and Blofeld v. Payne (4 B. & Ad. 410), and Taylor v. Henniker (12 A. & E. 488), that in every case of legal injury the injured party has a legal right to damages.

TRESPASS.

Seduction.—The Court of Common Pleas has given judgment in Grinnell v. Wells (4 Law T. 173), after a delay which had excited the surprise of those cognizant of the case. The question was, whether the action for seduction would be maintained by the father without any allegation in the declaration of loss of service, but, in lieu thereof, averments that the girl was poor, and maintaining herself by her own exertions, and that, in consequence of her being seduced and becoming pregnant, she was unable any longer to maintain herself, and that the plaintiff, her father, was thereupon forced and obliged to expend moneys for her maintenance, &c. &c. The judgment was arrested upon this declaration; the Court holding that no principle or decision authorized an action where there was no actual or constructive loss of service; and that the liability of the father to support the daughter, under the Poor Law statutes, was no ground of action. To hold the contrary, would have been to introduce numberless new actions, as the principle would apply to every case of beating of a servant, whether his services were lost or not; and upon this supposition, the beating of a son, of whatever advanced age, and although altogether emancipated from his father's family, would form a ground of action at the suit of the father, if called upon under the statute to maintain his son.

TROVER.

Right of assignee of pawnor.—We refer our readers to the argument and judgment in Franklin v. Neate, reported in this number of the Law Times, as an instructive case on this subject.

WILLS.

Execution of powers.—The general principle as to the execution of a power, as laid down by Lord Chief Baron Alexander, in Doe dem. Nowell v. Rooke (6 Bing. 475) is, that it is not executed unless by some reference to the power or authority, or to the property which is the subject of it, or unless the provision made by the person intrusted with the power would have been ineffectual—would have had nothing to operate upon, except it were considered as an execution of such power or authority. In accordance with this, the power in Doe dem. Caldecott v. Johnson (1 Law T. 172) was held not to be executed. There A, having a power by will to appoint certain real estate to the use of such child or children, in such shares, manner, and form and for such estates and interests therein, and subject to such payments, conditions, and limitations as he should direct, &c. by his will, without any reference to the power, devised all his real and personal estate whatever, whatsoever, and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind soever, to certain trustees, upon trust to apply the profits as follows.—one-third part to his wife during her life or widowhood, and the other two-third parts unto and for the benefit of his three children, equally. There was no evidence whether he had, or not, any real other property, upon which the devise could operate, except that which was the subject of the power. But this evidence ought to have been produced by the party who wished to establish the execution of the power; for where a party seeks by extrinsic circumstances to give an effect to an instrument, which, upon the face of it, it would not have, it is incumbent on him to prove the circumstances, though involving the proof of a negative; or, in the absence of such proof, the deed must have its natural effect and operation given to it, and no other.

The death of Mr. John Moore has caused a vacancy in two appointments, held by him in Doctors'-commons: one, the London seat in the Prerogative Registration, worth about 700*l.* a year, in the gift of the Rev. George and Robert Moore, sons of Archbishop Moore, the registrars of that court; the other, the registrar of the vicar general, in the gift of his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the value of 500*l.* a year. Rumour has already pointed to two relatives of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, the judge of the Prerogative Court, as the individuals to be appointed to these offices.—Kentish Observer.

JUDICIAL WAGGERIES.

(From the Examiner.)

Risu inepto res ineptior nulla est.

We recommend our friend Punch to take the Court of Privy Council in hand. The facetiousness of the tribunal is quite overpowering. The Lord Chancellor, in particular, will be so very, very funny.

In the Guernsey case, Mr. S. Wortley having to argue about a conference—

"The Lord Chancellor.—I remember attending some 'conferences' in Parliament which did not lead to much. (A laugh.)"

Mr. Roebuck having said that he answered a challenged question, our wag, the Chancellor, let fly again incontinently—

"The Lord Chancellor.—Ay, but the question is, have you a right to accept a challenge? (A laugh.)

"Mr. Roebuck observed, that he had been told by the learned counsel on the other side."

The Court was by this time tickled into such a merry mood by the Lord Chancellor, its first wag, that it was ready to laugh at any thing, as will be seen in this specimen of its cachinnatory powers—

"Mr. Roebuck.—The Royal Court have great power in that island, my Lords, and frighten everybody except the Governor. (A laugh.)

"The Lord Chancellor.—He does not appear easily frightened. (Laughter.)"

Excepting, should have been added, upon conspiracies to celebrate the Queen's birth-days by shooting him. But this would have been no joke.

The fun of the Chancellor and hilarity of the Court were not yet exhausted.

Mr. Roebuck having noticed the claim of members of the Royal Court to speak to the governor separately, each in his own right—

"The Lord Chancellor.—And as long as he likes. (A laugh.)"

People who want to laugh should clearly go to this real Court of Momus, instead of throwing away their money on theatres ostensibly representing farces, which are often very serious performances. There is the difference between the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the minor theatres of burlesque or farce between the real and the sham pig.

By the will of the late Colonel Olney, who died in 1836, the sum of 8,000*l.* is given to the corporation of Gloucester on the death of his wife, upon the condition that the council should, within ten years after the testator's demise, provide a suitable site for building some almshouses. Of the principal sum of 8,000*l.*, 1,300*l.* is to be spent in the erection, and 100*l.* in furnishing, leaving the interest of 6,600*l.* to support the establishment. The providing of a site has lately engaged the attention of the council, and in order that the poor may not lose the benefit of the bequest, some of the members have offered to subscribe towards the purchase of land for the building. It is curious, however, that the weekly allowances to the number of inmates, clothing, &c. prescribed by the testator, exceed in amount the interest of the money, so that it will probably be necessary to apply to the Court of Chancery for a new appropriation. The case offers a serviceable hint to benevolent individuals, either to see their bounty laid out properly during their lifetime, or to leave their wealth unclogged by conditions which may swallow up the principal portion in litigation.

Statistics of Shipping.—The National says:—"The effective force of the French commercial shipping, in 1843, amounted to 13,656 vessels of all sizes, measuring in all 599,707 tons. In 1842 it was composed of 13,408 vessels, of 589,517 tons; and in 1841, of 13,383 vessels, of 592,266 tons. To exhibit the more clearly the weakness of this portion of our naval force, we subjoin a statement of the commercial shipping of England. In 1843, the number of trading vessels of all kinds registered in the ports of that country amounted to 23,024, of 2,956,927 tons, of which 2,277,788 tons, for 17,473 vessels, belong to England; 481,670 tons, for 3,519 vessels to Scotland; and 198,460 tons, for 2,012 vessels, to Ireland. We ought to add, that in England, as in France, there exists a multitude of small vessels occupied in fishing, which are not included in the above calculation. In 1843, the number of such vessels in France amounted to 5,928, gauging only 41,401 tons, giving an average of about seven tons each."

Errata.—In the report of the appeal, Perry v. Gugy, in the Court of Privy Council, in our last week's impression, by an error of the printer, the word "Tutrix," the Canadian term for guardian—next friend (tutor)—is converted into "Testatrix," i.e. a deceased woman who has made and left a will. By this error the appellant in the suit, "Francis Ermatinger, widow of the late Francis Perry, deceased, as tutrix to her minor children," is made to appear as a deceased woman, who, of course, cannot sue, and the report is, by a repetition of the error, made unintelligible. The words "Mr. Gugy" are also, by a similar error, in one or two places, printed as "Mrs. Gugy."

A review of Mr. Sergeant Stephen's "New Commentaries on the Laws of England, from the text of Blackstone," is in type; but we have been compelled by press of matter, of more immediate interest, to postpone it.

THE LAW TIMES.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1844.

MR. BARON ALDERSON'S PROPOSAL.

Mr. Baron Alderson has availed himself of his charges to the grand juries of the Winter Assize upon the Western Circuit, to promulgate a scheme for which he exhibits a parental regard that proves it to be his own. Assuming the winter circuit to be a nuisance, and yet a necessary evil, according to existing arrangements of the legal year, he proposes to recast the terms and the assizes, so that the latter may be held twice in the year at equal, instead of, as now, at unequal periods. The learned Baron would hold one assize in January, and the other in July; postpone, or rather abolish Hilary Term, and extend Easter and Trinity Terms from March to the end of June, and lengthen Michaelmas Term, to Christmas.

But though this would remedy some of the evils, it would not meet them entirely. The prolongation of the assizes in each county, owing to increase of population, and consequent increase of business, leads to the conclusion that a third circuit will ere long be, if it be not already, unavoidable. As an amendment, therefore, it has been proposed that there should be three circuits in the year, for civil as well as criminal business, namely, in December, in April, and in August. The vacation to extend, as at present, from the close of the August circuit to the 2nd of November, and the Terms to be limited to three, occupying all the other intervals between the circuits.

This scheme has its advantages and disadvantages. Among the former, would be the facilitating of legal business, and probably the averting from the Profession the great degradation that threatens it in the shape of fifteen shilling local courts. The disadvantages lie in the inconvenience of three times incurring the expenses of circuit, and three times taking the Profession from their homes.

Again and again we repeat that the true remedy for Winter Circuits, small courts for breeding pettifoggers, Sheriffs' Courts, Quarter Sessions law, and Quarter Sessions justice, is to amend the existing Courts of Quarter Sessions by re-constituting them and enlarging their jurisdiction, giving to them the dignity of the superior courts with lawyer judges.

Thus, and thus only, can be attained all the objects sought by the change that is inevitable, and in no way could they be effected so easily, so certainly, with so little disturbance of existing arrangements, and so little of that change which in law is always to be deprecated, and which nothing but necessity will justify. When it is necessary, it should be done effectually, that it may be permanent.

THE CERTIFICATE DUTY.

A grievance was never yet redressed simply because it was a grievance: the aggrieved parties must complain, or nobody will believe them injured, and lustily too, or nobody will listen to them. Chancellors of the Exchequer are always afflicted with an official deafness and blindness. Like persons under the influence of mesmerism, their external senses are shut up; but their minds are wide awake; they are very clairvoyants; they can look into the future with wonderful accuracy, and prophesy the results of coming elections to a miracle. In this state they obey the will of the party that converges upon them the worst influences, and wrongs often denied are recognized in a moment, and redress long withheld conceded with a smile.

So will it be with the certificate duty. The Profession will have made but trifling progress toward their end, when they shall have done no more than exclaim in the Law Times, "What injustice! Right us, Mr. Goulburn!" Another step will be to petition Parliament, collectively and individually, as a Profession, as Law Societies, and each sending up his own prayer for relief from a wrong. But the goal is far distant yet, and there is a world of work to be endured in the winning of it. Petitions are somewhat out of favour now-a-days; they are no positive advantage, but their absence is always made the foundation of the argument so fallacious, but with a willing audience so effective, that the grievance cannot be great which excites no demand for redress.

Petitions, therefore, are necessary, but they must be followed by other operations more private and a thousand-fold more telling. Let petitions besiege the collective Parliament, but let the petitioners besiege the individual members of Parliament. Almost all the representatives of the people are dependent upon attorneys for their places. In their hands are lodged the fortunes of the election. Let them but be unanimous upon this matter of the certificate duty, and intimate the resolution of each, and all, to oppose any senator who should refuse to vote for the redress of their acknowledged grievances; and honourable members would straightway open their ears to argument; they would see and feel how harshly the Profession has been treated; virtuous indignation would fill their patriotic bosoms; speech would declare the lawyers' wrongs, and votes would redress them: Government will yield with an affectation of generosity to a power they dare not resist; the certificate duty will be abolished, and then the world will wonder how such an injustice was first inflicted, and by what philosophy it was so long endured.

We repeat that only by some such process as this can the repeal of the solicitors' Poll-Tax be carried. They have not numbers for a formal agitation, nor can they look for external aid or sympathy from a public only too glad to shift taxation from their own shoulders to any other class; and certainly not likely to be less selfish where the lawyers are the party concerned. They must look to themselves alone; and most true it is that "Heaven helps those who help themselves."

And to work well they must work with method; they have no surplus strength to throw away upon vain efforts; the forces scattered throughout the country must be concentrated, and applied in the most vulnerable quarters; for this there must be organization and subscription. The Law Societies throughout the country should forthwith appoint committees, and the Legal Association would be a central point from which instructions might be issued for simultaneous action, and its results directed to importuning the Government and going to the Parliament with humble petition, backed by stern resolutions to oppose any of its members who shall decline to do "Justice to the attorneys."

ADVERTISING ATTORNEYS.

A subscriber in Calcutta has sent us the following advertisement, taken from the Friend of India, a newspaper published at Serampore, bearing date July 4th, 1844.

We trust that Mr. Thomas Luxmoore Wilson, and such as may be inclined to follow his example, will learn from this that, even on the other side of the globe, professional malpractices will not pass undetected, and that they cannot hope to escape, even in those distant regions, exposure in the Law Times.

MR. THOMAS LUXMOORE WILSON, Solicitor and Conveyancer, No. 43, Bedford-row, Red Lion-square, London, begs to offer his services as Law Agent to the Profession and to residents in India generally, for the conduct of any legal proceedings in Great Britain in which they may be interested. Mr. Wilson's connections with India and with Indian authorities in England, with Dr. Horace Hayman Wilson in particular, give him peculiar advantages, which he engages to employ for the benefit of those who may honour him with their confidence. Reference may be made to Messrs. Colvin, Ainslie, Cowie, and Co.

We can assure colonial advertisers that there is not one of our colonies in which the Law Times is not read. They had better beware!

The following lithographed circular addressed to insolvents, was some time since exhibited in the Bankruptcy Court as the production of an attorney, who was then named, and whose name we possess, but which we are unwilling to publish until we can, beyond all question, prove it to be his. Perhaps some of our readers may be able to furnish us with that proof. If so, we shall be obliged by the communication.

LAWS OF FRANCE.

No. IV.

TRIBUNAL DE COMMERCE DE LA SEINE.

Can a foreign tradesman take proceedings, either personally or through his agents, for the piracy of his name and marks against a French tradesman?

A decree of the Court of Cassation, which was inserted in the Law Times (vol. 4, p. 83), has lent an additional interest to this question.

The Tribunal de Commerce of Paris, placing natives and foreigners under the same generous protection, admitted the claims of foreigners to the exclusive use of their name, and, not taking into consideration the counterfeits of French names so often practised in England, proclaimed that true and faithful justice ought to be rendered to foreigners who placed themselves under the protection of the French laws, in order to claim and obtain the same protection for French citizens residing abroad.

This doctrine was adopted by the Cour Royale of Paris in the affair of the Macassar Oil.

But the Court of Cassation was less lenient to foreigners, and would only allow them the rights which are reciprocally granted to Frenchmen by the treaties with the nation to which these foreigners belong. And, since no special treaty exists between England and France authorizing a civil action in reparation for commercial damages caused by the reciprocal use of names, and that moreover a foreigner cannot transmit to an agent in France a right which he himself cannot exercise, the Court annulled the judgment given in favour of Bouveret, agent of Rowland and Son, English manufacturers of the Macassar Oil.

The question has now again presented itself in the affair of Sanders's buttons, which has already appeared before the courts.

The preliminary facts are as follows:—

MM. Sanders and Son, of Bromsgrove, England, are manufacturers of buttons, known by the name of Sanders's buttons, and they have established a depôt at MM. Trélon and Langlais Souër's, Paris.

M. Letailleur, merchant at Paris, imported buttons from English manufactories, and sold them in France with wrappers ornamented with the arms of England, and the English marks employed by Sanders and Son.

Summoned for this counterfeit by MM. Trélon and Langlais Souer, he was condemned by a first judgment given the 31st March, 1841, by the Tribunal de Commerce of Paris, to change his labels and to suppress the name of Sanders and Son.

M. Letailleur accordingly effaced from his sign the arms of England, and the condemned indications, but retained the denomination of Sanders's buttons.

In consequence, a fresh action was brought against him by MM. Trélon and Langlais Souër, and the Tribunal de Commerce gave another judgment on the 31st January, 1842, which, considering the name of Sanders has become generic, and that M. Letailleur can employ it by indicating at the same time his own name and direction, to prevent confusion, ordains that in future Letailleur shall add to the words Sanders's buttons the following: at Letailleur's, rue Mauconseil, No. 18, under penalty of 500f. for each proved counterfeit.

In virtue of this judgment, MM. Trélon and Langlais Souër have made several seizures at M. Letailleur's, and have found that 913 gross of buttons put up for sale without the addition prescribed by the Court, and have summoned M. Letailleur for the payment of 456,500f. damages, reckoning 500f. per gross.

The advocate of M. Letailleur, in replying to the plaintiff's counsel, said:—

"My adversary has ingeniously succeeded in sheltering his cause under the appearance of bad faith and persistance in a counterfeit already condemned by several judgments and decrees. But a few words will suffice to explain all. It is wished to consecrate in France a privilege benefiting foreigners; it is wished to impose upon us a monopoly which does not exist in England, where the name of Sanders and Son has become public property, and where all tradespeople publicly and ostensibly sell Sanders's buttons.

"And it is a complete ruin that is exacted. It is a sum of 456,500f. for I know not how many pretended counterfeits, at the rate of 500f. for each gross of buttons seized! While he was about it, I really see not why my adversary might not have discovered a fraud in each button, and demanded of us a thousand millions; perhaps more!

"It is true that in 1841 M. Letailleur was a merchant in Paris. It is also true that he was most anxious to struggle against English inroads, which injure our trade and respect nothing. Sanders invented in England, twenty-five years ago, a peculiar kind of button. He took out a patent for them, which expired long since, and now Sanders's buttons are manufactured everywhere, for the name of the inventor has attached itself to the goods. M. Letailleur has only done what English tradespeople do in England, and what every one has a right to do in France. He has taken the name of Sanders to apply it to the same kind of button manufactured by himself.

"MM. Trélon and Langlais did not interfere until this unlucky judgment in the Macassar Oil affair upset the ideas of all the world, and opened their eyes. The result was the judgments of which my adversary now avails himself. The name of Sanders and Son was the difficult point, and the last judgment authorises us to sell Sanders's buttons, adding that they are sold by us.

"We have submitted to this judgment; we have had bags made with our direction; but what is the consequence? Our buttons no longer find customers. We sell by wholesale to retail tradespeople, who would no longer buy our bags, because when the name of the manufacturer is found on the goods, purchasers buy them at the manufactory in preference to the retailer. Thus it is why the manufacturer's name is the retailer's secret.

"In consequence, therefore, of the judgment which prevented M. Letailleur selling his Sanders's buttons without adding his address, and of the impossibility of selling them with this address, M. Letailleur took the only alternative which remained for him. He has renounced the fabrication of Sanders's buttons, and since the month of July 1842 he has imported the buttons from the house of Somerville, London, with the bags manufactured in England and English labels. The Court shall be informed how these importations were effected.

"And, first, am I pleading against English or French tradespeople? The assignment was given me in the name of Sanders and Son, and of Trélon and Langlais Souër. In your pleading, the Englishmen have disappeared from the case, and you have appeared for Trélon and Langlais. We are French merchants, licensed; we form a society. True; but you sell English goods. Your warehouse has two compartments; in the one you sell French goods; in the other, English goods. France and England are separated by a partition. I respect your rights as French manufacturers, but as the representatives of Sanders and Son, as their agents, you have no right in France. An English tradesperson has not the right of action before our courts against a French tradesperson; and not having the right of action, he could not transmit to you a right he does not possess. I am perfectly aware of the unfavourable appearance the system I maintain may seem to wear at first sight; it would, undoubtedly, be better to respect a foreigner's property, but it could only be conditionally that he respected ours, according to the rules of reciprocity. But this reciprocity does not exist.

"At a period when noble and generous ideas reigned in France, the Constituent Assembly wished to grant to foreigners all the rights of property. The Assembly believed that its generosity would be imitated by foreign nations,—it had relied upon reciprocity, it had reckoned without the English. They came to France to claim the rights which were so liberally granted them, but refused to grant similar rights at home to foreigners. Then free and loyal competition became impossible with us. The Civil Code has restored the equilibrium by stating in Art 11 that the foreigner shall enjoy in France the same civil rights as those which are or shall be granted to Frenchmen by the treaties with the nation to which the foreigner may belong. The principle of reciprocity—the principle of supreme justice—has thus been re-established.

"France, more than any other country, complains of counterfeits. England imitates our productions, takes the name of our manufacturers, and copies their marks and labels to the extent that the imitation of foreign labels is a public and avowed trade in England. There is even a commercial house whose business it is to counterfeit foreign marks. The Court is requested to look at these prospectuses which I have to shew, drawn up by English merchants, who offer to the public the marks of all the manufacturers of Europe, and particularly of France. The names of all our most celebrated manufacturers are inserted; and if I appeal to the English authorities complaining of this usurpation,—if I apply to the laws of the country, saying, the name of a merchant is his principal and most precious property,—if I tell them that honour and integrity belong to all countries, I shall be unmercifully repulsed, I shall be expelled the Court because I am not an Englishman.

"If I am not listened to in England, an Englishman ought not to be listened to in France. Such are the true principles of reciprocity. If you wish to obtain international conventions which will allow property to be respected in all countries, do not shew yourselves foolishly generous, suffer the French trade to be at war with the English trade; it is the only way to arrive at reciprocity.

"Can our legislation protect the English? It is evident that it cannot. One single law might be appealed to; the law of the 22nd Germinal, year 11. But this law requires of the manufacturer the deposit of his mark in the capital to which his manufactory belongs,—and this is impossible for a foreigner.

"All the mischief has arisen from the judgment given in the Macassar oil affair. The situation of the parties was the same; M. Bouveret, consignee of the goods of Rowland and Son, summoned several perfumers who manufactured and sold Macassar oil with the wrappers of Rowland and Son. The Court of Cassation, applying the true principle of reciprocity, annulled the decree of the Cour Royale, which had confirmed the judgment. The Court of Cassation founded its judgment upon Art. 11 of the Civil Code, and upon the principle that Rowland and Son had not been able to transmit to Bouveret rights which they did not themselves possess."

THE JUDGMENT.

"Inasmuch as the question is to ascertain if B. Sanders and Son, or their consignees, Trélon and Langlais, can validly bring an action in France to prohibit the conterfeit of the marks of B. Sanders and Son:

"Inasmuch as the name of Sanders has become the distinguishing sign of a kind of button, the manufacture of which has now become public; that the bags bearing the name of Sanders are publicly sold in England without any opposition on the part of Sanders and Son:

"That the wrapper of Letailleur and Robert is similar to that which circulates freely in England:

"That B. Sanders and Son, or their consignees, cannot therefore, in justice, prohibit the use of it in France:

"Inasmuch as, moreover, that B. Sanders and Son and Trélon and Langlais Souer have not the right to oppose the use of these marks:

"That in fact B. Sanders and Son are foreigners:

"That Trélon and Langlais Souer, in depositing at the register of the court these manufacturers' marks, after having added the initials of their own commercial house, have not been able to transform the foreign mark of Sanders and Son into the mark of a French manufactory, and thus in virtue of that mark obtain the privileges of a French manufacturer:

"That it is expedient, therefore, to apply the clauses of the law which refer to the property of foreign manufacturers' marks:

"Inasmuch as the laws of the 22nd Germinal, year 11, and of the 28th of July, 1824, grant to French manufacturers only the right of proceeding against the counterfeit of their marks before the French courts; that, according to Articles 11 and 13 of the Civil Code, a foreigner not domiciled in France only enjoys the civil rights granted to Frenchmen by the treaties with the nation to which he belongs:

"Inasmuch as B. Sanders and Son were not domiciled in France, that no treaty allows French manufacturers the right of proceeding against the counterfeit of their marks in England; that one cannot, therefore, without positively violating the law, admit to B. Sanders and Son, or to Trélon and Langlais Souër, their representatives, an action against the counterfeiters of Sanders's mark:

"That the severe application of these principles of the law does not insure impunity to fraud, since it is always in the power of the purchaser deceived upon the origin of the goods he buys, and of the public ministry, to proceed against the counterfeiter, in virtue of Art. 423 of the Penal Code, and to require the suppression of the fraud, and a reparation of the detriment occasioned by it:

"That accordingly, in equity and in right, Letailleur and Robert ought to be allowed to sell in France bags of buttons with a label bearing the name of Sanders, and similar to those they have produced in their suit:

"For these reasons, the Court

"Rejects the claims of Trélon and Langlais Souer against Letailleur, Laurent, and Alger;

"Does not admit their demands and conclusions;

"Condemns Trélon and Langlais Souer, and Sanders and Son to all the costs."

This trial was complicated with other questions, which we have omitted as being unconnected with the rights of foreigners. In this case, you may observe, the Tribunal de Commerce of Paris has adopted the opinion of the Court of Cassation, and if this is to become the recognized law in France, it would be most essential for the two governments to enter into a treaty for the purpose of reciprocally insuring to their subjects the property of their labels and marks.

LECTURES ON MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

By Alfred S. Taylor.

Delivered at Guy's Hospital, 1844.

Lecture VI.

We have now to consider the processes for the induction of nitric acid. Cases of poisoning by nitric acid are very unfrequent, and it would appear from a table that has been drawn up, and to which I have before adverted, that there were only two cases of poisoning by this substance tried in England and Wales for the years 1837-8. Still it is sometimes employed for the purposes of murder, and other illegal objects; and therefore it is proper to consider the processes necessary for its induction. Either in the concentrated or the diluted state, nitric acid is very much used in commerce, and is sold under the name of aquafortis. With regard to its properties, it is of a red-yellowish colour, and gives off acid fumes; and it is highly acid, and gives a deep yellow colour to any organic substance with which it comes in contact. The best test for it is copper-cuttings, and when boiled with this metal there is almost instantaneously a violent reaction produced, the liquid acquires a greenish colour, and red fumes are given off. It is thus distinguished from sulphuric acid and muriatic acid, with which there is no such re-action. Tin will answer the purpose of detecting this acid; but it is also useful in another way, namely, it enables us to distinguish the very strong acid from the comparatively weak form of it. If you pour a small quantity of the ordinary nitric acid on some tin filings, in the course of a very short time there is a decided action, and red vapour is given off in very great abundance. This is a very useful test to enable us to distinguish the weak from the powerful acid, because we find that the most powerful acid does not so easily decompose the metal; and this is owing to its being so extremely strong as to require water to bring the acid freely into contact with the tin; therefore, by lowering its strength to the acid of commerce, the decomposition will ensue. We learn by this that the very strong acid is known by its having no effect upon tin, and this experiment sufficiently shews us that it is really the nitric acid in the strong state. Now, suppose we have before us the diluted nitric acid; the copper test entirely fails in general, but we may, however, get very slight reaction; the liquid will become blue from the partial decomposition, and on boiling it there will be faint red fumes given off. The first test to employ for the induction of diluted nitric acid, and perhaps one of the best, is the sulphate of indigo. It is found by experiment, that when nitric acid in the diluted state is coloured with sulphate of indigo, and boiled, the colour is discharged. This does not happen with muriatic acid, or with sulphuric acid; this, therefore, is a very useful test for distinguishing nitric acid from the other two acids; but it is not a very delicate one. Then we observe, further, with regard to this acid, that it should not be precipitated by the nitrate of barytes, or nitrate of silver. These are negative experiments, and shew us that we cannot mistake this acid for sulphuric acid or muriatic acid. Another character which distinguishes nitric acid is this; that it turns organic matters yellow. If you make a streak on a piece of white paper with diluted nitric acid, and a streak with diluted sulphuric acid, you will find on heating the paper that the nitric acid turns it yellow, and the sulphuric acid turns it black; in short, nitric acid does not possess the power of carbonizing organic matter at a low temperature, like sulphuric acid. This is a very important point to be attended to on the examination of articles of dress of a white colour, because sulphuric acid, even in the most diluted state, perfectly carbonizes the substance when the stuff on which it has fallen is gently heated; whilst nitric acid merely gives to it a yellowish tinge. The tests for diluted nitric acid are not very conclusive; but the best way to test it, when in very small quantities, is to convert it to nitrate of potash. This is done easily by taking a small quantity of diluted nitric acid, and adding to it a solution of carbonate of potash. In this way you get the nitric acid fixed in the state of nitre, or nitrate of potash, and in this state you may test it by dipping a piece of paper in the liquid and drying it, when you will find on ignition that it burns with deflagration. Further, if we add a small quantity of muriatic acid, and a small portion of gold leaf to the solution, and boil it, the gold will be dissolved. This is a strong proof of the presence of nitric acid. If you take some of the nitrate in the pure condition, and add to this a few particles of gold leaf and boil the liquid, there will be no effect; but if, on its boiling, you add a small quantity of muriatic acid the gold leaf will be instantly dissolved. The liquid acquires a slight yellow colour, and that is the clearest proof that there is some nitrate present. In order to find out whether any portion of gold has been dissolved, we may add a little protochloride of tin to it. Another very beautiful method of detecting a nitrate, or nitric acid, is by decomposing it through the medium of metallic copper and sulphuric acid. By evaporating the solution of nitrate of potash we obtain crystals, which are known to be those of nitric from their prismatic character; if these crystals be broken up, and put into a tube with a few copper turnings, a few drops of distilled water, and strong sulphuric acid, the nitric acid is set free by the action of the sulphuric acid; and as soon as the nitric acid comes in contact with the copper, the red fumes of nitrous acid are evolved; and this furnishes us with a very good proof that nitric acid is present. The fiftieth or the sixtieth part of a grain of nitre may thus be detected in a small tube. Other tests for the nitric acid in nitre have been proposed, and among them that of adding sulphuric acid to a mixture of morphia and the salt; but this is an uncertain test. Another test adopted by Orifila is the sulphate of narcotine; but it is inferior to the experiment with copper and sulphuric acid. We must now consider the method of analysis for nitric acid, when mixed with organic liquids: for instance the contents of the stomach. We shall generally find it in all the corroded parts of the œsophagus and the stomach, and the appearances presented under these circumstances is very characteristic. But let us suppose that we do not find any nitric acid in the contents of the stomach; we should then cut off portions of the corroded stomach, and operate upon them. I ought to observe, that in those cases where the stomach is perforated the liquids will be found in the pelvis, where we must look for them; and, in a case of this kind, the cause of the liquids being there found is obviously due to the position of the body. Now, suppose we have to assist, by a chemical analysis, in the investigation of an attempt made to administer this poison to a person, the point for our consideration will be—How are we to detect it? You must first try whether the substance presented to us for analysis possesses any acid reaction; if you find it does, then, supposing it to be nitric acid, you convert it into nitrate of potash, and evaporate the liquid to crystallization. Should there be any difficulty in getting rid of the organic matter, you must digest the crystals in alcohol, and then you get it in the pure state. Nevertheless, a small quantity of organic matter does not interfere with the demonstration of its presence. It is not our object to get all the nitre, and if from five drops of the liquid we can prove nitric acid to be present, that is all which is commonly required. It is, however, difficult to detect it in very small quantities in organic liquids. Nitric acid may be thrown on the person, and in this way it is very injurious. For the detection of the acid in such cases, it may be necessary to test the clothes or the skin of the person on whom it has been maliciously thrown. Nitric acid, when poured on black cloth, produces a yellow tinge, which remains; in this respect it differs from sulphuric acid and muriatic acid, which produce red stains. Nitric acid, being volatile, very soon passes off, and the cloth dries to a greenish brown colour. In order to find out whether nitric acid be present or not, we should take a portion of the cloth, that part most deeply coloured, and introduce it into a test-tube with water; but if the stains disappear, which they commonly do, after six or eight weeks, it will be impossible to detect the presence of the acid, more especially if there has been any washing. But, supposing the stains to be recent, we then place a portion of the cloth stained in a test-tube, in a small quantity of warm distilled water; the acid will then be extracted, and the liquid will present most of the characters that belong to nitric acid in a very diluted state. It may be tested in the usual way, by sulphate of indigo, or gold leaf. In order to determine the quantity present in organic mixtures, it is necessary to convert the nitric acid contained in a measured quantity of the liquid to nitre, which is then to be converted to sulphate of potash, and dried and weighed; then calcine the residue, and for every one hundred grains of dry sulphate of potash we may estimate that there were present in the measured quantity of the liquid eighty-two grains of nitric acid.

With regard to muriatic acid it is not commonly used for the purpose of poisoning. In 1837-8, there were no cases of poisoning by this acid, and for a period of thirteen years there appear accounts of only three cases of poisoning by it in this metropolis. The commercial acid is of a yellow or lemon greenish colour, and is commonly called spirits of salt. It is not commonly so concentrated as to possess the property of fuming in the air, a property which, of course, depends on the strength of the acid, and therefore its presence is very uncertain. It is highly acid, and tinges organic substances of a yellow colour, and corrodes them. With regard to the test for it, the best is to boil it with black oxide of manganese, and then chlorine is given off, which, by its colour, odour, and bleaching properties on vegetable colours, is easily distinguished. This acid may be tested in another way; e. g. if it be moderately pure, it may be boiled entirely away on mercury without being affected by the metal. Another test also is this, that when mixed with nitric acid it dissolves gold leaf. This acid may be found in the diluted state, and in this state we do not get any chlorine by boiling it with oxide of manganese. There is only one test required for it in the diluted state, and that is nitrate of silver, which gives a dense white precipitate with a very small quantity of the muriatic acid. The diluted muriatic acid possesses the property of being insoluble in strong nitric acid. Oxalic and prussic acid also give white precipitates with nitrate of silver, and in this respect they resemble the muriatic.

This precipitate is also soluble in ammonia, in which respect it differs from that formed by iodic acid, which also gives a dense white precipitate with nitrate of silver. Another property which chloride of silver possesses is, that when heated on platina or glass it melts like a resin, but it is not volatile. The precipitate found by prussic acid (cyanide of silver) is known by its giving out cyanogen when heated. Again, if we mix acetic, tartaric, or citric acid with common salt we have the same precipitate as that produced by muriatic acid only, and the presence of some free acid might lead to difficulty. When a suspicion of this kind arises, the difficulty thus created may easily be removed by evaporation; if we take equal portions of the acid liquid, and precipitate one portion entirely by nitrate of silver, and then evaporate the other portion to dryness, dissolving the dry salt in water, and precipitating the solution entirely by the same test, if there be no free muriatic present the precipitated chloride will have the same weight in the two cases; but if there be free muriatic acid present in the liquid, then the precipitate obtained in the former case, i. e. before evaporation, will exceed in weight that obtained in the latter.

With regard to the detection of muriatic acid in organic liquids, there are two processes; one is by distillation, and the other by the conversion of the acid contained in the liquid into a fixed salt. Most organic liquids give a precipitate with nitrate of silver, whether muriatic acid be present or not. This is owing, either to the presence of soluble chlorides (salt) in most organic liquids, or to oxide of silver being itself precipitated by certain organic principles. It must be remembered that muriatic acid is very volatile, and in analysing the contents of the stomach, if they be clear, then we may have a very clear solution. In giving evidence upon the presence of muriatic acid in the contents of the stomach, in a supposed case of poisoning by it, a medical witness may be asked whether the natural secretions of the stomach do not owe their acidity to the presence of free muriatic acid? It is true the muriatic acid exists in the gastric juice in the stomachs of all animals, though the quantity is very small, not exceeding the 1,000th-part by weight, or five grains in sixteen ounces. This would suffice to give only a very feeble acidity, and whether we get the effect looked for will depend on some greater portions of free muriatic acid in the solution. If common salt is present, muriatic acid will come over by distillation. If the acid is employed for the purpose of poisoning, there will be evidence of its action on the œsophagus, the throat, and the alimentary canal, and therefore it is from an examination of the body, and noticing the post mortem changes, which are produced, that a medical jurist must form an opinion. There is one remarkable fact, that seems to set aside this examination; that muriatic acid has never yet been detected in the body in the few cases of poisoning by it, which are recorded. The reason of this is, that the whole, or the greater part, of the acid may have been rendered neutral by the antidotal treatment. Nevertheless it is an acid which is very easily separated and detected, as for example, by neutralizing it by carbonate of soda,—converting it to chloride of sodium, and then testing it in the usual way. In order to ascertain the quantity of poison present, the best way is to precipitate a measured quantity of the liquid by nitrate of silver, then boil the chloride of silver in strong nitric acid, and from the weight of the precipitate it is easy to calculate the quantity of acid that must have been present. For every 100 grains the dry chloride of silver represents, we may allow sixty-nine grains of liquid muriatic acid.

Muriatic acid is sometimes thrown upon articles of clothing, and also upon the persons of individuals. When thrown upon cloth it produces a red colour, which becomes a bright red in the course of an hour, and in four or five days it turns to a deep red brown. It is easy to detect muriatic acid thrown upon articles of clothing soon after its action has commenced. If that portion of the dress on which the stain appears be digested in warm water, a highly acid liquid may be obtained on filtration, which will yield with nitrate of silver or white precipitate, possessing all the properties of chloride of silver. As muriatic acid is a very volatile acid, there cannot be much hope of detecting it, supposing four or five weeks to have elapsed, as by the end of that time it commonly disappears.

Mineral acids are taken sometimes in a compound or mixed state; as, for example, nitric muriatic acid, or aqua regia. This acid is of a deep yellow, or red colour, and is intensely acid. It is known from either of the two acids, of which it is composed, by its immediately dissolving leaf-gold, by the aid of a gentle heat. It also discolours indigo; and by boiling evolves chlorine gas. Another liquid which sometimes has caused death is nitro-sulphuric acid, or, as it is called, aqua regina. There is only one case of death caused by this compound recorded. It was that of a young man who swallowed a mixture containing one ounce of nitric acid and two drachmas of sulphuric acid. It was attended with the usual symptoms, and he died in eight hours. The two acids may be separated by carbonate of barytes. The nitric acid may be detected in that portion of the salt which is dissolved while the sulphuric acid may be detected in the insoluble precipitate of sulphate of barytes formed. The process is the same as that already described in speaking of the analysis of sulphuric acid.

Best on Presumptions of Law and Fact.

Antecedent preparations and previous attempts, and the presumptions thence arising, are next considered. Some curious instances of this are recorded.

Of all species of preparations, those which are resorted to for the purpose of averting suspicion require the most particular notice. A remarkable instance is presented in the case of Richard Patch, who was convicted and executed in 1806, for the murder of his patron and friend Isaac Blight. The prisoner and deceased lived in the same house, and the latter was one evening shot while sitting in his parlour, by a pistol from an unseen hand. A strong and well-connected chain of circumstantial evidence fixed Patch as the murderer, in the course of which it appeared, that, a few evenings before that on which the murder was committed, and while the deceased was away from home, a loaded gun or pistol had been discharged into the same room. This shot the prisoner represented at the time as fired at him; but there were strong grounds for believing that it must have been done by himself, in order to avert suspicion and induce the deceased and his servants to suppose that assassins were prowling about the building. (a) It has been remarked, that murderers, especially in the lower walks of life, are frequently found busy for some time previous to the act, in throwing out dark hints, spreading rumours, or uttering prophecies relative to the impending fate of their intended victims (b). As, for instance, a man meditating the murder of his wife was heard to say, "My wife is a queer body; I should not be at all surprised if she were to take herself off some fine morning." In the case of Susannah Holroyd, who was convicted at the Lancaster Assizes of 1816, for the murder of her husband, her son, and the child of another person; about a month before committing the crime the prisoner told the mother of the child that she had had her fortune read, and that within six weeks three funerals would go from her door, namely, that of her husband, her son, and of the child of the person whom she was then addressing. (c) So, where the death of a young man of fortune was resolved on, the mind of the neighbourhood was prepared for the event by reports that his health was rendered desperate by his own imprudence, which was daily accumulating causes upon causes to accelerate his end. (d)

As to the presumption arising from declarations of intention and threats, they must be subject to the following doubts. Words may be misunderstood or misremembered; or uttered through bravado; or by the agency of a third party.

The presumption of guilt from silence under accusation, evasive or false answers, and suppression of evidence are very slight, and so are those proceeding from attempts to evade justice. Indications of fear and consciousness on the part of the accused are of still less value.

Mr. Best then reviews with masterly ability the entire subject of confessions, pointing out both the law and the rationale of that dangerous species of proof.

In conclusion, the author adverts to some practical defects in the administration of justice where the evidence is of a presumptive nature.

First, he considers that too much weight is attached to a supposed power on the part of the accused of explaining circumstances, forgetful that he cannot be a witness for himself, and he is commonly too poor to pay other witnesses.

Secondly, he thinks that the rule that forbids a man to criminate himself has been carried too far.

Thirdly, witnesses to character are too indulgently treated.

Fourthly, the public press often exercises a most mischievous influence, and in the following remarks we cordially agree with him.

But the pure administration of justice does not depend wholly on the practice of tribunals—its stream, and even its source, may be poisoned by malpractices as well as by mistaken notions elsewhere. Among the former of these, it will only be necessary to notice one of the most formidable, namely, misconduct in the public press. When facts have come to light, indicating the commission of some offence peculiar or atrocious in its character, the press of this country has too often forgotten the honourable position it ought to occupy, and the fearful responsibility consequent on the abuse of its power. Under a horror, real or affected, of the crime, but more probably with the view of pandering to excited curiosity and morbid feelings in the public, a course is taken calculated to deprive the unfortunate person suspected of all chance of a fair trial. For weeks or months previous to it, his conduct and character are made the continual subject of discussion in the public prints, and, through their influence, everywhere else. Circumstantial descriptions of the mode in which the crime was committed, and in some cases actual delineations of it, with the accused represented in the very act,—elaborate histories of his past life, in which he is frequently spoken of as guilty of crimes innumerable,—minute accounts of his conduct in the retirement of his cell, and when under examination,—and, lastly, expressions of rage and wonder that he has had the audacity not to confess his guilt, are daily and hourly poured forth. In one case, matters were carried so far, that, while certain parties were awaiting their trial for murder, the whole scene of the murder, of which, of course, they were assumed to be the perpetrators, was dramatized, and represented on the stage to a metropolitan audience.(e) The necessary consequence is, that a firm belief of the guilt of the accused is silently and imperceptibly worked into the minds of the better portion of society, while those of the rest are inflamed to the highest pitch of excitement and exasperation against him. In the midst of all this he is brought to trial, which, under such circumstances, can be little better than a mockery. The judge and jury who sit in judgment on such a man are not looked on, perhaps even by themselves, as individuals chosen to investigate calmly the guilt or innocence of the accused—they are rather expected to be the formal registrars of a verdict of guilty, already unjustly and iniquitously given against him by society, before he was heard in his defence.

(e) Trial of John Thurtell and Joseph Hunt for the murder of William Weare, London, 1824. Weare was murdered on the 17th October, 1823; the play was represented at the Surrey Theatre on the 17th November in the same year; and Thurtell and Hunt were tried on the 7th January, 1824. It also appeared that, before the trial, prints delineating the murder were published in the newspapers. Notwithstanding that all this, with many other circumstances equally unjust and disgusting, were brought before the judge of assize by affidavit, an application to postpone the trial until the next assizes was refused. A more just course was taken by Parke, and Alderson, B B. in the recent case of R. v. Archibald Bolam (2 M. & Rob. 192), who was indicted at the Spring Assizes of 1839 for the murder of John Millie. These learned judges then made the precedent (well deserving imitation) of postponing the trial until the next assizes, on an affidavit made by the prisoner's attorney, that the prejudice and excitement raised against the prisoner, chiefly by the local newspapers, was so strong, that an impartial trial could not reasonably be expected. This conduct was the more creditable, as few cases have presented a more mysterious aspect, or required more careful consideration than that of Bolam. He was afterwards found guilty of manslaughter.

We now take leave of Mr. Best with great respect for the legal and logical acumen which he has exhibited in this treatise. He has proved himself one of the very few scientific lawyers our age can boast.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Tuesday, Dec. 11.

BOOTH v. CRESWICK.

Costs of a mortgagee in defending the mortgagor's title impeached.

This cause, which had several times been spoken to upon the minutes of the decree with reference to certain costs incurred by the plaintiff, the mortgagor, as a defendant in the suit of James v. Creswicke, and in a suit of Creswicke v. Booth, which the defendant had instituted to set aside the plaintiff's securities for fraud. The last suit was still pending at the Rolls. The minutes were now to be disposed of.

Wakefield and Beale, for the plaintiff, contended that the costs were incurred in defending the title to the mortgaged property; and that where the mortgagor's title is impeached, it is quite of course that the mortgagor should be paid those costs before he is redeemed.

Stuart and Parry, for the defendant, insisted that there was nothing upon the record in this court to sanction the allowance of the costs in James v. Creswicke in this cause. By the decree, admitting the defendant to a rehearing of the cause after a decree absolute for a foreclosure, it was ordered that the defendant should, upon the rehearing, be liable to pay such further costs as it should then appear to be just that the defendant should pay. That order had reference only to the further costs which might be incurred in working out the suit, not the costs in other suits of which there is no notice upon this record. The Court reserved to itself a discretion as to further costs, but that was a judicial discretion in reference to the matter upon which and the shape in which it had to adjudge. The suit of James v. Creswicke was dismissed with costs, and the pretence made by the plaintiff is, that James is unable to pay costs—in fact, that he is insolvent. But there is nothing to prove that; he has taken no proceedings against James, who is primarily liable. The decree of dismissal in that suit was so long ago as in 1837.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I cannot entertain the question of James's insolvency without evidence.

Stuart.—The Court has not now before it the materials for exercising a sound discretion as to these costs; and even if it had such materials, such hard terms would not be imposed upon the defendant.

Wakefield, in reply.—In the suit of Jones v. Creswicke, a balance was paid into court, and to which the plaintiff was entitled, subject to a prior charge in favour of Sevier. Now Sevier had also been a defendant in the case of James v. Creswicke, and he was allowed his costs in that suit out of that balance. The petition upon which the plaintiff afterwards obtained that balance out of court, states the order of payment to Sevier of his costs in James v. Creswicke, that petition was served upon Creswicke, and yet it was alleged there was no evidence. Sevier was allowed his costs in James v. Creswicke, upon the express ground that James was unable to pay them.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The defendant was let in to have the cause reheard upon certain terms; those terms were, that he should pay all the costs subsequent to the decree nisi, and such further costs upon the rehearing I should think just. I meant to retain a large discretion. The case upon the whole of its circumstances was so complicated that I determined to reserve to myself a large discretion, to do that which upon the hearing would appear to be right. It was a large indulgence that was given to the defendant. Other parties having charges upon the mortgaged estate were awarded their costs in the suit of James v. Creswicke, and I think the plaintiff is also entitled to have his costs in arrear in that suit. His costs, charges, and expenses are to be allowed. The defendant must dismiss his suit at the Rolls. There will be no costs on either side on this application.

GREAT NORTH OF ENGLAND JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY v. The CLARENCE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Construction of powers given to a railway company by Act of Parliament—Injunction—Legal question—Case for opinion of Court of law—Interim injunction—Easement.

Where one party claims an easement which he has never actually enjoyed, over land of another party, no injunction will be granted, the effect of which would be to give the claimant possession of the right claimed, until that right, which is a mere legal question, has been decided at law.

The plaintiffs had obtained an Act of Parliament, 1 Vict. authorizing them to make a railway to connect the Great North of England, Clarence, and Hartlepool railways, in the county of Durham, and for that purpose it was necessary to cross a branch of the Clarence railway. By a clause in the above Act of Parliament, the company were forbidden to take the land of any persons or corporations, for the purposes of the railway, without their consent, and the Act only empowered a line to be made across other railways upon a level. The Clarence company refused to permit the plaintiffs to cross that line. Another Act of 6 & 7 Vict. was afterwards passed, which directed that the plaintiffs' line should be carried over the Clarence railway by means of a bridge instead of on a level, and that the consent of the Clarence railway company should not be requisite. And it was enacted, that for the purpose of carrying the plaintiff's railway over the Clarence line they were to construct a sufficient bridge over the line, and the width of the bridge between the abutments should not be less than twenty-six feet at right angles with the Clarence line, and that no part of the underside of the soffit of the bridge should come within sixteen feet of the surface of the rails; and it was provided that the bridge should be constructed of such materials, and in such manner, as should be agreed upon between the plaintiff's engineer and the engineer of the Clarence Company, and in case the engineer of the Clarence Company should not, within three weeks after the plaintiff's engineer should have submitted to him a plan of the proposed bridge, signify in writing his assent thereto, then the materials of which, and the manner in which the bridge should be constructed, should be referred to the surveyor of bridges for the county of Durham for the time being, whose decision should be final and binding upon all parties.

Much litigation had taken place between parties previously to passing the last mentioned Act, which had resulted in the decision that the plaintiffs could not cross the defendants' line without their consent, and such consent was withheld. The second Act having been passed, the plaintiffs proceeded to act under it, and on the 25th of September, 1843, Mr. Robinson, the engineer of the plaintiffs' railway, gave notice to the defendants' engineer, Mr. Child, of the plaintiffs' intention to construct a bridge, and furnished him with a plan of the intended bridge. On the 27th of September, Child returned an answer to Robinson, stating that he should require the arch of the bridge to be constructed of brick or stone, but made no other objection to the plan or to the bridge. Robinson not acceding to Child's alterations, the county surveyor, Mr. Benomi, was called in, who on the 23rd of November made his award as to the way in which the bridge should be constructed. By the plan so settled the buttresses of the bridge would have rested upon the slips or sides of the Clarence Railway; and the plaintiffs having made a contract for the erection of the bridge, sent workmen upon the Clarence line for that purpose, when the defendants assembled a great body of their own workmen, and drove off, by force, the plaintiffs' workmen. The plaintiffs then desisted from further attempts, and placed the matter in the hands of Mr. Bower, their solicitor in London. The defendants also placed the matter in the hands of their solicitor, Mr. Bell, and various discussions and communications took place between the solicitors and between the plaintiffs' solicitor and the directors of the Clarence Railway, who objected that the Acts gave no power to the plaintiffs to place their buttresses upon the land of the Clarence Company; and on the 27th of February, 1844, Mr. Bower, the plaintiffs' solicitor, received a letter from Mr. Bell, the solicitor of the defendants, in which he, on behalf of the Clarence Company, gave notice that they repudiated the award of Mr. Bonomi, and that if the plaintiffs entered upon the land of the Clarence Company they would be deemed trespassers; and that their plan was "irregular, void, and unjustifiable." The plaintiffs submitted to that view of their powers under these Acts, and entered into a treaty with Mr. Williams, who owned the land adjoining the Clarence line, for the purchase of land for placing the buttresses of their intended bridge. This treaty was not concluded until May, when the plaintiffs gave notice to the defendants that the plan of Mr. Bonomi, and the proceedings thereupon, would be abandoned as of no effect; and that their engineer, Mr. Robinson, would, on a day therein named, deliver a plan, and if the Clarence Company did not assent to that plan that the plaintiffs would refer it to Mr. Bonomi, the county surveyor of bridges, pursuant to their Acts of Parliament. The Clarence Company took no steps in accordance with that notice, and the plaintiffs, after the expiration of the three weeks, served a second notice on the Clarence Company, informing them that on a certain day Mr. Bonomi would attend on the spot to determine on the plan. The defendants then ran up a high brick wall, which just extended so far as the land purchased by the plaintiffs. On the 21st of July Mr. Bonomi made his second award; but in the previous May the defendants gave notice that they would resist any attempt on the part of the plaintiffs to construct a bridge at all; and, on the 2nd of Sept. 1844, the defendants filed a bill to restrain the plaintiffs from making a bridge across the Clarence line, insisting that Bonomi's functions, under the Act, were discharged when he had made the first award, and that he had no authority to make the second. That the plaintiffs, having abandoned the first award, had no right to begin de novo, and that their power under the Act to make a bridge was altogether gone. The second plan did not propose to place buttresses upon the land of the Clarence Company.

Vice-Chancellor KNIGHT BRUCE declined to grant the injunction the defendants had prayed by their bill, but directed a case to be stated for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer upon two questions; 1st, Whether the plaintiffs had a right, under their Acts, to make the proposed bridge according to the first award, and if so, whether the Clarence railway was entitled to compensation; and, 2nd, Whether they had a right to make such bridge under the second award.

The Vice-Chancellor suggested that the plaintiffs should undertake to remove their works if the decision should be ultimately against them.

Upon this decision the plaintiffs again commenced building the bridge according to the second plan, and in so doing it was necessary to place scaffolding upon, and that the workmen should cross and recross the Clarence line. The Clarence Company then threatened to drive steam-engines along the line so as to prevent the workmen proceeding, and the present bill had been filed by the plaintiffs for an injunction to restrain the Clarence Company from interfering to prevent the construction of the bridge according to the second award.

The Vice Chancellor had declined to grant the injunction, but had directed the plaintiff's motion to stand over, with leave to apply to the Lord Chancellor upon the same notice of motion.

Wigram, Geldart, and Hare, for the motion, cited Rankin v. Huskisson (4 Sim. 13); Lane v. Newdigate (10 Ves. 192); London and Brighton Railway v. Blake (2 Railway Cases); London and Birmingham Railway v. Grand Junction Canal (1 Railway Cases).

Russell and Collins, contra.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—It is entirely a question of law. A party never in possession, who has never enjoyed an easement, calls upon the Court to put him in possession, and to give him the easement. Is there any authority for that? Put the case of a right of way claimed by one person over the land of another, and that the party claiming that easement has never enjoyed it, can I establish the right, and put him in possession of it without any decision at law? Stripping it from all form, the right claimed by the plaintiffs is a mere easement, and is properly a case for the decision of a court of law. The plaintiffs have never been in possession, and the defendants deny their right. The party claiming the right, before establishing it at law, asks to be put in possession on making compensation. I cannot undertake to say there is no substantial question at law. I cannot say that the plaintiffs have not a right to place the buttresses of their bridge on the defendants' land. The defendants say that in the month of February last they have given the plaintiffs notice that all proceedings in reference to the first award were void, and it was not until ten weeks afterwards that the plaintiffs gave them a fresh notice. A case will be stated under the order of the Vice-Chancellor in the other cause, and it may be heard by the Court of Exchequer in the first week of Hillary Term. Nobody can say that the questions raised are free from doubt. I admit the plaintiffs are not obliged to resort to extraordinary means to erect their bridge without going upon the defendants' railway, and that if they have a right to erect a bridge at all, they are entitled to the ordinary facilities for that purpose, which can be had without impeding the defendants' traffic; but while the question of law remains undecided they cannot ask me for an injunction. The loss of traffic is certainly an irreparable injury.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Thursday, Dec. 12.

GARCIAS v. RICARDO.

Practice—Plea of foreign judgment—Amendment of plea and bill.

Where a plea was considered imperfect, and in an order for the defendant to amend his plea liberty was also given for the plaintiff, at his own request, to amend his bill: Held, in the absence of any specified time for such respective amendments, that the amended plea was not to be taken as to the original bill merely, but that the true construction of the order was that the plaintiff ought to amend his bill first; but that if he did not amend within a reasonable time, the defendant should be at liberty to amend his plea to the original bill as it then stood.

By referring to the above suit, ante, p. 130, in the present volume, it will be seen that when it last came before the Court, upon a plea of foreign judgment, his Honour the Vice-Chancellor allowed an order for the defendant to amend his plea, and in the same order (which was done at the instance of the plaintiff) he also allowed the plaintiff to amend his bill.

The amended plea having been filed, an application was now made by the plaintiff to take the plea off the file for irregularity, as having been filed before the amended bill.

Bethel and Lewis, for the plaintiff, urged that notwithstanding, on the former occasion, leave was given to amend the plea, yet the proper course would have been to let it stand over, with liberty to answer; that the plaintiff, before he amended his bill, found it necessary to obtain foreign affidavits, &c.; these were first to be translated, and then submitted to council previously to amending the bill; that the object of the former order was that both parties should amend, and neither should take advantage of the other; so that if the defendant had found the plaintiff delaying, his proper course would be to move that he should amend within a certain time. The defendant, however, without applying to the plaintiff, and without considering the time which must elapse before the plaintiff could obtain the proper information from a foreign country, had so manœuvred as to steal a march upon the plaintiff, and file his amended plea before the plaintiff had an opportunity to amend his bill.

Stuart and Heathfield, for the defendants.—Nothing is said about time in the former order. Moreover, as liberty was given to amend the bill, it was given because pressed for. The important part of the order related to the amendment of the plea. The plaintiff, therefore, must take his chance as to the consequences of amending his bill. The plaintiff contends that, according to the terms of the order, the amendment of the bill was to come first, but the Court can only deal with the proceedings of either side according to the terms of the order. According to the affidavit of Mr. P. three weeks were allowed for the plaintiff to amend his bill, and one month for the defendant to amend his plea, but this was not a correct understanding. [The Vice-Chancellor.—What occurred to my mind was, that it would not be proper to fix any specific time, because the plaintiff might not think fit to amend his bill; but even upon the supposition that he should be so inclined, he was not to have an unlimited period. In the first place, there is a regularity in filing our plea, therefore I shall have the application to take it off the file with costs refused with costs. The main question is, whether we have offended against the order by amending the plea before the plaintiff had amended his bill, seeing that our amended plea is to the original bill. The second part of the order as to the plaintiff amending his bill, he might have obtained in another way, but he chose to press it under that order. Now it was not your Honour's meaning that our amended plea should be otherwise than to the original and not to the amended bill; we are right both as it respects facts and regularity; for no notice was given by the plaintiff that he intended to amend his bill. Now, if an extraordinary time was required for that purpose, it was not an unlimited time, so that even if it were a race, as the other side endeavours to make it out, the question would be for the Court to consider whether our filing the plea, which was to the original bill, would be irregular. Here has been no manœuvre, but a deliberate acquiescence with the order. You are to deal with this plea according to the terms of the order. This motion is made to intercept a calamity which is likely to befal the plaintiff between amending the plea and amending the bill. Now we have shown a perfect identity with the proceedings, and have gone on with perfect regularity; but this motion is intended to prevent our having the benefit of the amended plea to the original bill which the order gives us; but no allowance of this plea can deprive the plaintiff the benefit which he may derive from his amendment; neither does it deprive him of strict justice; although by the discussion of this plea we shall have that substantial justice done us which this application is intended to deprive us of. As to that which is contended for by the plaintiff, viz. that by the terms of the original order the argument of the amended plea shall be stayed till the plaintiff shall amend his bill, the Court cannot do justice to our client if this be complied with; for what use is it to us to be compelled to wait till the amended bill is filed, since we may be called upon afterwards to demur to the amended bill? Now it must be admitted that the order was a very unusual one, but still in this case it was a very fair one, because it gives both parties a benefit. But we could not afterwards defend ourselves by a plea. We submit, therefore, that it ought to take its course. If it be a bad plea, it is a bad plea; if a good one, it is a good one. When, however, the orders of the Court are made, we are bound to obey the meaning of them. This is, therefore a monstrous application, and we ask to have it refused with costs. Let the original order as it stands be worked out; it is a good order, and we will abide by it.

The Vice Chancellor.—The order arose as Mr. Stuart has described the transaction; but my own experience in giving limits of time is that such a practice is bad, because it gives rise to many questions; therefore it is better to leave the order as it originally stood, without limiting the time. The reasonable construction of the order, as I take it to be, is this: let the plaintiff amend his bill; if he fails to do this, then the defendant shall be at liberty to amend his plea to the original bill as it stood. Upon the face of the order this is the first thing to be done; and it would be quite as well, although not the strict practice, for the defendant's solicitor to ask the plaintiff whether he intended to amend his bill; then, if long delay intervened, the defendant may at once proceed to file his amended plea. Now the counsel who is to draw the amendments to the bill must necessarily require a certain time for that purpose. There must be the arrangement of the materials when laid before him; the foreign papers must be translated, conferences with the solicitor, &c.; all which will be the work of some time; therefore let the argument of the amended plea stand over till the plaintiff shall amend his bill, for which purpose he may take three weeks.

Breeze v. English.

Practice—Interrogations to prove death—At what stage of the cause allowed.

The court will, notwithstanding there is a defect in the chain of evidence, sometimes pronounce a decree upon the merits, subject to the omission being supplied; but it will grant its indulgence to examine witnesses upon interrogatories to prove the required fact only in those cases where, if the fact were already proved, the cause would uninterruptedly proceed to its termination, and not when the evidence, if proved, would not accomplish the desired object.

This was a motion in a supplemental suit to the cause of Breeze v. Hawkes. The two suits came on for hearing a few days since, when an objection was taken that there was no evidence of the death of John Almes, one of the defendants to the original suit. The causes were directed to stand over until the following week, with liberty for the plaintiffs to make such application as they might be endorsed with a view of amending the defect. The present application was, therefore, made upon the affidavit of the plaintiff's solicitor.

Cooper, Lee, and Elderton, in support of the motion, contended that every branch of the Court will struggle to decide upon the merits whenever there is a defect in the evidence, but in such a case it will make a decree, subject to the parties supplying a link that may be wanting in the required evidence. And thus, as in the case of Hood v. Pimm (4 Sim. 101), which forms the basis of modern practice, the Court will extend its indulgence in dealing with collateral matter, such as where a party is out of the jurisdiction. And as was observed by the Vice-Chancellor Wigram, in Hughes v. Eades (1 Hare, 488), that in some cases the cause has been directed to stand over, suspending the whole decree, but giving leave to exhibit an interrogatory before the examiner. In another to prevent the delay in taking accounts, the account has been directed with leave to exhibit an interrogatory in the meantime; a third course is to allow an opportunity of proving that parties are out of the jurisdiction. Moreover, that it would be an alarming doctrine to hold, that the bill ought to be dismissed on account of a mistake or defect of evidence; for even before the case of Hood v. Pimm, there was Moons v. Bernales (1 Russ. 301), where, at the hearing, a cause was allowed to stand over, and liberty given to the plaintiff suing as administrator, to exhibit interrogatories to prove the death of the intestate.

Bethell, for the defendants, urged that the concatenation of blunders which characterized the plaintiff's conduct all throughout the suit were of themselves sufficient to take it out of that class of cases wherein the Court has granted the indulgence sought. That the suit was commenced in the year 1832, and was not brought to a hearing until 1842, when it was found to be in a miserably defective state. An order to amend the bill was granted in February 1842; but no amendment was made till June 1844, without any reasonable excuse offered for the delay; and after having been in the paper several times, it came on only within a few days of the present application, it being at that time suggested, that unless it could be brought within the case of Hood v. Pimm, it should stand dismissed; then came the notice of motion to exhibit interrogatories to prove the death of John Almes. That the conduct of the solicitor was most extraordinary; for having a knowledge of the fact of J. Almes's death, from the deposition of the nurse who attended him in his last illness, and that he died in the year 1837, which caused an abatement in the suit, he notwithstanding proceeded to take evidence in the year 1838, assuming J. Almes to be still living and out of the jurisdiction, and thus multiplies error upon error, for knowing the man died in 1837, he proceeds to take evidence as if he were living; that it was his duty, under the state of things, and knowing the cause of abatement, to have filed a bill of review and supplement, and to have adduced, in 1838, proof of the death of F. Almes; instead of which the evidence is taken in the original cause. But the supplemental bill was not filed until the 17th of July, 1839, which for the first time alleges the death of F. Almes. The learned counsel concluded by saying that the suit was, from beginning to end, conducted with the most unexampled error. Such, that even if the present application were granted, would leave the suit still defective in the matter of evidence. That it was not a case for the Court's leniency, as in Hood v. Pimm, where the only reasons are either, 1st, the point to be proved forms no subject of dispute between the parties; 2nd, a defect in title; or, 3rd, a slip made by some individual in a document through mere inadvertence; but that for the Court to extend its indulgence in the present case, would be against practice, and principle, and public policy.

Cooper, in reply.—The errors complained of in the proceedings exist only in imagination, and it has not been denied on the other side that there were matters in which the Court has remedied an omission. It is a novel thing to be told that because a few poor people have been in litigation eleven years, they, by reason of a series of misfortune, should be debarred of the Court's indulgence from a mere error. As to the letters of administration not being admitted as evidence of the death it is a mere collateral matter, and the objection is thrown in for placing impediments in the way. [Vice-Chancellor.—I cannot, sitting as a judge, admit a party's death from the mere letters of administration; it is neither the law,(a) nor is it proper to assume death from that evidence alone, because experience has often proved the contrary.] Hawker died and England became his representative, therefore it became necessary to file a bill of revivor. Mrs. Breeze died, and then her husband consults as to whether or no he had an interest under the will of Admiral J. Almes.(b) Mrs. Nichols survived her sister Mrs. Breeze, and took out letters of administration of John Almes. The defendants did not think fit to take the objection at the time. If they thought it a valid one, why did they not move to take the bill off the file for irregularity before filing the bill of revivor. [Vice-Chancellor.—A blank is left in the supplemental bill for the date of J. Almes's death; and the question is, whether the order of narration in the supplemental bill does not assume that J. Almes died after the examination of witnesses? Now, suppose I give you leave to prove the death of John Almes, should I do you any good without giving you leave at the same time to amend your supplemental bill? In other words, is it a favour to allow the rectification of one error which may leave another error untouched?] The depositions are certainly binding upon the persons who were the parties to the suit, but not upon after-made parties. Suppose we bring the cause to a hearing, and there is then found an important person necessary to be added to the record, and he is accordingly made a party, he might object to the depositions. In our depositions taken in the supplemental suit, we had to prove the death of Mrs. Breeze, and we were right to entitle them in the supplemental suit only; for publication had passed in the original cause—the depositions, therefore, taken in the supplemental suit, ought to be entitled in that suit. Our facts prove three deaths and three administrations; this circumstance will sufficiently account for the two years and a half before the bill of revivor was filed. It was in the meantime necessary to consider what interest the will of Admiral John Almes gave to the parties which was the work of time. But the only question is, whether our case does not come within that of Hood v. Pimm; therefore, according to practice, and the authority of Vice-Chancellors Wigram, Knight Bruce, and the Master of the Rolls, the case ought not to stand over, but a decree must be made, subject to supplying the defective evidence as to the death of John Almes. There was no necessity to alter the record, because it was for some time a doubt whether or no J. Almes had any interest; but when Hawker died, we found it necessary to amend, to bring his representative before the Court. Then, indeed, a question arose respecting F. Almes's title, by reason of Mrs. Breeze's death; we then bring the cause to a hearing in 1842, and it was at that time we might have expected to hear every possible objection; but all we were told was that it was necessary to bring the representative of T. Hill, one of the original trustees, before the Court. Thence to the present, therefore, only makes a period of two years and a half; neither is it extraordinary that ten years should elapse from the commencement of the suit, considering there was not that rapidity of progress in Chancery causes as at present adopted. So that, even if there were a series of errors, there is no reason why our application should be refused.

The Vice-Chancellor.—I have not been satisfactorily answered this question. Suppose I grant an examination as to the death of John Almes, whether the evidence, if true, will support the allegation in the record after the year 1837? Whenever the indulgence now asked for has been given by the Court, it is where the cause would properly proceed to its termination upon obtaining that evidence. I cannot make the order under the circumstances as they at present appear; for were I to give leave to obtain the evidence sought, the evidence itself, when produced, would not accomplish the desired object. In the case of Hood v. Pimm, when once the fact upon which evidence was required had been proved, there remained no further question. I cannot say that I am satisfied with the bonâ fides of the allegation in the supplemental bill. The matter must stand over for counsel's further consideration.

(a) Vide the case of Moones v. De Bernales (1 Russ. 301), already referred to in the argument. The recent case of Miss Ann (or Anne) Slack, also will doubtless be associated in the mind of the reader with the law here recognised.

(b) Admiral John Almes, the testator, was the grandfather of John Almes, Mrs. Breeze, and Mrs. Nichols.

ROLLS COURT.

Nov. 21 and Dec. 12.

BOSCHETTI v. POWER.

One of three trustees, defendants in a suit respecting the estate of their cestui que trust, in his answer, admits that the sum of 28,000*l. is standing in their names; the other two admit a "considerable sum" is standing in their names, but do not name any definite amount; a motion for payment into court of the said* 28,000*l. was refused.*

Affidavits by the two trustees in the proceedings in the Master's office, admitting a sum of 26,000*l. to be standing in their names, are not a sufficient admission to obtain an order for payment of that sum into court. The admission must be made in the answer.*

Inquiry at the bank as to the particular sum standing in the names of trustees is not the regular mode of proceeding in such a case.

The answer of the three defendants, who are trustees of certain property, being found by the Master to be insufficient, Power, one of them, moved, on the 7th Nov. last, for time to put in a further answer; and on that occasion it was sought, on the part of the plaintiff, to make the payment into court of 28,000*l.* admitted by Power to be standing in their names as trustees, a condition of obtaining the order, there having been delay, &c.; but the Master of the Rolls would not consent to make an order on Power to do an act depending on the two others not then before the Court. A motion was then made on the 21st Nov. to have the payment into court, it having been admitted by the other two defendants that a "considerable sum" was standing in their names; and in certain proceedings in the Master's office there were affidavits made by both, in which it was admitted that the sum of 26,000*l.* was standing in their names. It was stated, also, that application had been made at the bank on the subject, and it was found that that sum was so standing.

Lowndes (with him Torriano), contended, that inasmuch as one of the defendants admitted a sum of a definite amount was standing in the names of the trustees, and the other two admitted a considerable sum was so standing, and had actually in their affidavits in the Master's office stated a definite sum, the order should be made. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—This is a motion for payment into court, on the admission of one, aided by the affidavits only of the other two; there is no case in which such an order has been made.] Can it be material whether the admission is made in the affidavit or the answer? It is sufficient to have it admitted by the answer of one and the affidavit of the other two.

Turner, contrà.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Let it stand over till the matter be more carefully examined. The money ought to be paid into court; but this is not an ordinary application for that purpose. The order, if made, might be successfully impeached.

Thursday, Dec. 12.

Lowndes applied for an order again, but did not adduce any new grounds, except the fact of an application to the bank, by whom they were assured that the sum in question was standing in the names of the trustees.

Turner, contrà.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I cannot grant the order; there is no case of an application of such a nature, unless there has been a clear admission in the answers of the defendants. Here there is only the affidavits of two of them in the Master's office. As to the information obtained at the bank, that is an irregular course of procedure.

Re CAREW.

It is irregular, under the Solicitors Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), to obtain the common order to tax a solicitor's bill of costs after payment thereof. It should be an application to tax under special circumstances shewn to the Court at the time of making the same. An application by a mortgagor, therefore, for the taxation of a mortgagee's solicitor's bill of costs, after being told at the time of delivery to the mortgagor that it had been paid by the mortgagee, is irregular, if only for the common order, and must be discharged.

This was a motion to discharge the common order obtained for the taxation of the bill of costs of Mr. Carew, amounting to 96*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* on the ground of irregularity. Mr. Carew had been employed by the mortgagee of certain estates on the occasion of a transfer of the mortgage, and the bill of costs in question had been incurred in that transaction. White and Sons were the solicitors of the mortgagor. On the 13th of November, White and Sons wrote to Carew for an account of the charges. No immediate notice was taken of the application, but on the 20th November the bill, with a receipt signed by Carew, was sent, and it was intimated that payment had been made by, or a sum of money had been received from, the mortgagee. At the same time Carew claimed to retain the deeds, &c. till the general account was settled. White and Sons replied that the demand was excessive, and made a tender of 40*l.* which was refused; and they then applied for and obtained the common order to tax the bill, which it was now moved to discharge for irregularity.

Turner (with him Glasse), contended that the order should have been obtained on special application, the bill having been paid, and referred to the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 41, the now Solicitors Act.

Kindersley (with him Hallett), contrà.—Simple acknowledgment of the payment is not sufficient to put a party to the necessity of obtaining an order by special application. The mortgagor was the real party to pay the bill. Carew did not say the bill was paid but merely that he had received a sum of money, and a sum of money had been paid in the day before to the general account. There appeared to have been no communication with the trustees, and it could not, therefore, be known that the bill was being paid. The payment, therefore, was not such as to bring it within the operation of the Act, and therefore the common order for taxation was sufficient.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—No doubt the bill may be taxed, if the order is regular. There is nothing to prevent third parties from having a bill taxed, and the mortgagor is not precluded from applying to the Court. Whether the bill was paid or not is not altogether clear; it was that of the mortgagee and not of the mortgagor, and though it may be proper to procure an order for taxation, still I think it must be obtained on special circumstances shewn, and the present order must be discharged. The statement, as to the payment, is ambiguous, and therefore I shall consider as to the costs, and mention it on Monday next; accordingly,

Monday, Dec. 16.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said he would grant the motion to discharge the order, but without costs, inasmuch as there might be some doubt as to the actual payment of the bill being clearly stated.

BELL v. DUNMORE.

Multifariousness—37th Order of 26th Aug. 1841.

A bill of discovery as to a bond, &c. is filed, and an answer put in, the bill is then amended by the introduction of quite new matter, and the defendant demurs to the amended bill for multifariousness, submitting at the same time to answer as to the part contained in the original bill, the demurrer was overruled, notwithstanding the 37th order of the 26th August, 1841.

This was a bill of discovery filed by the plaintiff, Mr. Bell, against the defendants, Dunmore and Wartnaby, in reference to a bond and other securities for 2,000*l.* held by one Masters, who was the testator of the defendants, and for the recovery of which sum of 2,000*l.* they, as his executors, had brought an action at law. The object of the plaintiff was to shew that he did not now owe the 2,000*l.* for which the bond had been originally given. On the answer coming in, the bill was amended, by introducing additional and totally different matter in reference to another bond, and securities for a different sum of 2,000*l.* in a transaction with one Bates, quite distinct from that in the original bill, and in reference to which the plaintiff prayed relief. To this the defendants demurred, for multifariousness, submitting, at the same time, to answer, as they had already done, to the part included in the original bill, but demurring to the relief sought in the other part; and the question was, whether this submitting to answer did not overrule the demurrer.

Kindersley (with him Faber), for the demurrer.—We admit the new Order (37th of 26th Aug. 1841) only applies to cases where you purport to answer a part of that which the demurrer covers. Here we say we are ready to answer the part contained in the original bill, but not that which has been improperly introduced in the amended bill. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—You say the bill is such as you will not answer?] No; we don't object to answer. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Yes; the form of your demurrer being for multifariousness supposes that, for it is an objection grounded upon the putting together of things which ought not to be joined, and that is the same as saying no answer is to be given.] They cited Hodgkin v. Longden (8 Ves. 2); Todd v. Gee (17 Ves. 273); Powell v. Aiderne (1 Vernon, 416); Hester v. Weston (1 Vernon, 463); Ellice v. Goodson (1 M. & Cr. 653); Cressy v. Beavan (MS. 24th Nov. 1842, V. C. E.)

Turner (with him Bates), contrà.—The defendant picks out one part and consents to answer it, and then demurs for multifariousness to the rest. That cannot be permitted. The case does not come within the 37th Order of 1841, and the answer overrules the demurrer. The cases cited are cases of demurrer for want of equity.

Kindersley, in reply, said that the reasoning on the other side would apply, if part of the matter included in the original bill were selected to be answered, and the rest demurred to; but here there was entirely new matter additional to the former, and totally different from it.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—When you demur for multifariousness, you are not to answer; or, if so, you overrule the demurrer. That has been the rule of the Court, and I think the 37th Order of 1841 does not substantially alter that rule. I cannot see that the practice of the court is wrong on that point. Multifariousness is an objection to the form, and a demurrer on that ground is a demand that the plaintiff put his bill in a better shape,—less complicated,—there being difficulty enough even in a simple case. The defendant has a right to have it as simple as possible; and the plaintiff should not bring forward together things not connected. Now, the objection being to the form, how does the defendant proceed? He answers one part, and demurs to the other. But it is one part added to the other that makes the bill multifarious; it is the junction of things not connected, not the part itself objected to. I do not see that the defendant's is a reasonable course. I shall look at the cases cited, but at present I think they do not apply. My present impression is, that the demurrer must be overruled. It was then agreed that the demurrer should be overruled, and six weeks were allowed to put in an answer.

Re BYRCH.

Taxation of solicitor's bill—Common order discharged with costs.

This case, which is reported in 4 LAW TIMES, 211, stood over for further explanation. A long affidavit was now read as to the plaintiff being only a trustee, and permitting his name to be used in the cause of Holland v. Roper by his sister, the cestui que trust.

Turner and Malins, for the motion.

Lowndes, contra, contended that the fair construction of the words "all the papers," &c. was all the papers in that particular suit.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The case is this:—Mr. Byrch was employed in several matters, both in carrying on suits, and in other business. A bill of costs as to this suit was delivered; the common order to tax was obtained, not including all the costs, but only those in this particular cause; and all the papers of the plaintiff are asked to be delivered up. The order of course was discharged for irregularity, and I cannot alter that now; it must be discharged, and with costs. I allowed it to stand over; but I could not then see how any evidence could be brought forward to sustain it as an order of course.

BLAKE v. BLAKE.

On the plaintiff undertaking to speed, a bill will not be dismissed for want of prosecution, though an order to amend has been obtained, and the time within which the amendment ought to be made is long since past.

This was a motion by the defendant to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution. The same motion was made last March, and an order of course was then obtained to amend, and according to the practice of the court, the amendment should have been made within three weeks afterwards. No steps were taken, however, since, and Lovatt now moved to dismiss.

Bagshawe contra, undertook to speed.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—You might have moved in April last to dismiss, and so put them then upon terms to speed, but instead of doing that you wait till now. As they undertake now to speed, I must refuse the motion.

Lovatt.—They ought to give us the costs.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—Yes.

Thursday, Dec. 19.

FULTON v. GILMOUR.

Even after an answer put in, and exceptions taken to it allowed, and a fresh answer put in, and after the cause is in the paper for hearing, the defendant will be allowed to put in a supplemental answer, to correct an error or make a true statement of a fact, by a slip of memory falsely stated in the answer; but he will be held strictly to the particular matter in the notice of motion, and will not be permitted to add any thing else.

This was a motion for leave to file a supplemental answer to correct the statement of a fact now just discovered by the defendant to be false, the cause being in the paper for hearing.

The defendant, John Gilmour, was the executor and trustee of the father of the plaintiff, Marian Fulton, and was a partner in the firm of Ferguson and Co. in Calcutta. The assets of the testator were all paid into, or left in the possession of, Ferguson and Co. who in 1833 became insolvent. The plaintiff having come of age in 1840, and finding her property in a great measure lost, filed her bill in May 1843, for the recovery from the defendant of the dividend which accrued due on the debt from the firm to him as executor and trustee of the testator. At that time it was supposed the defendant was a certificated bankrupt in England as well as in India, and was therefore discharged from liability on the debt due from the firm to the testator's estate. By his answer he admitted he was a partner of Ferguson and Co. and with them became insolvent in 1833, and that he was subsequently, in April 1835, discharged under the Insolvent Act then in force by the Insolvent Court in India, but he denied he was a bankrupt in England. Thereupon it was sought to recover from him not only the dividend due upon the debt, but the entire amount of assets received by the firm, inasmuch as, being uncer-tificated in England, he remained liable to plaintiff; and the bill was amended accordingly, charging him therewith. To this he answered as, before, and the cause being in the paper for hearing, the defendant now moved for leave to file a supplemental answer, to correct an error as to the date of his discharge in the Insolvent Court in India, falsely stated to be in April 1835, whereas it was in June 1836. He said he had no documents in this country to guide him, they being all in India, and he had answered entirely from memory, and had discovered, on the 6th inst only, that his memory had deceived him.

Kindersley (with him Tennant).—The object of the bill is to make Mr. Gilmour liable for the amount of the loss sustained by the estate of Robert Fulton, the testator, from the failure of Ferguson and Co.; and it becomes of importance to his defence that the error should be corrected; for if the discharge took place in 1835, and not in 1836, the case does not come within the operation of the last Insolvent Act. The evidence of the discharge is only found in the defendant's answer, and as that was made without reference to papers, &c. and only from memory, it is clear how the error arose. The application for the conditional discharge was in April 1838; but as fourteen months must elapse from the application before the full discharge is granted, in order to allow time to insert notice thereof in the Gazette in England, for the benefit of Europeans; and as the defendant was compelled to put in his answer the best way he could, it is obvious the mistake arose from no fault of his. His recollection was incorrect, but he cannot be absolutely bound thereby. He moved immediately after discovering his error, which he did on the 6th inst.

Turner (with him Toller).—The question in the suit is, whether the defendant is liable for the amount of balance left in the hands of Ferguson and Co. or only for the dividends which their estates would produce. In his answer, he says he was discharged under the Acts then in force. Now, the 9 Geo. 4, c. 73, did not exonerate him from liability to pay all the debts, and that Act continued in force till the 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 79 came into operation, under which an insolvent became entitled to petition for a complete discharge. If, then, the defendant's discharge was in April 1835, as he swears in his answer, he cannot take advantage of the latter Act. In this state of things, the defendant, now, when the cause is at issue, moves to correct his answer by adding a new fact. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I shall assume you do not want the benefit of a falsehood, and that, therefore, if a fact at first sworn to be now found to be falsely stated, you will not take advantage of it.] It is stated in his answer, he was discharged under the Act then in force, that is, the 9 Geo. 4, c. 73, and he now seeks to come under the later Act. There is no case of a supplemental answer stating an entirely new fact after issue taken in a cause, and where the whole question depends on that fact. Neither is a supplemental answer allowed for the purpose of supplying a defect, if the party had the means, as in this case, of knowing the fact sought to be introduced. (Macdougal v. Purrier, 4 Russ. 486; Greenwood v. Atkinson, 4 Sim. 54; Livesey v. Wilson, 1 Ves. & Beam. 149; Curling v. Marquis of Townshend, 19 Ves. 628.) It would make an entirely new case at an advanced period of the cause. Besides, in his answer to the original bill, in June 1843, he disputed the plaintiff's identity, resisted the demand, and exceptions were taken to his answer, and all allowed. Then he had another opportunity, in his second answer, in March last, of having the thing brought to his recollection. He says he did not know a fact in his own power to know, and the object of this motion is to set up an entirely new defence.

Kindersley, in reply, was not heard.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—It is stated the defendant answered from memory, without the help of paper, to which he could not have access. The fact in question was one which was not a secret matter in his own breast, but the adjudication of a public Court, under which the defendant obtained his discharge. It was now found that an error had been committed in the statement of that fact, and the question is, whether I will allow an alteration to be made in that statement, so as to make it in accordance with the truth; and I think I must. I am sensible of the inconvenience that may result from this, and that the consequence may be that the plaintiff will have to reply to facts, and shape her course differently from what she would have done if the alteration had not been permitted. But if the fact is that the statements are not true as sworn in the answer, and if the correction were not allowed, we would be deciding at the hearing on false facts, and might come to a very wrong conclusion; and a judge must feel a species of horror in adjudicating upon a state of facts which are not correct. Besides, this is not the statement of a new fact or matter, as was that of the modus in Macdougal v. Purrier, but only the correction of a statement of a fact before falsely stated. I must allow the correction according to the notice of motion, but the defendant must set forth the whole of the answer which he intends to make, and give the plaintiff an opportunity of objecting to it. In all these cases, if the defendant add any thing beyond what is contained in the notice of motion, the supplemental answer must be taken off the file. The defendant must pay the costs of this motion.

VICE-CHANCELLOR WIGRAM'S COURT.

Saturday, Dec. 21.

VIVIAN v. COCHRAN.

JUDGMENT.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said, that the question which arises in this case is new, and one of law, the solution of which he was more inclined to refer to the decision of a court of law; but as the parties had expressed a desire to have his opinion, he would now deliver it. The subject-matter for decision was dependent on the decree of the Act 37 Henry 8, c. 12. The facts are these: the plaintiff is the rector of a parish in London; the defendant is a public officer of the National Bank of Ireland, who was the lessee and occupier of the premises, the tithes of which are the subject of the present suit; the lease was granted some years ago, at a reserved rent, the lessees covenanting to expend 2,000*l.* on the premises. The right of the plaintiff to 2s. 9d. in the pound on the reserved rent is not in dispute, but the plaintiff insisted that he was entitled to 2s. 9d. on the estimated annual value. The question, then, between the plaintiff and defendant was this, viz. upon how many pounds sterling the 2s. 9d. was to be paid? whether upon the reserved rent, whatever this might be, or upon the full annual value, irrespective of the actual rent which might be equal to, or fall short of, such estimated value in proportion to the sum which might have been given by way of fine, or covenanted to be expended in the shape of improvement. That part of the decree which affected the present question was in the following words:—"That the citizens and inhabitants of the city of London and liberties of the same for the time being, shall yearly, without fraud or covin, for ever pay their tithes to the parsons, vicars, and curates of the said city, and their successors for the time being, after the rate hereafter following, that is to wit, of every 10s. rent by the year of all and every house and houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, stables, and every of them, within the said city and liberty of the same, 16d. ob.; and of every 20s. rent by the year of all and every such house and houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, and stables, and every of them, within the said city and liberties, 2s. 9d., and so above the rent of 20s. by the year, ascending from 10s. to 10s. according to the rate aforesaid. Item—That where any lease is or shall be made of any dwelling-house or houses, shops, werehouses, cellars, or stables, or any of them, by fraud or covin, reserving less rent than hath been accustomed, or is, or that any such lease shall be made without any rent reserved upon the same, by reason of any fine or income paid beforehand, or by any other fraud or covin; that then, in every such case, the tenant or farmer, tenants and farmers thereof shall pay for his or their tithes of the same after the rate aforesaid, according to the quality of such rent or rents as the same house or houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, or stables, or any of them were last letten for, without fraud or covin, before the making of such lease. Item—That every owner or owners, inheritor or inheritors, of any dwelling house or houses, shops, warehouses, cellars, or stables, or any of them, within the said city and liberties, inhabiting or occupying the same himself or themselves, shall pay after such rate or tithes as is above said, after the quantity of such yearly rent as the same was last letten for, without fraud or covin." No doubt that if the construction of the decree was to be taken from the consideration of these clauses, "all houses, buildings, &c." are made liable to pay tithes at the rate of 2s. 9d. in the pound on the full annual value; but the decree, assuming this construction, admits as a possible exception "houses and buildings" which had been let before the decree at an accustomed rent. The defendants say, that unless you can affect the case with fraud or covin, 2s. 9d. can only be exacted on the actual rent so far as it relates to new-built houses. The same reasoning would apply to a peppercorn rent. But with this doctrine I am not, as at present advised, prepared to agree; and the case of Antrobus v. East India Company (13 Ves. 9) is a direct authority in favour of the assessment on the estimated rent of the full value to be let by the year. The decree did not require such a construction, nor do the reported cases warrant such a conclusion. This is not the case of a fine, it is the case of an ordinary building lease, and possibly distinguishable. Fraud and covin are out of the question; and in the case of a building-lease there is certainly this difference. One objection, however, against construing this decree in favour of a calculation of the tithes on the rent reserved on a bonâ fide building-lease, would be whether, in case of a new lease to be granted, if the tithes in respect of such new lease were to be measured by the present rent as the last rent payable without fraud or covin, this would not in effect be to make ground-rent only the measure upon which to calculate all future tithes. If the lessee had built the house, a full rent might have been reserved, and the tithes payable on such full rent. Can the mere arrangement between the parties, as to the amount of rent according as the expenditure may have been on the part of the lessee or lessor, oust the parson of his right? If the lessee were voluntarily to build a house, could he claim exemption on the ground of not paying any rent in respect of the house? Can the existence of a contract by him to expend a certain sum in building make any difference? The question is one of great difficulty; but on the whole I think I am bound to hold that the tithes are to be computed on the full annual value, and that the clergyman is entitled to an account on this footing.

Bankrupt and Insolvent Courts.

COMMISSIONERS' COURTS.

(Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.)

Monday, Dec. 23.

Re DAVISON, an Insolvent.

The Court will punish for immorality.

In this case the insolvent was a pilot, earning on an average 200*l.* per annum, for debts amounting to 147*l.* 4s. 8d. with no debts due to him.

Buchanan opposed for several creditors, and Sturgeon supported the insolvent.

Buchanan objected to the balance sheet as being defective, and that the insolvent had parted with his wife, and was living with and supporting another woman and four children he had by her, and that as such immorality had led the insolvent into extravagant expenses, he called upon the Court to protect the interest of creditors, and set apart from the insolvent's future income a sum of at least 40*l.* a year until the creditors were paid.

The Learned COMMISSIONER acceded to the suggestion, and named a day for the final order, and intimated that if the insolvent did not on that day agree to set aside 40*l.* a year as proposed, the Court would dismiss the petition.

Circuit Reports.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

LIVERPOOL WINTER ASSIZE.

CROWN CASES.

REG. v. CLARKSON.

A promissory note made payable to a number of persons associated together under the name of the "Temple of Peace United Lodge of Odd-fellows" appears upon the face of it to be good, and will sustain an indictment for forgery.

The indictment charged the prisoner with forging a promissory note, which being set out appeared to be made payable to the "Temple of Peace United Lodge of Odd-fellows." There was a second count describing the note as in larceny.

At the close of the prosecutor's case, James, for the prisoner, objected that the note was not perfect, there was no legal payee.

GURNEY, B.—You must take that in arrest of judgment.

James.—I take it upon the second count, my Lord, because if your Lordship agrees with me it will save the necessity of going to the jury. I submit that the paper produced is not a promissory note, and does not therefore sustain the second count. There is no payee, or at least no person to whom the bill is made payable, whom the law can recognize, which is equivalent to no prayer at all. This is not a trading company, which may be described by the name of a firm, nor is it a corporation. Rex v. Box is precisely in point. There the note was made payable to A B, stewardesses of a certain society and their successors in office. It was there held that the note became payable at law to A and B in their own right, and would pass to their executors and administrators; but it was assumed by the Court that was the only view in which the note could be said to be perfect. Rex v. Collicott (4 Taunt. 300), and Rex v. Jones (1 Leach, 204), are also in point.

Monk, contrà, submitted that there was a payee. It is not necessary, in order to maintain an indictment, that the instrument should be such as might be recovered upon, although it is necessary that it should appear so upon the face of it. There is nothing here to shew the contrary. This may be the name of a trading firm, or even of a corporation. It is not sufficient even that the contrary may be shown by evidence. Suppose the note were payable to John Smith, a person who never existed, which, in point of law, is all that can be said of the present payee, surely it would then be the subject of an indictment, otherwise the forger would only have to make a non-existing person payee, and he might forge the names of the drawer and indorsers at pleasure. That it is sufficient if the document appears to be good upon the face of it, so that it might get into circulation, appears from the case of Rex v. Macintosh (2 Leach's Crown Cases, 883).

GURNEY, B. said he should not stop the case, but would let it go to the jury, and would find judgment upon the objection in the course of the assizes, if necessary. The prisoner was found guilty, and judgment was afterwards given upon this point for the prosecution, and sentence passed.

The learned judge intimated to the counsel for the prisoner that he himself had felt some doubt on the point, but that he had consulted Parke, B. and Rolfe, B. who had none, and he did not therefore feel justified in reserving the point.

Judgment for prosecution.

REG. v. MURPHY.

Semble, that the putting poison into a teapot, with intent to murder A, B, and C, constitutes three distinct offences, and that the one act cannot properly be charged in distinct counts of one indictment varying the intent. Upon a motion to quash an indictment the prisoner may be remanded to the next assizes.

The indictment was as follows:—

1st Count. Charges that prisoner feloniously and unlawfully did attempt to administer to one Margaret Murphy half an ounce of deadly poison, to wit, oxalic acid, with intent her, the said Margaret Murphy, to kill and murder.

2nd Count. Charges that prisoner, a certain quantity, to wit, &c. of deadly poison, to wit, oxalic acid, into a certain quantity, to wit, half a pint of tea, which the said Margaret Murphy, had prepared to be by her drank and swallowed down, feloniously did put, mix, and mingle, and that prisoner, by means in this charge aforesaid, attempted to administer to Margaret Murphy the said deadly poison, with intent to murder her.

3rd. Same as 2nd, but varying the means and manner of attempt.

4th. Charges in the words of the statute 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 3, that prisoner attempted to administer to a "a certain other person, to wit, Margaret Murphy," poison, with intent to commit the crime of murder.

5th. Charges against prisoner, putting poison into the teapot of one James Murphy, and thereby attempted to administer poison to James Murphy, with intent to murder him.

6th. Charges in verbal statement, attempt to administer poison to James Murphy, with intent to commit the crime of murder.

Prisoner being called on to plead,

Pollock, for prisoner, submitted to the discretion of the Court, whether this indictment should not be quashed, inasmuch as it charged the prisoner with the commission of several distinct felonies, and quoted Young and Others v. The King in error (3 T. R. 98), in which Buller, J. stated this to be the practice. He argued that the stat. 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 3, joined in each case the intent to commit murder with the attempt to administer poison, and that the mere attempt without the intent would not constitute the felony. In this case, where three of the counts charged the attempt and intent as against Margaret Murphy, the 4th, as against another Margaret Murphy, and the 5th and 6th, as against one James Murphy, he submitted, that though the act which endangered life might be one only, yet the separate intents alleged, and necessary to be alleged, rendered the charge made in this indictment one of three distinct felonies as against the prisoner.

Monk, for prosecution, after stating the indictment as above.—The 1st, 2nd, and 3rd counts are not complained of. The 4th is, because it alleges that prisoner attempted to administer poison to a "certain other person, to wit, Margaret Murphy," with intent to murder her, and it is contended that this Margaret Murphy must be a different person from the Margaret Murphy mentioned in the former counts, and the offence consequently an entirely different offence. In every indictment for felony containing more than one count, several offences in point of law are supposed to be charged. The pleading would be bad, if it charged the same offence twice; and to preserve the integrity of each count the pleader inserts the word "other" before the person injured, or the injury complained of. If, in this case, two separate attempts to poison either one Margaret Murphy or two persons of the name were proved, the Court would no doubt require the counsel for the prosecution to elect. As to the 5th and 6th counts, though they in fact charge an attempt to poison James Murphy, it by no means follows that this attempt is not the same act complained of in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd counts. Suppose A obtains access to the room in which B and C are about to breakfast, and puts poison into the teapot on the breakfast-table; and suppose there is no evidence of previous malice against either of them. If charged with the attempt to murder B he may make the shameless defence that he intended to murder C. A failure of justice might ensue, if both sets of counts could not be joined. Besides, the argument on the other side defeats itself by going too far, as it is every days' practice to charge an act with several different intents in different counts of one indictment. The Court will take care the prisoner is not prejudiced, and will put prosecuting counsel to elect, if several offences are proved.

Pollock replied.

GURNEY, B.—I will take indictment and depositions home with me, and consider them.

His lordship afterwards said, I have considered the point raised by the prisoner's counsel, and the result of my opinion is, that I shall order the case to stand over till the next assizes, when the prosecutor may decide whether he will stand upon the present indictment or prefer another indictment or indictments.

(Before Mr. Baron GURNEY.)

REG. v. MORGAN.

Upon an indictment for making a false declaration in lieu of an oath under the stat. 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 62, s. 12, relating to pawnbrokers, it is not sufficient for the prosecution to prove the handwriting of the justice before whom the declaration is made, but it must be shewn that when it was made he was acting within the district of which he is such justice.

The prisoner was indicted for a misdemeanour, in making a false declaration before a magistrate for the borough of Liverpool, that she had lost the pawn-ticket of certain goods pledged by her. The course to be taken by a person to obtain goods under such circumstances is pointed out by stat. 39 & 40 Geo. 3, c. 99, s. 16, which, however, requires an affidavit to be made by the applicant. By stat. 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 62, s. 12, it is enacted, "That where, by any Act or Acts in force for regulating the business of pawnbrokers, an oath, affirmation, or affidavit might, but for the passing of this Act, be required to be taken or made, the person who, by or under such Act or Acts might be required to take or make such oath, affirmation, or affidavit, shall, in lieu thereof, make and subscribe a declaration to the same effect; and such declaration shall be made and subscribed at the same time, and on the same occasion, and in the presence of the same person or persons, as the oath, affirmation, or affidavit in lieu whereof it shall be made and subscribed would, by the Act or Acts directing or requiring the same, be directed or required to be taken or made; and all and every the enactments, provisions, and penalties contained in or imposed by any such Act or Acts as to any oath, affirmation, or affidavit thereby directed or required to be taken or made shall extend and apply to any declaration in lieu thereof as well and in the same manner as if the same were herein expressly enacted with reference thereto."

By the former statute, after specifying the affidavit required, it is enacted, "That the caption thereof shall be authenticated by the handwriting thereto of the justice before whom the same shall be made, and who shall and is hereby required so to authenticate the same."

Blair, for the prosecution, having proved the falsity of the declaration of the prisoner, was about to prove the declaration itself by calling a witness to speak to the handwriting of the magistrate of Liverpool before whom it was made.

The witness, who was clerk to the magistrate, stated, on cross-examination, that from the great number of these declarations, he could not remember when or where it was made, but would only speak to the handwriting.

James, for the prisoner, submitted that there was no evidence that the declaration had been made before the justice acting as such, or even that it had been made within the borough.

Blair, contrà, contended that the Court would not assume that the magistrate had acted wrongly or out of his jurisdiction, and that further evidence could only be had by calling the magistrate, which was very unusual.

GURNEY, B.—This case has not been got up as it ought to have been. If you could not identify the time or place when this particular declaration was made, you might at all events have called the magistrate to say that he never took any declaration out of the borough. I think Mr. James's objection a good one, and that the evidence is not sufficient.

Prisoner acquitted.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

SEPTEMBER SESSION.

Wednesday, Sept. 18.

REG. v. JENNINGS.

Indictment for trading in slaves—Plea of autrefois acquit, and demurrer thereto—Duplicity—Identity of the charges in the former indictment and in the present one.

Semble, that in criminal as well as in civil cases, only one counsel can be heard on each side in arguing a demurrer.

The prisoners were indicted for that they, on the — day of —, with force and arms, to wit, at London aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, did illegally and feloniously man, navigate, equip, despatch, use and employ a certain ship or vessel called the Augusta, in order to accomplish a certain object which, in and by a certain Act of Parliament, made and passed in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, intituled "An Act to Amend and Consolidate the Laws relating to the Abolition of the Slave Trade," was and is declared unlawful, that is to say, to deal and trade in slaves, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, against the peace, &c.

There were three other counts alleging the same acts to have been done, namely, the manning, navigating, equipping, and despatching the said ship, but each varying the object with which they were performed. In the second it was alleged to be "to purchase slaves;" in the third, "to deal and trade in persons intended to be dealt with as slaves;" in the fourth, "to purchase persons intended to be dealt with as slaves."

The fifth count charged that the prisoners on, &c. with force and arms, to wit, at London aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction, &c. did illegally and feloniously and against the form, &c. ship on board a certain ship, or vessel, called the Augusta, divers goods and effects, to wit, twenty-nine hogsheads of tobacco, six cases of arms, &c. to be employed in accomplishing a certain object which was in and by a certain Act of Parliament made, &c. in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty George the Fourth, entitled, &c. (as in first count), declared unlawful—that is to say, to trade and deal in slaves, contrary to the form of the statute, &c. and against the peace, &c.

The sixth count was the same as the fifth, except that the object with which the acts were done was alleged to be to purchase slaves.

The seventh, that it was to deal and trade in persons intended to be dealt with as slaves.

The eighth, to purchase persons intended to be dealt with as slaves.

Pleas of autrefois acquit of defendant Jennings.

And the said Thomas Jennings, in his own proper person cometh into court here, and having heard the said indictment read, saith that our said lady the Queen ought not further to prosecute the first count of the said indictment against the said Thomas Jennings, because he says that heretofore, and before it was presented by the jurors aforesaid, in manner and form as in the said first count mentioned, to wit, on Monday, the 22nd day of March, in the fourth year of the reign of our sovereign Lady the Queen, at a special session of oyer and terminer of our said sovereign Lady the Queen, of the colony of our Lady the Queen, at Sierra Leone, in parts beyond the seas, to wit, on the day and year last aforesaid, holden at the Court House, in the free town, in the said colony, before his Honour Logan Hook, our said Lady the Queen's chief justice, ad interim, of the said colony (the chief judge thereof) and officiating judge of the Court of Vice-Admiralty for the same, and the Hon. Norman Wm. Macdonald, the Hon. Wm. Cole, and the Hon. Wm. Farguson, respectively, members of the council of the said colony, and others their fellows, justices and commissioners of our said Lady the Queen, assigned by her letters patent of our said Lady the Queen, under her great seal of Great Britain, made to them and others, and any three or more of them (of which number the will and pleasure of our said Lady the Queen was that her governors, lieutenant-governors, or other officer administering the Government of the said colony, her chief judge of the said colony, her other judges of the same or one of them, or her judge of her said Court of Vice-Admiralty respectively for the time being, should always be one), to inquire upon the oath of good and lawful men of the said colony, and by other ways, means, and methods, according to their best knowledge and abilities, as well within liberties as without, whereby the truth of the matter might be better known and inquired into concerning all treasons, piracies, felonies, robberies, murders, conspiracies, and other offences whatsoever, and accessories thereto whomsoever and howsoever done or committed upon the sea, or in any haven, river, creek, or place where the admiral has power, authority, or jurisdiction, &c.; also concerning all offences against an Act made in the 5th year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, intitled an Act to amend and consolidate the Laws relating to the abolition of the Slave Trade, committed in any place where the admiral has not jurisdiction, &c. and not being within the United Kingdom aforesaid nor within the local jurisdiction of any ordinary court of a British colony, settlement, plantation, or territory competent to try such offences, and the said offences to hear and determine according to the laws and customs of the realm of England, and the statutes in the said letters patent mentioned, and all other statutes in that behalf made and provided upon the oaths of Henry Houghton Rugeley, &c. (setting out the names of the grand jury), good and lawful men of the said colony of Sierra-Leone, then and there impannelled, sworn, and charged to inquire for the said Lady the Queen, touching and concerning the premises in the said letters patent mentioned. It was presented in manner and form as followeth, that is to say, the jurors of our Lady the Queen upon their oath present, that Thomas Jennings, late of Freetown, in the colony of Sierra-Leone, mariner, on the 7th day of February, in the 4th year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady Victoria, with force and arms upon the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, to wit, in and on board of a certain brig or vessel called the Augusta, in a certain place upon the high seas, off the Gallinas, on the western coast of Africa, feloniously and unlawfully did take charge and command of the said brig or vessel as master, he the said Thomas Jennings then and there well-knowing the said brig or vessel was engaged and employed in carrying and conveying goods, wares, and merchandize to the Gallinas on the coast of Africa, being employed and used in the slave trade, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen her crown and dignity; and the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said T. Jennings afterwards, to wit, on the 7th of February, in the year aforesaid, with force and arms, upon the high seas aforesaid, in the brig or vessel aforesaid, at the place aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the admiralty of England aforesaid, feloniously and unlawfully did take charge and command of the said brig or vessell as master aforesaid, he the said T. Jennings then and there well knowing that the said brig or vessel was employed or intended to be employed in carrying and removing slaves or other persons as or in order to their being dealt with as slaves, from the coast of Africa to parts beyond the seas, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity; whereupon the provost marshal of the colony aforesaid was commanded by the said Court that he should omit not, for any liberty, in his marshalship, but that he should take the said Thos. Jennings, if he might be found in his marshalship, and him safely keep to answer to the premises; and afterwards, to wit, at the same sessions of oyer and terminer of our said Lady the Queen, on the said Monday the 22nd day of March, in the said fourth year of the reign of our said Lady the Queen before the said justices and commissioner of the said Lady the Queen above named, and others their fellows aforesaid, there came the said Thos. Jennings, under the custody of Charles Brown, esq. provost marshal and sheriff of the colony aforesaid, in whose custody, in the gaol of the colony aforesaid, for the cause aforesaid, he had been before committed, being brought to the bar there in his proper person by the said provost marshal and sheriff to whom he was there also committed, and forthwith being demanded concerning the premises in the said indictment above specified and charged upon him how he would acquit himself thereof, he said he was not guilty thereof, and thereof for good and evil he did put himself upon the country; and John Carr, esq. our said Lady the Queen's advocate of the said colony, who then prosecuted for the said Lady the Queen, in that behalf, did the like; therefore it was thereupon commanded by the said Court that a jury thereupon there immediately should come before the said justices and commissioners of the said Lady the Queen, of good and lawful men of the colony aforesaid, by whom the truth of the matter might be better known, and who were not of kin to the said Thos. Jennings, to recognise upon their oath whether the said Thos. Jennings was guilty of the premises in the indictment aforesaid above specified or not, because as well the said John Carr, esq. prosecuting for the said Lady the Queen in this behalf, as the said Thos. Jennings, had put themselves upon the said jury, and the jurors of the said jury, by the provost marshal for this purpose impannelled and returned, to wit, James Graham Jones, &c. being called, then came, who being elected, tried, and sworn to speak the truth of and concerning the premises, upon their oath, said, that the said Thos. Jennings was not guilty of the premises aforesaid above specified, in manner and form as the said Thos. Jennings, for himself above by his plea had alleged, whereupon all and singular the premises being seen, and by the said justices and Commissioners there fully understood, it was considered by the said Court there, that the said Thos. Jennings, of the premises aforesaid in the indictment last aforesaid above specified, should be discharged, and should go thereof without day, as by the record thereof more fully and at large appears, which said judgment still remains in full force and effect, and not in the least reversed or made void. And the said Thos. Jennings, in fact, saith that he, the said Thos. Jennings, and the said Thos. Jennings so indicted and acquitted as last aforesaid, are one and the same person, and not other or different persons and that the felonies of which he the Thos. Jennings was so indicted and acquitted as aforesaid, and the felonies in the said first count of the present indictment mentioned, are the very same felonies, and not other or different felonies; and the said Thos. Jennings further says that the said court before whom the said Thos. Jennings was so indicted and acquitted as aforesaid had full and competent power and jurisdiction to try the said felonies, and to acquit him, the said Thomas Jennings, thereof, and to do all the things so recorded to have been done by the said last-mentioned court as aforesaid, and this he, the said Thos. Jennings, is ready to verify, wherefore he prays judgment, and that by the Court here he may be dismissed and discharged from the said premises in the said first count of the present indictment specified. There was a like plea to each of the other counts.

To these pleas the following demurrers were put in. And John Clark, esq. who for our said Lady the Queen prosecutes in this behalf, as to the plea of the said Thos. Jennings, by him to the first count of the said indictment pleaded, saith, that the same and the matters therein contained in manner and form as the same are above pleaded and set forth, are not sufficient in law to bar or preclude our said Lady the Queen from further prosecuting the said first count, and that our said Lady the Queen is not bound by the law of the land to answer the same, and this he, the said John Clark, is ready to verify, wherefore, for want of a sufficient plea in this behalf, the said John Clark, for our said Lady the Queen, prays judgment, and that the said T. Jennings may further answer to the said first count, &c."

There was a similar demurrer to each of the other pleas. The joinder in demurrer was in these terms.

"And the said Thomas Jeunnings saith, that the said plea by him to the first count of the said indictment pleaded, and the matters therein contained in manner and form as the same are above pleaded and set forth, are sufficient in law to bar and preclude our said Lady the Queen from further prosecuting the said first count of the said indictment against the said Thomas Jennings, and the said T. Jennings is ready to verify and prove the same as the said court here shall direct and award. Whereupon, inasmuch as the said John Clark, for our said Lady the Queen hath not answered the said plea, nor hitherto in any manner denied the same, the said T. Jennings prays judgment, and that by the Court here he may be dismissed and discharged from the said premises in the said first count of the said indictment specified."

Payne (with whom was Lush), on the part of the Crown. The present indictment consists of two parts. It charges first, that the defendant with another person, on the 1st of November, in the ninth year of her Majesty's reign, at London, within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, illegally and feloniously did man, &c. a vessel called the Augusta, to accomplish certain objects, against the Act of Parliament. It alleges, secondly, that the defendant did illegally and feloniously ship on board the said vessel certain articles for the purposes of the slave trade.

The first part of the plea of autrefois acquit sets out a former trial at Sierra Leone under a commission, by which certain parties had authority to try the offences thereinafter mentioned. (It was subsequently conceded that the Court there had such authority to try.) It goes on to say that the jurors presented that on the 7th of February, in the fourth year of the reign of her Majesty, upon the high seas within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, the defendant did feloniously take charge of the same vessel as master, he well knowing the same was engaged and employed in the slave-trade. The 2nd count was to the same effect, except that it alleged his knowledge that the vessel was meant to be employed for the purpose of the slave-trade. The plea then avers that the defendant was found "not guilty," with an allegation that he is the person now charged, and that the said felony is the same as is contained in this indictment. We, on the part of the Crown, thought it advisable not to traverse the averment that the offences were the same, but as the record shews on its face that the offences were different, we have demurred to the plea. R. v. Taylor (3 B. & C. 502) decides on such a plea that if the offences appear on the record to be different, an averment that they are the same will be of no avail. There the charge was the keeping of a gaming-house on a certain day, and the plea alleged an acquittal on an indictment which charged the same offence on a different day. Such is precisely the case here. But the distinction between them is apparent, not only in the date, but in the substance of the charges themselves. If put side by side, this will be manifest.

The present indictment is for equipping, navigating, and shipping goods on board, &c. This he might do without taking the command, as the indictment set out in the plea charges. Can the averment, then, that they are the same, be proved against the palpable difference that appears on the face of the record? In Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown, b. ii. c. 35, s. 3, there is this passage: "I take it to be clear, that if the nature of the crime be in substance the same, a variance may generally be helped by proper averments." But here there is nothing but the general averment of identity to help a variance not in immaterial matter, but in the very nature and substance of the two charges.

Lush was then about to address the Court.

WIGHTMAN, J.—We only intend to hear one counsel on each side.

M. D. Hill, Q.C. called Cresswell, J.'s attention to a case in which, under similar circumstances, the Attorney and Solicitor-General were heard.

CRESSWELL, J.—It was so, but there was then no discussion on the point.

WIGHTMAN, J.—Precisely such a demurrer as this was argued before me at Winchester, and I heard but one counsel on each side. But surely there must have been numberless cases by which the practice, one way or the other, was settled.

M. D. Hill suggested that different rules might prevail in different courts, and that with regard to this particular instance it had been taken for granted by the counsel on both sides that each was to be heard.

WIGHTMAN, J.—If it has been so arranged let it be done on this occasion; but it might be understood distinctly that such a proceeding is to form no precedent for the future.

Lush.—The indictment as set out in the plea consists of two counts. The first count charges, &c. (See the plea, supra.) It is framed on the 10th sec. of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113. Now there is no part o. that section which makes it unlawful to carry goods which are to be used in the slave-trade. The allegation is very loosely worded. For instance, it is charged, "he well knowing the vessel was engaged." It ought to have been averred that he so knew at the precise time when he took the command. Again—"The vessel was engaged in taking goods to a certain place, which goods were to be employed in the slave trade." There is no allegation that he knew they were to be so employed; neither is it alleged that he was taking goods to a place where the slave trade was carried on. It is clear that, on a count of this kind, no judgment could have been given; and therefore, the prisoner never having been put in jeopardy, the plea of autrefois acquit is bad. Moreover, the slave trade is not absolutely prohibited by this Act. There may be a slave trade which is lawful. The 13th section provides that nothing in this Act should be construed to prevent persons bartering, &c. any slaves, &c. belonging to his Majesty, if they are to be kept in the island. The count in the plea does not negative this exception, and is bad on that ground. The second count appears to be still more objectionable. It avers that he did feloniously take charge and command, &c. he well knowing that the vessel was employed or intended to be employed, &c. This is bad from being in the alternative. It should have shewn to which of the two his knowledge applied. But further, it might be that the vessel was intended to be so employed at some future time, even after his command should have ceased. There is no averment confining it to the period of such command, nor any thing to shew by whom the vessel was intended to be used. There is nothing, moreover, to shew what sort of goods were carried. They might be clothes, or food—mere necessaries, in fact, without which the slaves could not exist; and it cannot be contended that these would be within the meaning of the Act.

Hill, Q.C. (with whom were Prendergast and V. Williams), for the defendant.—The same objections that have been taken to the indictment in the plea will equally apply to that on which the prisoner is now charged. First, with regard to the place, it will assuredly turn out that nothing was done within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, except with regard to the enlargement of that jurisdiction, and if it does not extend to the offences charged in the former indictment, neither does it extend to the present. The venue is laid in London, but no offence has been there committed. It is said, that by comparing the indictments it will clearly appear that the charges are not the same. I am justified in saying that every intendment will be made in favour of an acquittal. The first four counts here charge an offence by navigating the vessel. In the charge at Sierra Leone it is for navigating as master. It is true this may be a different offence. A felony may be committed by a person who is not master; but supposing the fact to be that he was so, each mode of laying the charge would be good, and all, therefore, that can be said is that the authorities at Sierra Leone have adopted one mode, here the other has been followed. The being in command of a ship would have procured a conviction on the ground of navigating: the question must have gone to the jury, and must have been decided. The acquittal was general, and on both counts; therefore if either can be sustained, the judgment must stand. As to the objection to the second count, that it is in the alternative, it cannot be now sustained. A different rule of construction will be used with regard to an indictment to be tried by the Court, and one which comes merely collaterally before it. Indictments may be bad for some purposes but good for others. As to the present indictment it is divided into two sets of four counts each. The first four are clearly bad for duplicity, or rather multiplicity of felonies contained in each. It is alleged that the defendant did navigate, that he did equip, that he did use, &c. This averment runs through the first four counts. Now the vessel must be manned before she starts upon her voyage; therefore that must be a distinct felony from the navigating. And so of the other acts charged. This objection disposes of the first four counts. As to the second set, one short remark will dispose of them. The scienter is omitted in all. But there is another objection to the whole indictment. The 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, does not render slave trading illegal in general. It is subject to some exceptions.

WIGHTMAN, J.—And they are in the enacting part of the clause, and therefore should appear upon the pleadings.

CRESSWELL, J.—The charge is, that these several acts were performed for the purpose of doing what the statute declares to be illegal. But it declares it to be so with certain exceptions and not absolutely.

Hill.—The Acts of any Legislature must be bounded by the territory over which it has control, and the operation of this Act will not extend beyond her Majesty's dominions. It is necessary therefore that the indictment should contain either this,—that the voyage was within the limits of the British empire, or that the party committing the offence was a natural born subject. Here is an act which the law of England has made an offence, but it is not an offence if it take place in another country. It was not until the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 98, that British natural born subjects were prohibited from slaving any where.. By the 6 Geo. 4, the Legislature used words which must be limited to the general principle. That Act does not apply to British subjects that were out of the jurisdiction; but even if it did, an averment to that effect would be necessary.

V. Williams (on the same side).—First, with regard to the duplicity apparent in the indictment. The same rule holds in criminal as in civil cases.

WIGHTMAN, J.—In order to accomplish a particular act, which the Legislature meant to prevent, he does all the things enumerated in the indictment, but the whole series comprehends but one offence. I recollect an indictment which was held good under the Stamp Act; there the words "cut, tear, and get off," &c. were used.

CRESSWELL, J.—When the whole is proved, you have proved but one offence, though possibly each might be an offence of itself. If by employing the word "use" alone, you might give evidence of the rest, why might they not be pleaded?

WILLIAMS, J.—Each of these is described as a felony by the Act, and therefore five or six felonies are charged in the indictment.

CRESSWELL, J.—Does not the statute mean that whoever should do a certain Act, or should take certain steps towards it, as in burglary, it is alleged that the prisoner did break in with intent to steal, and did steal.

WILLIAMS, J.—That might be decided to be bad, if the question were raised as it is here by these pleadings. In Archbold's Criminal Pleading, p. 50, it is said, "The defendant must not be charged with two or more offences in any one count of the indictment." "The only exceptions are found in indictments for burglary," the same instance being given as your lordship puts. By this indictment each of the defendants might be convicted of different acts. (R. v. Fuller, 1 B. & P. 181.)

Payne (in reply).—With regard to the four last counts, I must admit that they cannot be sustained. As to the question of duplicity, this case cannot be distinguished from a "stabbing, cutting, and wounding," which words are constantly used, and without any objection, on the score of duplicity. Then as to the alleged necessity of averring that the defendant was a British subject, or that the offence was committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, our answer is, that the indictment states the offence to have taken place in London. If this is wrong, it is for the defendant to plead it. Besides which, the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 73, repeals all the exceptions which have been referred to.

At the conclusion of the argument,

WIGHTMAN, J. observed:—Though upon many of these objections we entertain no doubt whatever, still there are others of a very important character, and consequently we shall not give judgment until the next session. Accordingly in the October session the following judgment of Mr. Justice Wightman and Mr. Justice Cresswell was read by Mr. Baron Rolfe:—In the case of Thomas Jennings, an argument took place before us at the last sessions, on a demurrer to a plea of autrefois acquit at Sierra Leone, to an indictment on the 5th Geo. 4, c. 113, s. 10. On the part of the Crown, several objections to the plea were made; but the counsel for the prisoner, very little relying on its validity, objected to the indictment as bad in substance. As to some of the points made, we thought it right to take time for consideration. We entertain no doubt that the plea is bad. The offence charged in the indictment at Sierra-Leone as set out in the plea, appearing on the face of it to be different from that which is the subject of the indictment in this Court. This objection is not removed by the averment of identity. (Reg. v. Taylor, 3 B. & C. 502.) We have, therefore, to consider the validity of the objections that were urged to the indictment. The indictment contains eight counts founded upon the 10th section of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, and it was admitted upon the argument by the counsel for the Crown, that the last four counts in the indictment could not be supported, on account of the omission of the words knowingly and wilfully, which are used in the statute in describing the offence proposed to be charged upon the prisoner in these counts. The question, therefore, is, whether the first four counts, or any of them, are good. The first count stated that the prisoner, after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1825, to wit, on the first day of November, in the fourth year of the reign of Queen Victoria, with force and arms, to wit, at London aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the said Court, that is, of the Central Criminal Court, did illegally and feloniously man, navigate, equip, depatch, use, and employ a certain ship or vessel, to wit, a ship or vessel called the Augusta, in order to accomplish a certain object, which, in and by the said Act of Parliament, made and passed in the fifth year of the reign of his late Majesty Geo. 4, entitled an Act to amend and consolidate the Laws relating to the abolition of the Slave Trade, was and is declared unlawful, namely to deal and trade in slaves, contrary to the form, &c. The three following counts only varied from the first in describing the object of the several acts charged to have been done by the prisoner differently, as in the Act of Parliament. To these counts it was objected, in the first place, that each was bad, as charging several distinct felonies, the statute making it a felony to fit out, man, navigate, equip, despatch, use, or employ any ship or vessel, in order to accomplish any of the objects therein before declared unlawful, and each count charging the prisoner with having done all the acts before mentioned, each of which would have been of itself a a felony, if done with the object stated in the act; but we think that each count contains a charge of one felony only, the whole being alleged to have been done to accomplish one and the same single object, the essence of the felony consisting in using the means described in the act to accomplish that object. It was also contended that these counts were bad for not negativing the exceptions in the act, of circumstances which might render the transaction lawful. But on reference to the subsequent statute, 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 73, s. 12, it appears to us that these exceptions are virtually repealed, and that for this purpose the 10th section of 5 G. 4, c. 113, must be considered as if they never existed, and it is to be observed that the offences in the present indictment are charged to have been committed in the reign of her present Majesty, and therefore necessarily after the passing of the repealing statute. Another objection was, that the indictment contained no allegation that the prisoner was a British subject, or that the offence was committed within her Majesty's dominions, but we think that the indictment does in substance allege it to have been committed within her Majesty's dominions. It is stated in each count to have been committed at London, within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, and therefore primâ facie at least within the district mentioned in the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 36, s. 2. Upon the argument our attention was drawn to the 50th sec. of 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, by which it is enacted that all offences committed against that Act might be inquired of, tried, determined, and dealt with, as if the same had been committed within the body of the county of Middlesex. Without determining what might be the effect of that clause upon an indictment differently framed from the present one, we are of opinion that it has no application to this, in which no use is attempted to be made of that section. All the objections that were urged to the indictment appear to us to be substantially included within those to which we have adverted, and for the reasons assigned we are of opinion that the first four counts of the indictment are good in substance, and that our judgment upon the demurrer must be for the Crown.

Michaelmas Term, 1844.

READ AND ANOTHER v. HODGENS.

Will—Construction of—Residuary estate—Superstitious uses.

Testator devised as follows. "I further order that all my effects be sold by auction, and all such money and valuables as I may die possessed of, be handed over to D. to be by him applied to the use and benefit of my sister K. widow, weekly or monthly, a certain sum, according to his discretion, not exceeding 20 guineas or thereabouts per annum, taking care to see the rent of her apartments regularly paid: and if, after her demise, there remain any residue, I direct such residue to be expended in masses for my soul's sake; and in case of my death in a foreign country, I trust H. will recover any money that may remain of the letter of credit which he has had the goodness to obtain from N. to be applied as above directed. My Royal Canal Stock is to be sold, also my Grand Canal debentures, as necessity may require, at the discretion of my executors or executor above mentioned."

Held, that the direction, "that all my effects be sold by auction," overruled the whole clause, and was a disposition of the entire residue of the testator's effects.

Held, also, that the bequest, "to be expended in masses for my soul's sake," was not void as a superstitious use.

His HONOUR said the bill in this case was filed by the plaintiffs, as next of kin to the Rev. Nicholas Kearnes, described therein as late parish priest of Rathfarnham. The bill prays that an account may be taken of the assets of the testator which came to the hands of the defendant, and of the testator's debts, legacies, funeral and testamentary expenses; and for payment of a residue to plaintiff, which their bill contends not to have been disposed of in the will. The defendant is now sole executor of the estate, the Rev. Patrick Duigenan, who was named as a joint-executor, having died before the death of the testator, and the defendant, in his capacity of executor, has demurred to the plaintiffs' bill for want of equity. By that demurrer the defendant contends that there was a valid distribution of the whole residue made in the will; and if he be right in that, this suit is negatived; but if there be any, even the smallest portion of assets undisposed of, the plaintiffs' right to sue remains indisputable. The bill charges that the testator was possessed of considerable personal estate, consisting, amongst other matters, of household furniture and effects, cash, Grand Canal and other debentures, and Royal Canal and Government stock; and further states that he made a will on the 5th of September, 1827, in which, after bequeathing several legacies, and appointing the Rev. Patrick Duigenan, and the defendant, Robert Hodgens, as his executors, proceeded—"I further order that all my effects be sold by auction, and all such money and valuables as I may die possessed of be handed over to the Rev. Mr. Duigenan, of Meath-street, to be by him applied to the use and benefit of my sister, Mary Kenny, widow, weekly or monthly, a certain sum, according to his discretion, not exceeding 20 guineas or thereabouts per annum, taking care to see the rent of her apartments regularly paid; and if, after her demise, there remain any residue, I direct such residue to be expended for masses for my soul's sake; and in case of my death in a foreign country, I trust Mr. Hodgens will recover any money that may remain of the letter of credit which he has had the goodness to obtain from John O'Neill, esq. to be applied as above directed. My Royal Canal Stock is to be sold, also my Grand Canal Debentures, as necessity may require, at the discretion of my executors or executor above mentioned." It is on this clause that the case depends: the plaintiff insists that this does not dispose of the whole residue of the personal estate of testator, but of part only; and if this be so the demurrer must be overruled. The plaintiff further insists, that, even if it be held that this word "residue" includes the residue of the whole property, still the bequest is a bequest for superstitious uses, and is therefore void according to the policy of the laws. If this point be correct, then the property must be held as undisposed of, and as belonging by right to the next of kin of the testator. The first point is a question of construction, and may be thus taken—has the testator expressed his will to be, that after payment of certain legacies the residue of all his property shall be applicable, after his sister's death, to be expended in masses for the good of his soul? This depends on the meaning of the clause. Now, in the first member of that clause we have a distinct direction to have all the testator's effects sold by auction. There is not any express direction to pay to the Rev. Patrick Duigenan the produce of this sale, though it may have been, as I conceive, intended, for it is evident that Duigenan was to be a trustee, with considerable discretionary powers, of a fund for support of testator's sister, and was on her behalf to have at his command property of every description which the execution of this special trust might require. It therefore seems to me impossible to hold that his right or power as trustee was limited to "money and valuables," or that any part of the testator's property was exempted from the trust as long as his sister lived. The word "residue" in the clause must mean the residue after satisfying the trusts so confided—that is, that the fund, whatever it consisted of, which was applicable to her support during her lifetime, also became disposable in discharge of the ultimate trust. When, therefore, I arrive at the conclusion that all the effects were applicable to the payment of the testator's debts and legacies, it seems to me also conclusive that the residue includes all, and that no part of the assets remain undisposed of in the will. The plaintiff's counsel did not contend that the fund left to the Rev. Patrick Duigenan consisted alone of money and valuables, but they contended that the words "all my effects" did not mean the canal stock and debentures, and that the context of the will proved they were excluded. Now, before I consider the argument in support of this construction, it may be useful to refer to some authorities on the subject. His Honour cited various cases in which decisions were given by learned judges, that the word "effects" was equivalent to all personal property, and that it should be so taken, unless where it appeared to be used in a restrictive sense by the context. These are rational interpretations of the word, and it requires a departure from the construction given in all the authorities to hold that the word residue here is to be used in a restrictive sense. I think I have quite sufficiently shewn upon what grounds I have come to the decision I am about to pronounce in this matter. We are then to see whether the general sense of the words "all my effects" is to be restricted by the context, and if there be in the context any thing to shew that the testator did not intend including the canal stock and debentures. It may be observed that in thus narrowing the question I concur with the plaintiffs' counsel that such property cannot pass as money—this is decided in Holham v. Sutton (15 Ves. 266); and we now come to consider the arguments in support of the restricted sense. The plaintiffs, in arguing for the restricted sense of the word "effects," state that the effects here mentioned are ordered to be sold by auction, and that stock cannot be so disposed of. It is certainly true that in ordinary cases stock of this description is seldom sold by auction; but though it cannot be transferred to a purchaser otherwise than by a written contract, yet it is not improbable that a possessor of such stock would consider a sale by auction the best way of increasing its value. This argument, however, becomes of very little value when we have much better grounds for shewing that these words cannot be taken to have a restrictive operation. The direction to sell the effects is one for the government of the executors, and can be hardly said to have been given with a view of specifying particular items to be sold or excluding by description any items not to be disposed of. [His Honour cited the case of Hearne v. Wiggins (6 Man. 619), in support of the view.] In this case it was uncertain at the time of making the will what the testator's property might consist of at his death, and the direction in the will was, that the residue of the property should be converted into money for the benefit of the residuary legatee, and this is a strong authority against the inference here adduced from the direction to sell by auction. A further argument on the part of the plaintiffs is rested upon the constructive direction in the will that there shall be a sale as necessity may require; this, it is said, shews that Canal Stock and debentures cannot be held as having passed as effects, for if they had, they should, as effects, have been immediately sold by auction. In my opinion, the proper construction is to exclude the stock and debentures from the direction to sell by auction, but not to narrow the general operation of the word effects: its meaning seems to me to be this—that the effects generally should be sold by auction, but that as there was a portion already invested, and producing an annual income, such should not be sold except necessity required, which necessity, and the extent of it, the executors were to determine. If that was the meaning of the testator, as I believe it was, full operation will be given to the clause without limiting the word effects. The stock and debentures, of which, it is to be observed, there is no particular description made, were also, in my opinion, liable for the benefit of the testator's sister; as assets, all were to be applied to her use while she lived; and, therefore, I repeat my opinion, that the word residue is not to be limited by the construction of the will. As to the second point relied upon by the plaintiffs, to which I before adverted, I now come to make a few observations. They say that a residuary bequest for masses, being for superstitious uses, becomes void—that the property is, therefore, undisposed of, and belongs of right to them as next of kin. This question was argued with great ability by the gentlemen at both sides, and, together with the valuable assistance received from them, I myself gave the subject all the time and attention which it was in my power to command. But before I formed any opinion, I was put in possession of a decree in a case decided by Lord Manners in 1823 a decision upon a question precisely similar to this; and on the authority of that decision, I have now to declare that the bequest is valid, and that the second ground upon which the title of the plaintiffs rested is removed. [His Honour stated briefly the case referred to, by which it appeared that in the year 1822 Mrs. Judith Rush left at her death several sums to the Rev. Messrs. M'Cormack and Rouke to be appropriated to masses for her soul's sake. Exception was taken to bequests by the Commissioners of Charitable Donations, and a bill was accordingly filed against her executor, Mr. Thomas Walsh. The argument before Lord Manners occupied two days, and the exceptions taken by the plaintiffs were eventually overruled, and the bequests held valid, and an order was accordingly made that the executor should pay the several sums for the purposes specified in the will of the testatrix.] This, therefore, continued his Honour, closes all further discussion on this point; and, as I before stated, in deference to the authority of that decree, from which I am far from saying that anything has occurred to form in my mind any grounds of dissent—I say in obedience to that decree I of course rule for the defendant, and allow this demurrer. The only other matter to which I would refer, and I think the case has not been mentioned before—is a judgment of Lord Lyndhurst in Walsh v. Gladstone, in Phillips's Reports.

Deasy.—It was not mentioned before, my lord.

His Honour cited the case, in which, though the grounds were not precisely similar, the principle of the decision was sustained, and, in conclusion, gave judgment for the defendant, allowing the demurrer.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

IN this department of the LAW TIMES, we have only to direct attention to the extraordinary course pursued by Mr. Baron GURNEY in the trials of prisoners, which has been commented upon in a leading article. The more we think of it, the more we feel the impropriety, if not the illegality, of his practice.

REVIEW OF MAGISTRATES' CASES,

In Michaelmas Term, 1844.

ALTHOUGH the cases touching the duties of magistrates, decided during last term, have been far from unusually numerous, Reg. v. Ellis and Reg. v. Wilson are sufficiently important to characterize the term, they having both of them decided hitherto undetermined points of much practical moment.

The improbability that a measure so faulty and unpopular as the proposed Settlement Bill will survive next session, renders it as necessary as it ever was to note the leading judgments and decisions of the Court of Queen's Bench, which is, and in all likelihood will continue to be, the only standard and exponent of what the law is in this extensive branch of practice. We are induced to state this, because we are aware that in some quarters an inattention to the current of cases has grown up, built on the fallacious expectation that the old law would be soon swept away. With all its manifold defects, it will take more wisdom to improve upon it than that which inspired the authors of the new Bill. Added to the difficulty of introducing so large a change as the abolition of all removals, is the growing feeling that no botching of the present system, short of such abolition, would be practically beneficial; for all new schemes must introduce fresh doubt and litigation. It is, therefore, all but certain that the existing law will remain unchanged for some time to come.

We proceed to review the leading decisions of last Term.

SWEARING IN OF CHURCHWARDENS.

Reg. v. The Archdeacon of Coventry (4 Law T. 92).—This case is not otherwise of importance than as shewing that a rule will be granted absolute in the first instance for a mandamus to compel an archdeacon to admit churchwardens, such office being purely ministerial. A peremptory mandamus, however, will not issue so as to prevent a return. We believe a return has been made, and this case will therefore be again before our readers. The question may then arise, whether, although the ordinary's function is clearly ministerial (Bac. Abr. Churchwardens, A.); and though in general he cannot control or inquire into the validity of an election, Morgan v. Cardigan (1 Salk. 166), he may not object to a person obviously disqualified, whose election was void: for offices the most ministerial leave a discretion not to join in an illegal act. (1 Hag. Consist. Rep. 10.) Suppose a practising barrister or attorney is presented to the archdeacon, is he bound to admit him?

REMOVAL OF PAUPER LUNATICS TO COUNTY ASYLUMS.

Reg. v. Ellis (4 Law T. 113), has decided a new point arising upon the construction of the 38th section of 9 Geo. 4, c. 40, which requires the justices, "to cause the person to be conveyed to, and placed in the county lunatic asylum, established under the direction of this, or any former Act: and if no such county lunatic asylum shall have been established, then to some public hospital, or some house duly licensed for the reception of insane persons." Now, in this case there was a county lunatic asylum, at Hanwell, in the county of Middlesex, but the asylum was full. The justices had therefore removed the pauper to an asylum in Surrey. The learned counsel for the order of removal suggested that an asylum full was tantamount to no asylum at all, and put the case of a county whose asylum was swallowed by an earthquake; but the Court, unshaken by the earthquake argument, held that this statute must be literally construed; that the case was one for which no special exception had been made, and that the Court had no power to import one into the Act. The tendency of many recent cases has been to increase the rigour of the construction of statutes. This case is perhaps the most extreme one of all, and certainly overrules the principle that where manifest inconvenience results from the literal construction, which is repugnant to the plain intention of a statute, its express terms need not be strictly followed. As regards the Act in question, it follows that the justices are not empowered to remove even to a private asylum or licensed house, even though in the same county, when there is a county asylum already established, which is full. Neither by section 45 of the Poor Law Act can "any lunatic or idiot" be kept in workhouses above fourteen days. Under such circumstances, it is difficult to suggest any means save that of the parish providing proper care of the pauper, and sending him in proper custody to the place of his settlement, and so to proceed precisely as in the case of a sane pauper. If he is too ill to be removed (which will rarely occur), the proceeding must be as in cases of suspended removals.

EVIDENCE OF CHARGEABILITY.

Reg. v. St. Anne's, Westminster (4 Law T. 112), gave another instance of the forlorn bewilderment of some parishes as to the requisite evidence of chargeability. All that the examination contained was this statement by the pauper, "Examinant further saith upon her oath that she hath, together with her children, become chargeable to the parish of St. James, Westminster, and are now actually chargeable thereto." It would hardly be supposed that the judgment in Reg. v. High Bickington (1 Bit. & Sym. M. C. 1) had been so lately pronounced in this very city of Westminster; the chief parish of which is still ignorant of how orders are to state chargeability!

The order was quashed without argument. When will parishes learn to let some one witness state the fact, that relief is given, and, if possible, the amount and date of it? It is really a rare thing to see an order perfect in this respect. Where the statutable certificate of chargeability is given, it is very commonly defective by not proving the seal and the signature of the chairman and the secretary, both of which are essential, and neither of which prove themselves. (Reg. v. Farthinghoe, 1 Bit. & Sym. M.C. 46.)

APPRENTICESHIP—SETTLEMENT—MISNOMER IN INDENTURE.

Reg. v. Wooldale (4 Law T. 132), in some degree relaxes the rigour with which deeds essential to settlements are to be regarded. It would be tedious, and scarcely useful, to dilate upon the detail of specific informalities of expression, with which this particular indenture swarmed, inasmuch as they will be found at length in the part just published of Bit. & Sym. M. C. Verulam Reports, p. 134. It suffices to state that in this case the chief informality was a misnomer, the apprentice having been first called John, then Joseph, and the signature was in his right name, Joseph. It was held that this could not mislead. Then, again, it did not clearly and expressly appear how long the binding was for: the indenture merely saying that it was until the lad should attain the age of twenty-one years, and this was ungrammatically stated. It might, therefore, have been that only a few days elapsed between the binding and the twenty-first birthday. But this was held to be holpen by other provisions expressly of a yearly nature. So that altogether, clumsy, illiterate, and blundering as the indenture was, it passed muster, and the order was upheld.

TENEMENT SETTLEMENT; SUFFICIENCY OF EXAMINATION.

Reg. v. Honley (4 Law T. 132) is an instructive example of the slovenly and insufficient statement of the time during which tenements were rented. The words were these:—

When I was about thirty years of age, I went to live in the township of Honley. In the year 1821, and whilst I still resided in the same place, I rented and occupied between three and four acres of land at Scoll Gate Head, in Honley aforesaid, of John Todd, of Honley aforesaid, clothier, of the annual value of 7*l.* and for which I paid 7*l.* rent for many years. In the year 1821, and at the same time that I so occupied the land of John Todd, I also rented and occupied three acres of land at Scoll Gate Head aforesaid, of one John Bottomley, of Meltham, sizer-boiler, of the annual value of 7*l.*, at 7*l.* rent, which I occupied for one year, and then gave it up in the year 1822.

In the first place there is no averment of the payment of any rent for the second parcel of land therein mentioned; although the statute then in force (in 1821, 59 Geo. 3, c. 50) expressly requires that the rent shall have been "actually paid."

In the second place there is no statement of any occupation of the first land for any specific period. It is essential that there should be occupation of land for one whole year, by the terms of the statute, though it is not necessary that houses should be occupied, but merely holden. (See Rex v. Stow Bardolph, 1 B. & Ad. 219, and Rex v. Great Bolton, 8 B. & Cr. 71.) But where the tenement is land, under that statute there must have been occupancy for the whole year. (Rex v. Ockley, 1 B. & Adol. 818.) In both cases there must have been residence in the parish where the tenement is for forty days. (Rex v. Whaplect, 8 B. & C. 227.) The grounds of appeal were, that "the examination shewed no occupation or holding by the said M. W. of any tenement of the yearly value of 10*l.* for forty days during 1821, or any such occupation or holding of any such tenement of the yearly value of 10*l.* for forty days during any other year or years." We confess that we should have thought that this ground of appeal was bad. It is not at all necessary that the tenement should be of the "yearly value" of 10*l.* under 59 Geo. 3, c. 50, so long as that rent was actually paid. The case of Rex v. Ashfield-cum-Thorpe (9 B. & Cr. 930) is a distinct authority on the point; but even if the man had occupied for forty days, that would not have sufficed. There is a confusion between residence in the parish and occupation of the land. However, the Court held that the grounds of appeal sufficiently let in the appellants to shew the insufficiency of the examination; and with our unfeigned deference to the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, we must conclude that the grounds sufficiently state the defects in this case; but parishes will do well to understand the law, before they draw objections based upon it. We know a parish which spent 137*l.* upon grounds drawn by some wise person, "who did them cheap," and failed to quash the order, though it was clearly bad, thus saddling themselves with the pauper. Economies of this kind are rather costly in the long run.

The same settlement is involved in the case of Reg. v. St. Sepulchre, Northampton (4 Law T. 138), but there the date of the letting was in 1839, bringing it under the terms of 1 Wm. 4, c. 18, which requires houses, as well as land, to be occupied for the term of one year by the person hiring the same,(a) under a yearly hiring. The question in this case was, whether this sufficiently appeared in the following examination:—

"I let a house to John Adams at the rent of 10*l.* a year, in July 1839. The said John Adams occupied the house, and paid the whole of the rent during that time." The pauper, who was the wife of John Adams, stated, "In July 1839, my husband hired a house of Mrs. Brown (the landlady). We resided in that house until March 1842."

It was here held by Lord Denman, C. J. that this did not sufficiently shew a holding or an occupancy for a year; Williams, J. concurring. Wightman, J. agreed that the statement of occupancy was insufficient, but not the statement of the letting and hiring. Coleridge, J. dissented wholly from the other judges, and held every thing to be stated which was necessary. Reg. v. The Recorder of Pontefract (2 Q.B. 548) was relied on by the Court and in the argument, that nothing must be left to surmise or inference in these essential statements. Supposing that there was some degree of rigour in this case, where is the difficulty in plainly and fully stating that the man occupied the house for and during the whole of the said year? Parishes really cannot complain with any justice of costs they entail upon themselves by this stupid carelessness. The removing parish will have paid, and will hereafter pay, for aught we know, 100*l.* for each word omitted. Would it not have been as well to have paid a guinea or two for competent professional advice as to the evidence and statements necessary? There was clearly a good settlement, which they have now debarred themselves from proving for ever.

POWER OF QUARTER SESSIONS TO QUASH INDICTMENTS.

In our last Review of the Cases in Trinity Term, we entered at some length upon this question, and gave grounds and cases for the conclusion that Courts of Quarter Sessions possess full power to quash indictments. The case of Reg. v. Wilson (4 Law T. 153) confirms our view. The dictum in Jervis's Archbold (p. 66) is overruled. The main question was decided on the ground that there is a common law jurisdiction on the part of the Sessions to do all that is requisite to be done for the ends of justice by courts of assize. The quashing of indictments falls within these requirements, and is a power exercised constantly by judges of assize. The indictment must, however, be always quashed before plea pleaded. It, however, by no means follows that the mode in which the justices exercise their jurisdiction is not to be subject to the revision of the Court of Queen's Bench. In this case, from what fell from the Court, it is clear that the mode in which the power of quashing was here exercised might be questioned, and the order, perhaps, set aside. The mode, however, of doing this, would be by writ of error, and not as was attempted in this case by writ of certiorari.(b) We cannot now enter upon the peculiarities of this case; inasmuch as the Court refused to go into them under the motion as it was then made; but if the matter proceed further, we shall most unhesitatingly deal with all the facts and bearings of the case as strict justice may seem to us to require. Mr. Newton, who was the prosecutor below, entered into many of the circumstances of the case, but these form at present an ex parte statement, and give us no sufficient warranty or data to say more.

The point which is fully decided, and decided for the first time, by an express decision on the point, is, that Courts of Quarter Sessions have full power to quash indictments before plea pleaded. The report in the LAW TIMES, together with the remarks we previously made on this case when the rule was obtained for the certiorari, dispense with the necessity for further comment on the case as it stands.

Next week we shall review one or two other cases which occurred last Term.

(a) The 6 Geo. 4, c. 57, which intervened, had omitted to do this.

(b) We shall probably give a few brief rules ere long for the correction of orders made at sessions.

POOR LAW CIRCULAR.

4. REMOVAL OF AN IRISH MOTHER AND CHILDREN.

July 24, 1844.

Clerk of East Retford Union—Stated that an Irishman deserted his wife, an Irishwoman, and three infant children, about eight years ago. The woman had since resided in a parish in the East Retford Union, and had had three children born during her husband's absence since 1834. Inquired, whether the mother and her children (as well those born while the husband and wife lived together, as those born during his absence), might be removed to Ireland. Observed that it is laid down in 3 Archbold's Justice of the Peace (ed. 1844), that the bastard children of Irish mothers are not so removable; and some doubt is suggested whether the Poor Law Amendment Act applies (as respects the settlement of bastards) to the children of Irishwomen.

Ans.—The woman being an Irishwoman by birth, and not having any settlement in England, is removable to Ireland under 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 40, with such of her legitimate children as are not emancipated. The case is distinguishable from Rex v. Cottenham (7 B. & C. 615). There the wife was not born in Ireland, and had a maiden settlement in this country; and the Court held that in the absence of her husband she could not be removed to Ireland, but was properly removed to her maiden settlement. In the case stated in your letter, the woman has no maiden settlement, but is directly within the terms of the first section of 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 40, viz. a person born in Ireland, not having gained any settlement in England. With regard to the children alleged to be illegitimate, having been born during the absence of the husband, and since the 14th of August, 1834, Rex v. Mile End Old Town (4 A. & E. 196) shews that they cannot be removed with the mother to Ireland. It must be observed, however, that as the woman is a married woman, the principle of course is that the children are legitimate, unless non-access on the part of the husband be proved; and this fact must be shewn by some other evidence than the oath of the wife herself. (See R. v. Reading, quoted in 1 Burn's Justice, 327.)

SERVANTS.

MAINTENANCE OF IN SICKNESS.

June 11, 1844.

Clerk of Bedminster Union—Stated, that application had been made to the guardians by a ratepayer for an allowance of weekly relief and a nurse for his domestic servant, she being confined to her bed in his house by illness. The guardians doubted whether they ought to grant relief to a domestic servant, under such circumstances, and wished the Commissioners' advice upon the subject.

Ans.—In the absence of any agreement on the subject, a master is not bound to provide his servant with medical attendance, if the latter fall sick during the period of service. There may be cases in which the earnings of a yearly-hired servant are so small as to be obviously insufficient to enable him to procure medical attendance at his own cost. The question, whether the guardians, in any particular case, can grant medical relief to a domestic servant, must be determined upon a consideration of the circumstances of such case. For example, the liability of the master under any agreement, or the ability of the servant himself to provide or procure medical aid, independently of the parish. This is a question for the guardians themselves to decide, upon their knowledge of the facts, though it may be observed generally, that the circumstance of a person being in service and earning wages, raises a presumption against the necessity of his resorting to the parish.

SETTLEMENT.

1. BY BIRTH—PROOF.

April 29, 1844.

Rev. Henry Eley, Broomfield Vicarage, Chelmsford—Inquired whether the register of baptism at the parish church was, in itself, sufficient evidence to prove the settlement of the parties baptized.

Ans.—The register of baptism is not, of itself, sufficient evidence to prove the place of birth of any person, with a view to ascertaining his settlement, although it may be adduced as one of the circumstances tending to prove it. (R. v. North Petherton, 5 B. & C. 508; R. v. Lubbenham, 5 B. & Ad. 968.)

2. SETTLEMENT—VALIDITY OF MARRIAGE.

Feb. 23, 1844.

Clerk of Stow-on-the-Wold Union—Inquired as to the validity of the marriage of Sarah Upstone, the same having taken place about three years ago, at Cheltenham, by banns, neither of the parties living at that place either at the time the banns were published, or when the marriage took place.

Ans.—The Commissioners presume that the objection which the statement of facts has suggested to the guardians, is, that the marriage is invalidated by the fact that neither of the parties was actually resident in the parish in which the banns were published and the marriage was solemnized. The Commissioners would direct the attention of the guardians to the 4th Geo. 4, c. 76, by which, section 26, it is provided that after the solemnization of any marriage under a publication of banns, proof of the actual residence of the parties is not necessary to the validity of the marriage; and that in any suit touching the validity of any such marriage, evidence in support of non-residence is not admissible.

VESTRIES.—1. VOTING AT.

April 22, 1844.

Messrs. C. Sanders and W. Hill, jun. Bickland, Budock, near Penryn—Stated, that the larger rate-payers of the parish out-voted the smaller rate-payers, by claiming and exercising the right of voting at a higher scale in proportion to their rental, contending that persons whose rental was under 200*l.* were entitled only to one vote, those under 400*l.* to two votes, and so on, according to the 40th section of the Poor Law Amendment Act. Requested the Commissioners' opinion upon the subject.

Ans.—The scale of voting fixed for rate-payers by the 40th section of the Poor Law Amendment Act, is expressly confined to cases of the election of guardians under that Act, or in which "the consent of the owners of property or rate-payers in any parish or union shall be required for any of the purposes of that Act." The voting at vestries is still regulated by the Vestries Act, 58 Geo. 3, c. 69. (See 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 14.)

2. DITTO.

June 12, 1844.

Rev. ——— stated, that A. B. entered upon a rateable house on the 29th October, 1843: an assessment was made on the 2nd November, 1843, in which A. B.'s name was omitted by the overseer, consequently no rate was demanded from him on that assessment: previous to the next assessment, A. B. claimed to have his name put on the rate-book, and to have the privilege of giving a vote at a vestry meeting, under sections 4 or 5, or both, of 59 Geo. 3, c. 69. Inquired, whether A. B. was entitled to a vote under either of the above sections.

Ans.—After a careful consideration of the case, the Commissioners cannot come to any other conclusion than that, according to the strict letter of the statute, the individual in question was not entitled to vote in vestry under the circumstances which you describe. The 3rd section of the 58 Geo. 3, c. 69, applies only to inhabitants "who shall by the last rate which shall have been made for the relief of the poor, have been assessed and charged," &c. In the case put, the party was not assessed in the last poor-rate made before he came to vote, and therefore, as it appears to the Commissioners, he is not within that section. The 4th section of the same statute refers to those cases only in which "any person shall have become an inhabitant of any parish, or become liable to be rated therein, since the making of the last rate for the relief of the poor thereof." The person alluded to became an inhabitant of the parish, and became liable to be rated therein, on the 29th October; the last rate being made before he claimed to vote, was made on the 2nd November; consequently he became an inhabitant, and became liable to assessment before, and not after, the making of such rate. The Commissioners do not see that the 5th section is any way bears on the question. (See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, ss. 14, 127.)

VESTRY CLERKS.

July 16, 1844.

Mr. James Grant, Skirlaugh—Stated that he had been, in the month of April last, elected vestry clerk of the parish of Skirlaugh, at a salary of 15*l.* per annum, and inquired whether such salary could be legally paid out of the poor-rates, and placed in the overseers' accounts?

Ans.—Whatever powers may belong to the vestry to appoint a clerk to record their proceedings, the law does not appear to have made any provision for the payment of a salary to that officer out of the poor-rates. This appears clear from the judgment of Lord Kenyon, in Rex v. Churchwardens of Croydon (5 T.R. 714). It is true that by section 109 of the Poor Law Amendment Act the word officer is construed to extend amongst others to a vestry clerk. But, though, the effect of this section is to bring any person acting as a vestry clerk, so far as he may be aiding in carrying the laws for the relief of the poor into execution within the control of the Commissioners, it does not thence follow that he is such an officer as the Commissioners have authority to direct the overseers of the parish, or the guardians of any union, to appoint at a salary to be paid out of the poor-rates. The construction which the word officer used in the 46th section 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 76, as explained by the 109th, has received in Reg. v. The Poor Law Commissioners, re The Cambridge Union (2 P. & D. 323), where it was held not to extend to a collector of poor-rates, seems plainly to shew that a less restricted interpretation would not be given if the question were as to the appointment under the section referred to of a vestry clerk, whose ordinary duties and functions are still more foreign to the objects and purposes of the Act than those of a collector.

The Metropolitan Prisons for Debt.—The metropolitan prisons for debt presented a very different appearance on Christmas-day last to what they do on the present occasion. In Whitecross-street Prison there were this time last year upwards of 300 debtors, and now they do not exceed 130, notwithstanding a great influx within the last fortnight—no fewer than 70 persons having taken up their abode there in that period. The prisoners will each receive a piece of beef and some bread, and on New-Year's-day a similar supply. In the Queen's Prison there are but comparatively few to the number of last year, and they will be furnished with an allowance of food, besides other assistance. The Marshalsea prisoners are confined in the same prison, and in the Act consolidating the prisoners, passed two years ago, provision was made in regard to the contributions to those particular prisoners. In Horsemonger-lane there are only 27 debtors. The whole number of debtors confined in the three metropolitan prisons is at the present period under 300, which is about a third of the inmates of last year. The Act of last session, abolishing execution on debts not exceeding 20*l.* has certainly been the cause of the present appearance of debtors' prisons, both in London and the country—in the latter, the prisons are nearly deserted by debtors. Creditors complain that the Act of last session regarded the convenience of debtors, and neglected the interest of creditors; the latter being left to the honesty of the former, and compelled to ask in "bondman's key" for their money. By a return of last session it appears that there were in March last between 3,000 and 4,000 debtors, of which more than 1,600 were confined for debts, exclusive of costs, of under 10*l.*

The following building is certified as a place duly registered for solemnizing marriages, pursuant to the Act of 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 85:—Providence Chapel, Upper Tean, Staffordshire, Thomas Walters, superintendent registrar. The Presbyterian Church, situated at the New-road, in the parish of Woolwich, in the county of Kent, in the district of the Greenwich union. Pencader, situated in the parish of Llanfyhangelrarth, in the county of Carmarthen, in the district of Newcastle in Emlyn. The Independent chapel, Howdon-on-Tyne, situated at Howdon, in the parish of Wallsend, in the county of Northumberland, in the district of Tynemouth union. Providence Chapel, Checkley, Staffordshire.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

A week of holiday is necessarily barren of intelligence. But the next week will bring into operation the very questionable "Transfer of Property Act," and as any opinion upon its doubtful provisions is interesting and may be useful, we take the following from the Times:—

THE TRANSFER OF PROPERTY ACT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

Sir,—The spare room in the Times cannot, I am sure, be more usefully employed than in clearing up any doubts or removing any misconceptions, as to the operation of the Act entitled "An Act to Simplify the Transfer of Property," which is on the eve of coming into operation. My observations will be chiefly confined to the second section; and I am chiefly, indeed solely, induced to send them to you, because every writer, without exception, who has treated of this section seems to me to have misapprehended its object. The section begins thus,—"That every person may convey by any deed, without livery of seisin, or enrolment, or a prior lease, all such, &c." By the present law, an immediate estate of freehold cannot be conveyed to a stranger by deed alone. The deed must be enrolled in Chancery, or must be accompanied by livery of seisin. To a tenant for years in possession it may be released by deed alone; but in order to create the tenancy, there must be a previous demise and entry by the tenant, or a bargain and sale for a term (the well-known lease for a year, which does not require entry). Now, it appears to me quite clear that the section I have quoted only takes away the necessity for the livery of seisin, the enrolment, or the lease for a year. The conveyance is still a feoffment, which by aid of the statute requires no livery of seisin, a bargain and sale not requiring enrolment, or a release not requiring a lease for a year. The act does not give a new statutory mode of conveying the land, but retains the old, dispensing with some of the cumbrous formalities, which were of no use.

The distinction is not unimportant. The chief practical result is, that the words "bargain and sale" must be avoided as carefully in conveyances and uses as the word "grant" used to be in conveyances by trustees. There can be no doubt, I think, that if under the new act A for money bargains and sells land to B and his heirs, to the use of C and his heirs, the legal estate will vest in B.

The writers to whom I allude have all considered this clause as giving a new statutory deed which will operate as a conveyance by force of the statute, and the properties of which remain to be discovered. The forms which have been published contain a new operative word—"convey;" but until the the legal operation of this word is settled, I cannot help fearing there will be some danger in using it. If A enfeoffs B and his heirs, in trust for C. and his heirs, or grants or releases land to B. and his heirs, in trust for C and his heirs, the legal estate is executed in C. If A bargains and sells (for money) to B and his heirs, in trust for C and his heirs, the legal estate remains in B; but if A "conveys" land to B. and his heirs, in trust for C and his heirs, who can say where the legal estate is?

The word "release," and the idea of a release, should be generally given up, except where it is appropriate, and conveyances of freeholds should be considered as feoffments or grants, according as they are conveyances of freeholds in possession or in remainder, and the most appropriate operative words would seem to be "give and grant," or give, grant, and confirm."

The construction of the 2nd clause appears to me to throw a good deal of light on the much disputed 13th clause, which enacts that the Act "shall not extend to any deed, act, or thing, executed or done, or (except the provisions therein contained as to existing contingent remainders) to any estate, right, or interest, created before the 1st day of January, 1845." Now the object of the 2nd section being, as I conceive, not to give a new statutory conveyance, in which case it might be contended that no estate, right, or interest, created before 1845 could pass thereby, but only to relieve the present modes of conveyance of some formalities, it seems clear that a feoffment without livery of seizin, a bargain and sale not enrolled, or a release without a lease for a year, or reference to the statute, will convey estates created before the 1st of January, 1845.

The 13th clause can, I conceive, only apply to those clauses which give new powers to the old forms of conveyances, as the clauses relating to contingent interests and conveyances, by executors of mortgagees. I do not think it so clear as some of my brethren that it applies even to them, but, at all events no conveyancer, until the meaning of the clause is settled by the highest authority, can accept a conveyance of any contingent interest created before 1845, which he would not have accepted before 1845.

Your obedient servant,

Lincoln's-inn, Dec. 23. A Conveyancer.

P.S. I am no pleader, but I should imagine there would be some difficulty in pleading a deed in which the only operative word was "convey."

This letter has called forth the following reply, part of which we subjoin, concluding that whatever tends to elucidate the obscurities of the statute will be welcome:—

Real property lawyers must, however, interpret the Act in some way, for next week it will be rung in with the new year. The chimes will ring—"Every man his own conveyancer, or simplification and '45."

Concurring in much that has fallen from your correspondent of this morning, "Conveyancer," and thinking his observations on the whole useful and corrective of some errors now abroad, I beg to add a few observations, and to point out one or two errors into which I think he has fallen.

I agree with him that no new form of deed is intended to be created, and that those gentlemen who may exercise their imaginations in inventing new forms will but entangle their clients. By the second section, "every person may convey any deed without livery of seisin or enrolment, or a prior lease, all such freehold land, &c." Now, so far from any new form of deed being here created, or authorized, I think it pretty clear that the only deeds aimed at are the three kinds of deeds now requiring livery of seisin, enrolment, or a prior lease, viz. a feoffment, a bargain and sale of freehold, and a release. Other deeds cannot be alluded to. A grant or assignment without livery of seisin, &c. would be nonsense. To understand the new law we must know something of the old. The statute does away with the above formalities from the three kinds of deeds mentioned. So far I agree with your correspondent. But when he says that "the practical result is that words 'bargain and sell' must be carefully avoided in conveyances to use, and that a bargain and sale under the new Act to B and his heirs, to the use of C and his heirs, will vest the legal estate in B," I take leave to differ; for sec. 2 goes on to enact, that a deed made under the Act "shall take effect as a lease and release." Now the above limitation in a lease and release, would clearly vest the legal estate in C.

The Act does not abolish a feoffment with livery, the enrolling of a bargain and sale, or the prior lease, or the reference in a release to the Act of the 4th of Victoria, or interfere with the effect of such deeds, so framed in the old way, except to this extent, no feoffment shall operate tortiously, as it may now—sec. 7.—A bargain and sale enrolled would, therefore, operate as heretofore, and under the limitation supposed the legal estate would vest in B. The word "convey," as a technical word of conveyance, is not, as your correspondent says, authorized by the Act.

An able writer, who has published an edition of the Act, seems to think that any sort of deed will do, and that technical words are no longer necessary. If this be so, deeds and wills will soon be on a par, and vast will be the flood of litigation a few years hence.

How far your correspondent's view of the 13th section is correct, it is hard to say. It declares that "the Act shall not extend to any deed or thing executed or done, or (except as to contingent remainders) to any estate or interest created before January, 1845." He thinks this only applies to the clauses giving new powers to the executors of mortgagees, &c. I confess I see nothing to confine it thus. It appears to me to apply to all life estates, estates tail, &c. created before 1845. It seems a great blunder, and deprives the Act of the little portion of good it contains.

There are questions as to the powers of married women, &c. into which I will not enter at present. I would just observe, that contingent remainders are not abolished, though so stated in the marginal note of the act published by her Majesty's printer. The framer may have intended abolition—probably did—but he has not succeeded; for in order to create an estate by deed which shall have the properties of an executory devise, you must create a proper contingent remainder (vide sec 8), and thus all the intricate lore relating to contingent remainders is perpetuated.

On the forms of deeds, then I should thus sum up:—

All the present kinds, with the ceremonies attached to them, and their peculiar operation and effects (and which are well understood by those whose business it is to understand them), are preserved, except as regards feoffments, with livery, which are not to operate by wrong; and, in addition, the act enables a person who can convey by lease and release, to convey by deed of feoffment, without livery of seisin, bargain and sale unenrolled, or by a release without a prior lease, and such deeds shall operate as a lease and release would do.

I am, &c.

Rule 2.

The above table being intended as fixing merely the amount of fee or charge in each item, whether between party and party, or attorney and client, is not, from the introduction of such items, to be construed as thereby authorising any charge, or entitling the attorney to any fee, as between party and party heretofore only allowed, or which ought only to be properly charged between attorney and client, or the contrary but in so far as the officer in the taxation of costs may have, or may think fit to exercise, under the control of the Court, a discretion on the subject of particular charges, it is considered by the judges to be desirable that the fees and charges between party and party should assimilate as nearly as may reasonably and justly be attainable, to those between attorney and client.

Rule 3.

The taxing officers are authorized, from time to time, to issue general directions respecting the mode of preparing affidavits to be used before the taxing officers for the purpose of regulating the taxation, and likewise the mode of preparing bills of costs, and the use to be made of printed forms of bills of costs in common cases, and the charges to be made for costs to which such forms are applicable.

Rule 4.

HABEAS CORPUS IN JERSEY.

The following interesting and learned article on this important question is extracted from the columns of the Morning Chronicle:—

The case of Mr. Charles Carus Wilson, involving, as it does, the right of the Queen's Courts at Westminster to send the writ of habeas corpus into the Channel Islands, is one of great and imperial importance in a constitutional sense, and cannot be permitted either by the press or the public to sink down to the low Peel level of mere expediency. From such consideration as we have been enabled to bestow on the subject, we have, as laymen, come to the conclusion that, supposing the circumstances to have occurred before the passing of the Habeas Corpus Act, Mr. Wilson had his remedy by treaty and by common law. Still more is he that remedy now further secured, as we shewed it was, by the explicit provisions of the two Acts of Parliament, namely, the 31 Car. c. 2, and the 56th Geo. 3, c. 100, s. 5.

The first authority we shall cite is Selden, Mare Clausum, 306:—

That a possession and dominion of this Southern Sea hath been held also of old by the Kings of England, is not a little manifest by the dominion of those islands that lie before the shore of France. For 'tis generally known that, after King John and Henry III. were driven out of Normandy itself, that the isles of Caesaria and Sarnia (which we call Jersey and Guernsey), Ameney, and some other neighbouring isles lying near the shores of Normandy and Bretaign, yea and situated within that creek of sea which is made by the shore of Bretaign on the one side, and Normandy on the other, have in the following ages, both now and heretofore, remained in the dominion of England.

It may be freely admitted that prerogative writs would not have run into the islands of Jersey and Guernsey as part of the Duchy of Normandy; but by the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 11th articles of the treaty of Bretigny, all the honours, obediences, homages, allegiances, vassalages, fiefs, services, mere and mixed empire of certain places—Calais, Guines, Jersey, Guernsey, &c. among the number—is transferred to the King of England.

The 11th article of the treaty says:—

"That the subjects thereof shall be liegemen to the Kings of England without being subject to any recognizance or service to the Crown of France."

A bull of Innocent VI. consented to the execution of this treaty, though it contained articles prejudicial to the Holy See, but a little more than a century afterwards, a subsequent Pope having interfered with the royal prerogative of England, a commission issued at Westminster, on the 14th May, 1485, to examine whether "a bull sent by his Holiness is not prejudicial to the King;" thus early, even, repudiating the spiritual power of the Holy Father. The Kings of England subsequently continued to maintain supremacy in all matters, civil as well as ecclesiastical, in these islands; and at length the Roman See, finding that further resistance was useless, by a bull of Alexander VI. in the reign of that politic prince Henry VII. transferred the spiritual jurisdiction from the Bishop of Constance to the Bishop of Winchester. This bull is dated the 13th of February, 1500; and whether the present Bishop of Winchester claims (to use a legal phrase) "to take under it," or not, we believe the fact to be, that, while we write, the Bishop of Winchester exercises spiritual jurisdiction in these islands. If, therefore, the Right Rev. Father in God, Richard Sumner, exercises plenary episcopal authority in the Channel Islands, we think it right and reasonable, and, whatever Frederick Thesiger may say "to the contrary notwithstanding," expedient and necessary, that the Queen's writ should run there also. But whether it runs there or not, which is the question to be ultimately determined by the Queen's Bench, we believe that by the common law of this land, as fully appears from "Horne's Mirrour," cap. 2, sec. 2, Mr. Carus Wilson has his appeal of imprisonment, and may also claim the writ moderata misericordia, which is founded according to Fitzherbert, on the stat. Magna Charta, cap. 14: "Quod nullus liber homo amercietur nisi secundum quantitatem delicti;" and, according to Staunford, 71; and Fitzherbert, 152, his writ de homine replegiando. The case of Mr. Wilson is manifestly a case of oppression; and, lest we should be supposed to speak popularly, we will give the legal definition of the word, as we find it in "Pulton de Pace Regis et Regni:"—

"Oppression is a grievance done by one man or more to the hurt or prejudice of others, without any warrant of law or colour of justice; or it is a burden or charge which one man doth impose upon another more than the law doth lay upon him, and is, for the most part, wrought by the superior in countenance, ability, or officer to the inferior in the same; for the oppressor, sicuti Nimroth robustus venator et tanquam leo subversor in domo sua is always offering hard measure to them who are to deal with him, until they be able and willing to resist him."

Now in Bagge's case, (11 Rep. 98), before the Habeas Corpus Act had passed, it was resolved,

That to this Court of King's Bench belongs authority not only to correct errors in judicial proceedings, but other errors and misdemeanors extra judicial, tending to the breach of peace, or oppression of the subjects, or to the raising of faction, controversy, debate, or any other manner of misgovernment; so that no wrong or injury, either public or private, can be done, but that it shall be reformed or punished by due course of law.

And in the 3rd and 4th Institute, c. 7. p. 71, it is also laid down that the Court of Queen's Bench

Hath not only jurisdiction to correct errors in judicial proceeding, but other errors and misdemeanours extra judicial, tending to the breach of the peace, or oppression of the subjects, or raising of faction, controversy, debate, or any other manner of misgovernment; so that no wrong or injury, either public or private, can be done, but that this shall be reformed or punished in one court or other by due course of law.

Camden, who wrote in the time of Elizabeth his description of Britain, and necessarily before the passing of the Habeas Corpus Act, thus speaks of Jersey:—

Under these lieth southward Cæsaren, whereof Antonine hath written, scarce twelve miles distant from Alderney, which name the Frenchmen now have clipped so short, as the Spaniards have Cæsaraugosta in Spain, for they call it Gearzey, like as Cherbourg for Cæsarisburgus, and Saragose for Cæsar Augusta. Gregorius Turonensis calleth it the island of the sea that lieth to the citie Constantia, where he reporteth how Prætextatus, Bishop of Roan, was confined hither; like as Prapinius Massonias termeth it the isle of the coast of Constantia, because it butteth just upon the ancient city Constantia, which may seem in Ammianus to be named Castra Constantia, and in the foregoing ages Moritonium.

"As touching the politic state thereof, a governor sent from the King of England is the chief magistrate; he appointeth a bailiff, who, together with twelve jurates, or sworn assistants, and those chosen out of the twelve sever all parishes by the voices of the parishioners, sitteth to minister justice in all civil causes: in criminal matters, he sitteth but with seven of the said sworn assistants; and in causes of conscience, to be decided by equity and reason, with three."

It is plain from this description—and no one has ever doubted the literal accuracy of Camden—that in his day Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark, were considered British Islands—that the governor sent from the King of England was the chief magistrate, and that such governor appointed the jurates and baliffs.

In Calvin's case, which was determined in the 6th year of James I. and a report of which may be found in the 4th vol. or 7th part of Lord Coke's Reports, is the following passage:—

"And so much (omitting many other authorities) for Normandy; saving I cannot let pass the isles of Jersey and Guernsey, parts and parcels of the dukedom of Normandy, yet remaining under the actual legiance and obedience of the King, I think no man will doubt, but those that are born in Jersey and Guernsey (though those isles are no parcel of the realm of England, but several dominions enjoyed by several titles, governed by several laws), are inheritable and capable of any lands within the realm of England."

Since the statute of 31 Chas. 2, c. 2, the personal liberty of the subject has been more guarded and fenced round; and by sec. 11 of that Act it is plain that the writ may issue either to Jersey or Guernsey. And the 12th section of the Act cited by the Solicitor-General applies not to persons in prison, but to the sending of inhabitants or residents of England to foreign prisons. In the anonymous case, in 2 Ventris, 357, in the 33rd Chas. 2, it is stated "that writs mandatory had been awarded to Calais, and now to Jersey and Guernsey." And in Roy v. Overton, ten years before the passing of the Act of Habeas, we find the following short report in the "hatchet-faced, mutton-fisted Siderfin," as Roger North calls him:—

La fuit habeas corpus grant direct al Governour de Jersey pour porter icy le corps. Ce prisoner fut la several ans.

The Solicitor-General seemed not to know exactly who Overton was; but surely a lawyer at all read in English history ought to have been aware that he was sent out of the kingdom before the passing of the Habeas Corpus Act, by Oliver Cromwell. Ludlow, in his Memoirs, speaks strongly against his imprisonment, and his removal to Jersey, "at the hazard of his life, and to the great prejudice of his estate." Robert Overton, however, was a double traitor. He could neither expect favour nor obtain mercy. But he was, according to Noble, in the Tower of London, and not at Jersey, at the period of Charles II.'s return. The Overton referred to in Siderfin is probably, therefore, Richard Overton, the sufferer with Lilburne, and not Colonel Robert, governor of Hull. It is, however, no argument against the existence of a right that the imprisoned person, probably without funds or friends, did not exercise it. Lambert, the Parliamentary General, it is well known, lived a prisoner for thirty-six years in the island of Guernsey, without ever having appealed to the English courts. After the Habeas Act had been some time in operation, the judges shewed a forward and laudable desire to let the writ go in every case. In Archer's case, in 1 Lord Raymond, the writ was granted on a mere letter; and in a note to that case the reporter says:—

Mr Northey said that in the case of the Lord Leigh, of Stoneley, a habeas corpus was granted only upon the letter of the Lady Leigh. And, per Holt, without a doubt a habeas corpus may be granted upon the sight of a letter.

So also in the more recent case of the Hottentot Venus, reported in 13 East, the writ was granted on the affidavit of the Secretary of the African Institution that the woman was a foreigner ill-used. By the 23rd Article of War it is declared:—

No officer or soldier, who shall be put in arrest or imprisonment, shall continue in his confinement more than eight days, or until such time as a court-martial can conveniently be assembled.

If this rule be transgressed, the Court of King's Bench have power to grant a habeas corpus to any part of the Queen's dominions. In the case of Richard Blake (2 Maule and Selwyn, 428) the Court granted a rule nisi for a habeas corpus on the application of an officer who had been under confinement for more than eight days, and whose affidavit disclosed circumstances whence it seemed probable that a court might conveniently have assembled before.

In the tract "Against the Jurisdiction of the King's Bench over Wales, by process of Latitat," published by Mr. Hargrave, it is said that the Parliament binds Ireland, Jersey, and Guernsey, if they are specially named; and we have already shewn that Jersey and Guernsey are specially named both in the Habeas Corpus Act and the 56th Geo. 3, c. 100, s. 5. We trust that the judges of England will not allow a benefit so indispensable for the security of personal liberty to be impaired or frittered away.

It sufficiently appears from the cases of Darnel, Corbet, Earl, Hevingham, and Hampden (3 Howell's State Trials), that the benefits secured by the common and statute law were gradually impaired and reduced by the corrupt ingenuity of lawyers, and the oppression of men in power; and in order that such scenes may never again occur, it becomes the more important to insist that the writ shall go in the case of Mr. Wilson.

We cannot close these observations more appropriately than by the following extract from the speech of John Selden, in Parliament, relative to the State trials (3 Chas. 1, 1628), in which he had been of counsel:—

In that precious thing "liberty" there are divers remedies by which it appears, if no known cause be of further detainment, he is to be delivered. I will not mention the action of false imprisonment, but the writ de odio et atia, which is not taken away, for that it is in Magna Charta. That writ was sent to know if the party imprisoned were committed for any cause of malice and hatred, and this was to be inquired of by jury. For the writ de homine replegiando, if one be imprisoned under the sheriff, he must be delivered, if he be not detained for a cause for which he is not replevisable. For the habeas corpus, the keeper is to bring the body, "ad subjiciendum et recipiendum." If there be no cause, how can the Court consider of the cause? For appeal, by the old law, in the time of Henry I, one imprisoned might have his appeal, as appears by Bracton, c. 25, lib. de Corona Fleta, c. 42.

RATES OF POSTAGE FOR THE ARMY AND NAVY.

The following notice appeared to-day at the General Post Office, St. Martin's-le-Grand:—

"BY COMMAND OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

"Notice to the Public, and instructions to all Post-masters, sub-Postmasters, and Letter Receivers.

"General Post-office, Dec. 1844.

"The privileges at present enjoyed by soldiers and sailors in her Majesty's service, and by soldiers in the service of the East India Company, of receiving and sending letters, not exceeding half-an-ounce, at a reduced rate of postage, is extended to seamen in the service of the East India Company while actually employed in such service."

The Lord Chancellor has appointed Robert Drinkall, jun. of Howden, in the county of York, gent. and Thomas Baker, of Abergavenny, in the county of Monmouth, gent. to be Masters Extraordinary in the High Court of Chancery.

WHITEHALL, DEC. 14.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed William Hinde, of Liverpool, George Grey, of Torquay, Devonshire, George Palmer, of Rugeley, Staffordshire, John Gwynne, of Tenby, Pembrokeshire, George Scurfield, of Sunderland, and George James Haines, of Farringdon, in the county of Berks, to be Masters Extraordinary in the High Court of Chancery.

The Lord Chancellor, accompanied by Lady Lyndhurst and the Hon. Miss Copley, left George-street, Hanover-square, on Saturday, for Turvile Park, near Henley-upon-Thames, where his lordship is expected to remain until Thursday, the 10th of January, when the Christmas vacation will end.

INGENIOUS SMUGGLING AT PLYMOUTH.—The contraband dealers in tobacco have just been detected in an attempt to introduce this commodity by a mode which for ingenuity will bear comparison with any of those recently discovered. The sailing packet Zebra, Captain Lauraines, from Jersey, commenced discharging her cargo on Saturday, the 14th instant, at the legal quay, Sutton-wharf, Plymouth. Among other goods on her manifest were thirteen casks, said to contain pitch. This article is not frequently brought from the islands, and as the casks weighed only 3½ cwt. instead of the usual average 4 cwt. to 4½ cwt. the suspicions of the officers of Customs were naturally excited. They, however, very prudently deferred seizing the suspected goods, until an owner presented himself at the Custom-house. In due course Mr. Christopher John Arrowsmith, the only passenger by the Zebra, came to clear the casks, and he was soon handed over to the civil authorities. On examining the casks, they were each found to contain a small quantity of pitch, surrounding what appeared to be a number of bricks, but these on inspection proved to be tin cases, covered with coarse red paint, mixed with fine gravel or sand. Each case had from 3¼lb. to 3½lb. of unmanufactured tobacco, closely wedged within it; indeed, so closely, that it took six or seven men all one day to examine the contents of eleven casks. The thirteen casks, each having about forty-one cases, containing 134lb. will probably produce 14 or 15 cwt. of tobacco in all. One of the cases has been sent to the Board of Customs. It is supposed that the tobacco was made to assume the form of bricks, to facilitate the transport unsuspiciously from the first place of deposit after landing. The officers concerned in the capture are Mr. Rich, landing-surveyor; Mr. Pothury, tide-surveyor; and Mr. Ramsey, landing-waiter.

DEPOSITORS IN SAVINGS-BANKS.—For the guidance of the numerous class of persons who are interested in the management of savings-banks, we are induced to subjoin the following brief, but, we trust, clear and concise, summary of the provisions of the New Savings-bank Act, which has just come into operation:—After the 20th ult. the interest of all moneys invested by the trustees of savings-banks in the national stocks is reduced to the rate of 3¼ per cent.; and the maximum of interest to be in future allowed to depositors is not thenceforward to exceed the rate of 3*l*. 0s. 10d. per cent. From the same date, every depositor, on making his first deposit, must sign a declaration, as provided by previous Acts, a copy of which is to be annexed to the deposit-book; the latter to be produced once, at least, in every year, for the purpose of examination. When deposits are made in trust for another, the sum is to be inserted in the names of the trustee and the person on whose account the same is so invested; and no repayment can be made without the receipt of both or that of their trustees, executors, or agents, duly appointed by power of attorney. Annuities under the Act 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 111, are not to exceed the sum of 30*l*. in the whole, but separate annuities to that amount may be granted to a husband and wife: instead, however, of the charges under the former Act, the charges are henceforward to be—for an annuity under 5*l*. the sum of 5s.; 5*l*. and under 10*l*., 10s; 10*l*. and under 15*l*., 15s.; 15*l*. and under 20*l*., 20s.; 20*l*. and under 25*l*. 25s.; 25*l*. and under 30*l*., 30s. Where deposits, exclusive of interest, do not exceed 50*l*. if a will or letters of administration are not produced within a month, the money may be paid to the widow, or to the person entitled to the effects of the deceased; if a depositor be illegitimate and die intestate, the managers may, with the sanction of the barrister appointed to certify the rules, pay the same to such persons as would be entitled to the same under the Statute of Distribution; and where married women have made deposits, it will be lawful for the managers to repay such women, unless the husband give notice to the contrary. The time for issuing the half-yearly receipts for interest is extended to sixty days, from the 20th of May and the 20th of November; and the time for transmitting the annual statement is extended to nine weeks after the 20th of November in each year. Payments to the relatives of intestate depositors are to be made to the next of kin by the law of Scotland, in the case of deposits in that country.

CURIOUS CASE.—The important and novel case of perjury connected with the will of the late Peter Murphy, of New York, formerly of Wexford, was decided at New York Sessions Court on the 18th ult. when John Clements was indicted for wilful perjury in swearing to an answer in Chancery, to obtain possession of a property worth 60,000 dollars, by falsely claiming as nephew of said Murphy, and alleging that Margaret Murphy, mother of the prisoner, was Murphy's sister, and that her name was not Alice O'Brien. The fraud was proved in evidence by Peter Murphy, nephew of the deceased, who came from Wexford for that purpose, and by other Irish witnesses. Mr. Jacob Harvey, of New York, proved the inquiry made at Shanagolden, county of Limerick, under a commission, and that Clements and his mother were known there, and that her name was Ally O'Brien, and not Murphy. Mr. Harvey produced depositions taken before the local commission, and the jury in two minutes found a verdict of Guilty. The offender, John Clements, was then sentenced to nine years' hard labour in the state prison.—Cork Southern Reporter.

The Court of Cassation was occupied on the 21st with an appeal brought by the Procureur-General of Rouen against a decision of the Cour Royale of that city, which quashed a judgment passed by the Correctional Court of Havre against M. Boissier, for having in his possession several cases of potted partridges. M. Boissier had proved that the articles were prepared some months before the passing of the New Game Law Bill, and argued that, as that enactment had no retrospective application, he could not be fined for having the preserved game in his possession. The Cour Royale had taken this view of the question, and the Court of Cassation has now given its judgment in the same sense, declaring that "as the Bill evidently meant game properly so called (which appeared from the wording of art. 2, ordering all articles seized to be immediately sent to the nearest charitable institution to prevent their being spoiled by being kept), potted partridges could not be considered as coming under the dispositions of the Bill; that therefore the judgment of the Cour Royale of Rouen was correct; and that the appeal of the Procureur-General must be rejected."

NEW MERCHANT SEAMEN'S ACT.—On Wednesday next the New Merchant Seamen's Act will come into force. There are 65 sections and several schedules in the statute. During the present month seamen in the merchant service have obtained tickets of registration from the office near the Tower. From the 1st proximo no seaman can be taken on board without the requisite ticket, under a penalty of [illegible]. The Act is "to amend and consolidate the laws relating to Merchant Seamen, and for Keeping a Register of Seamen." By the preamble it is declared that the prosperity, strength, and safety of the United Kingdom, and her Majesty's dominions, depend greatly on a large, constant, and ready supply of seamen, and that it is expedient to promote the increase of the number of seamen, and to afford them encouragement and protection; and it is further declared to be expedient to keep a register of seamen. Agreements are to be made in writing between masters and seamen, stating the situations, wages, and length of service of the men. Parish boys may be sent to sea with their consent, or boys soliciting alms. No seaman is to be discharged abroad, nor to be abandoned or left behind, without the sanction of the consul of the place, as great mischief has been caused by such proceedings—the poor men having been reduced to great distress, and have, according to the language of the Act, been tempted to become pirates. By the 64th section it is provided, that if any person being a Malay, Lascar, or native of the territories under the Government of the East India Company, or if any Asiatic or African seaman, having been brought to the United Kingdom on board any ship, shall be found to be in the United Kingdom in distress for want of food, clothing, or other necessaries, the Commissioners of the Admiralty may supply assistance to every such person or seaman, and maintain him until he shall be sent on board some ship to be taken back to the place from which he was shipped. The assistance rendered is to become a debt, and may be recovered from the owner or master of the ship on board whereof such person or seaman was brought to the United Kingdom from Asia or Africa.

THE ACT TO SIMPLIFY THE TRANSFER OF PROPERTY.—There are fourteen short clauses in this Act, which will take effect from Tuesday next, the 31st inst. In future, deeds not to be "indented," at the top as they have been from time immemorial. The following is the provision on the subject:—Section 11. "That it shall not be necessary in any case to have a deed indented, and that any person not being a party to any deed may take an immediate benefit under it, in the same manner as he might under a deed-poll." By another clause, it is provided, "That the bonâ fide payment to, and the receipt of any person to whom any money shall be payable upon any express or implied trust, or for any limited purpose, or of the survivors or survivor of two or more mortgagees, or holders, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, or their or his assigns, shall effectually discharge the person paying the same from seeing to the application, or being answerable for the misapplication thereof, unless the contrary shall be expressly declared by the instrument creating the trust or security."

THE HEIR OF COCHRANE OF CLIPPENS.—We learn that a commission from the Court of Chancery is to commence sittings in a few days in Paisley or neighbourhood for the purpose of ascertaining, by the examination of witnesses on the spot, who is the proper heir to the residue of the large fortune left by the late Mr. Cochrane, of Clippens. The funds at present in Chancery, and to be disposed of, amount to the handsome sum of 170,000*l*.—Glasgow Courier.

PUBLIC SALARIES.—On Friday a lengthened Parliamentary paper, obtained on the motion of Mr. Williams, the member for Coventry, was issued, giving an account of all salaries, pensions, profits, pay, fees, emoluments, grants or allowances of public money, held and enjoyed by all persons between the 5th of January, 1842, and the 5th of January, 1843, the total amount of which exceeded 1,000*l*. specifying with each name the total amount received by each individual, and distinguishing the source from whence derived. The whole list embraces the names of 754 persons. In the first branch of the return, civil officers, there are 250 names; in the second, judicial officers, officers of courts of law, &c. there are 134, and 30 pensioners; in the third, consular and diplomatic officers, there are 52, and 22 pensioners; in the fourth, naval officers, there are 34, and 1 pensioner; in the fifth department, military officers returned by the War-office, appears the names of 95 individuals; in the sixth, ordnance and military officers not returned by the War-office, there are 30; in the seventh, officers in the colonies, there are 118; and in the eighth branch, officers of the House of Commons, only 10; making in the aggregate 754 persons whose incomes from the public money exceed 1,000*l*. a year. The highest sum in the list of civil officers is the allowance to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland of 20,000*l*. and the next, two pensions to the Duke of Grafton, amounting to 10,584*l*. In the list of judicial officers Lord Lyndhurst, as Lord Chancellor, is the highest, namely, 10,000*l*. which is exclusive of his salary as Speaker of the House of Lords. Among the military officers the Duke of Wellington receives the largest amount. His grace had in the period mentioned 8,916*l*. 16s. 8d. consisting of 3,379*l*. 17s. 6d. as Colonel of the 13th Foot Guards; 238*l*. 15s. 8d. as Colonel-in-Chief of the Rifle Brigade; 992*l*. 3s. 8d. as Constable of the Tower of London; 305*l*. 19s. 8d. as Captain of Dover Castle, and 4,000*l*. pension granted by Act of Parliament. The noble Duke succeeded Lord Hill as Commander-in-Chief in December, 1842, who, it appears by the return, received in the year as Commander-in-Chief 2,284*l*. 15s. 10d. The Speaker of the House of Commons has 5,000*l*. a year, and a house; and Sir W. Gosset, the Sergeant-at-Arms, 1,500*l*. besides 320*l*. 12s. 11d. as a retired Colonel of Royal Engineers.

PROCEEDINGS OF LAW SOCIETIES.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LEGAL ASSOCIATION.

(From a Correspondent.)

The operations of this body directly affect the interests of each individual member of the Profession. It is incumbent on every attorney to contribute his aid to the funds and otherwise to assist the Association in carrying out its laudable objects.

We think solicitors will not like to avail themselves of its aid who have not joined the Association, and therefore many abuses may escape its notice which would otherwise have found a remedy; if they should, however, the spirit that will prompt them is far from praiseworthy, though we are convinced that without regard to membership the Association will render all the assistance in its power.

A few observations on the rules:—

1. This rule comprises all the objects of the Association.

And under this rule we conceive it will be the duty of the Association to watch every change in the practice of the Law. To take care that the ample salaries granted to officials may not be done so at the expense of the solicitors.

While it rigorously maintains the 5th rule of its conduct it will take care to prevent prejudice and unfair means depressing the station and respect to which attorneys are entitled.

This rule will justify the earnest efforts of the Association to obtain a repeal of the certificate duty.

2. This is an important branch of the duties undertaken by the Association; and if this were its only object it would be imperatively entitled to every assistance that the Profession could afford. It is believed that many unqualified persons are to be found in London who are little suspected to be so. There are conveyancers ranked as counsel who solicit Bills in Parliament, take instructions for and draw and engross deeds, attend the execution, and charge for them in the same manner as if they were attorneys.

Advice:—

In seeking the aid of the Association in attaining the object of this rule, it will be well for the members first to ascertain that there is evidence to sustain their case; by so doing, much time and expense will be saved. For instance, it is evident that not every assumption of the character of an attorney will render the party amenable. If he receives payment for business not strictly the province of an attorney to execute, his offence amounts to obtaining money under false pretences, but he does not incur a penalty for "usurping the duties or privileges of the Profession." But if the party should do any act which it is competent alone for an attorney or solicitor as an officer of court to perform, such as issuing a writ, then the penalty would attach, and it will be the duty of every solicitor to whom such conduct becomes known to seek the necessary evidence in support, and transmit the case to the Association.

Unqualified persons practising in the name of an attorney is a very great offence, and is often difficult of proof; when, however, the proof is clear, it is a reason why the aid of the Association should instantly be sought.

3. There is ample matter of employment in this division; and if but half-a-dozen useful and practical amendments of the law be enabled in the next five years to refer their origin to the Association on that ground, if on no other, the existence of the Association must be deemed a national benefit. It has already exerted itself to restrain the ill effects that have followed from the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96; and we believe we are justified in expecting that the ensuing session of Parliament will testify to the usefulness of their labours.

4. The very existence of the Association will prevent many acts of malpractice by persons not wholly lost to shame; and prevention is at all times better than cure.

5. The course which the association will pursue, in putting this rule into operation, must be determined by the particular circumstances of each case, and a great deal of discretion and nice discrimination will be necessary in executing the duty imposed by this rule.

6. Unity is power. And it will be incumbent on the various Law Societies in England to afford their earnest assistance to the Association, which, from its metropolitan situation, is calculated to be more eminently useful than mere local ones. And we would suggest that, as members of local societies may not deem it necessary to join this Association, it would be desirable that a grant of the funds, by way of annual subscription or donation, should be made to it. The Legal Association is confined to no locality; wherever it finds a subject for its interference, there will its interference be exerted; wherever the profession of an attorney or solicitor is exercised, there will the Association afford their influence to promote and protect his interests.

EAST KENT LAW ASSOCIATION.

At a special meeting of the East Kent Law Association, held on the 11th inst. it was resolved that the said Association do join the Union of Provincial Law Societies, and that the secretary announce the same to Thomas Taylor, esq. secretary of the Manchester Law Society.

VERULAM SOCIETY.

THE holidays have delayed the publication of the new number of Magistrates' Cases and of the second Number of Practice Cases beyond the period we had anticipated last week. The former, however, will be despatched by today's post, or on Monday, at the latest, and the latter next week.

MR. BARON GURNEY, AND HIS PRACTICE ON TRYING PRISONERS.

WE invite the attention of our readers to a case reported in our number for the 21st inst., in which GURNEY, B. in trying a prisoner on the Northern Circuit, is shewn to have adopted a course of practice which we hesitate not to assert is in open violation of every principle of law and justice. The report is short, and, for the better illustration of our argument, we transcribe it.

REG. v. COOK.

The prisoner, at the end of the examination in chief of the first witness for the prosecution, began to examine the witness. Upon his asking the first question he was interrupted by GURNEY, B. who said, You must put your questions through me, if you wish to put any.

Upon the prisoner's attempting again to put a question the learned baron interrupted him with some energy, saying,

Prisoner, if you wish to put any questions you must put them through me. I have told you so two or three times, and you shall not do it yourself.

Prisoner.—I wish to ask the witness what clothes I had on.

GURNEY, B.—Witness, did you know the prisoner by his clothes or by his face?

Witness.—By both, my lord.

GURNEY, B.—Now prisoner, I have asked your question; have you any more?

Prisoner.—No, my lord.

Well may the reporter of the above case offer in excuse for giving it publicity, that it is believed that the practice, which has been uniform with this judge throughout the circuit, is somewhat unusual: it is, indeed, unusual, and, more than this, it is reprehensible in the extreme; and notwithstanding it is the practice of a learned judge who has the reputation of being an able criminal lawyer, it is one which ought at once and for ever to be suppressed. We are glad that this course of procedure has been put into the shape of a reported case, because it enables us to confirm it by our own observation of the same practice of this judge on other circuits,—a practice which we have always blushed to witness; for it is one which, more than any other, tends to make a mockery of a criminal trial, and to bring the administration of our law into disrepute.

The position of an accused party, unrepresented at his trial by counsel, is embarrassing and difficult enough, and it is the height of cruelty to deprive him of any of the limited means which are at his command for his self-defence. A prisoner on his trial has a right, of which nothing less than legislative enactment can deprive him, to cross-examine every witness who is brought against him; and the only limit upon the exercise of this right is that which confines his questions to regularity of form and substance; they must be pertinent to the matter in issue, and put in a legal, that is, in a fair and straight-forward, manner. No one, not even the judge who tries him, can take from the prisoner this right of putting his own questions, and common sense would so order it. Every thing may depend upon the precise form in which the question is put—upon the emphasis laid upon particular words—upon having the eye of the witness upon the questioner, or upon the return of an immediate and unpremeditated answer. Let us refer to the report we have quoted. The prisoner wishes to ask the witness what clothes he had on? and Mr. Baron GURNEY, who insists on asking the question himself, and who very probably did not see the point of the question, asks it thus—"Witness, did you know the prisoner by his clothes or by his face?" Now it is manifest that the question asked by the judge is any thing but that required by the prisoner; and well indeed may the prisoner, after such an exhibition, decline any other question on his behalf. But the report may in this particular be inaccurate; and we trust, for the credit of the law, that it is so.

We know that the practice is almost uniform with this learned judge, and because it is so we have deemed it our duty thus to call public attention to it. We believe that Mr. Baron GURNEY is actuated by no unworthy or indeed unkind motive in the course he thus pursues; nay, we are inclined to think that he adopts it from a praiseworthy desire, not only to further the best ends of justice, but to facilitate the defence of the prisoner by putting his questions in a logical and legal shape; but we are nevertheless convinced that he thus steps beyond the bounds of his duty, and that he involuntarily defeats the best principles that regulate the administration of criminal justice in this country.

The unfortunate parties who are the victims of this practice are the penniless and friendless, and who are therefore incapable of effectually taking any steps to remedy the injustice to which they have been subjected; it is the business of no one in particular to vindicate the cause of the poor deserted prisoner, and thus it is that a course of proceeding so opposed to justice and humanity has been permitted to obtain for so long a period. If indeed the attention of the learned baron and of the public had been sooner called to it we are persuaded that it would ere this have ceased to exist; for we are convinced that in every case in which a prisoner has been deprived of his right personally to cross-examine the witnesses brought against him, he has been mistried, and ought to receive a free pardon. We say this advisedly, and upon the best consideration we can give the subject.

The winter assizes are now over; but we trust that before the judges shall again be sent on their missions Mr. Baron Gurney will have reconsidered his decision, or if he persist, that an intimation will be conveyed to him that he must alter his course of practice in the particular to which we have adverted. A few hints from his brother judges may be all that may be required; but should that be ineffectual, we hope that the Home Office will take up the subject, and impress upon the learned baron the necessity for an alteration.

LECTURES ON MEDICAL JURISPRUDENCE.

By Alfred S. Taylor.

Delivered at Guy's Hospital, 1844.

Lecture VII.

We now come to the poisoning by oxalic acid. This poison, although but very little known on the Continent, has acquired a fatal celebrity in England for being so frequently taken for the purposes of poisoning. From the coroner's return for the years 1837-8, there were nineteen deaths from poisoning by oxalic acid; in the greater number of those cases the individuals had taken the poison for the purpose of suicide. Oxalic acid is a very powerful poison, and when a dose of half an ounce and upwards is taken, the symptoms produced are well marked and very rapid in their course; indeed they are frequently so rapid that the person dies before medical assistance can be procured. It is one of the most fatal of all the common or accessible poisons. Immediately, or very soon after it is swallowed, there is a great pain felt in the abdomen; and therefore poisoning by oxalic acid might be mistaken for poisoning by a corrosive acid. The pain in the abdomen is very severe, followed by the vomiting of an acid liquid mixed with mucus and liquid blood of a dark or coffee grounds colour, which is characteristic of poisoning by this substance. As to the effects on the throat they are very remarkable. There is a copious secretion from the surface, and an effusion of a large quantity of blood, and in the vomited liquid you find shreds of mucus membrane floating. There is a sudden prostration of strength, which appears to arise from the action of this poison on the nervous system. The pain and tenderness in the epigastrium is followed by cold clammy perspirations, then by coma, convulsions, and death. A dose of this poison, from half an ounce to an ounce, commonly proves fatal in from a quarter of an hour to one hour. Vomiting continues so long as the person survives. A case is reported in which half an ounce of the crystals of oxalic acid destroyed life in ten minutes, but this was an unusually rapid case. A gentleman rang for his servant to bring him some hot water; in ten minutes the servant went up to the bed-room, and found his master dead. Oxalic acid is one of the most active of the common poisons, and in consequence of the rapidity with which life is destroyed, and its manifesting no action on the bowels, it differs from other irritants; but where the case is protracted, there is more or less irritation of the stomach and bowels, with diarrhoea. Sometimes the patient has not died for ten or twelve hours after taking the poison, and there has been no vomiting; but these must be considered exceptions to the rule. The prostration of strength is very great, so that if the individual be standing when taking the poison there will be loss of power in the extremities, and he will probably fall. The pulse is small, irregular, and scarcely perceptible, and the breathing is found to be spasmodic. The poison acts in different ways, according to the quantity of water in which it is taken. Supposing a fatal dose has been swallowed, if taken in the most concentrated state, it will cause death by syncope or fainting; when the dose is rather less, and more diluted, that is to say, not absolutely concentrated, then it is observed that it affects the spinal marrow, and produces convulsions, tetanus, and symptoms of that kind. If it is taken with a very large quantity of water it acts on the brain, and produces coma and stupor. We must, therefore, be prepared for these effects, which shew us that it is injurious to administer a large quantity of water in cases of poisoning by oxalic acid; because it is easily diffused over a large extent of the mucous membrane, and therefore becomes more speedily absorbed, the danger would be very great unless the water administered was speedily removed. The post mortem appearances are highly characteristic of the cause of death. In one case where the individual took two ounces of the poison, he died in three-quarters of an hour. The lining membrane of the mouth, fauces, and œsophagus is often coated with a dark mucous matter. The mucous membrane of the stomach in some instances is found pale and softened, but covered with a dark, thick layer of viscid mucus of a greenish brown colour, and of a gelatinous consistency. The membrane itself is soft and brittle, and easily detached, so that when raised up by the scalpel it seems to break by the pressure. The whole surface of the membrane, as well as the muscular coat, is intersected with a close network of vessels filled with a dark-coloured coagulated blood. In some instances the lining membrane presents traces of inflammation; but this is not often met with. Extensive patches, or indentations, are by no means unfrequent in the small intestines. The surface of the small intestines is covered with a dark-coloured mucus, like that of the stomach, the fauces, and the œsophagus, which are found corrugated. The first effect of the introduction of the poison is, to cause an abundant secretion of mucus, followed by an effusion of a large quantity of blood. There is no disease that will produce similar appearances in the stomach and œsophagus in the same time; therefore, if a person in good health takes a crystalline substance, and immediately after the symptoms I have described are manifested, it is certain that that substance must have been oxalic acid. Nevertheless, it is important to bear in mind that, in some instances, the post mortem appearances are not very striking. Dr. Christison mentions the case of a girl who died in thirty minutes after having taken an ounce of oxalic acid, and whose body, on inspection, presented scarcely any perceptible morbid appearances. On inspecting the body of an animal which died in five hours and a half after the administration of about thirty grains of the poison, there was only a small quantity of mucus found in the stomach, and but slight redness. We do not always find effusion of blood in these cases. We are often placed in some difficulty about deciding, from these appearances, what is the cause of death. Evidence is given, of a substance having been swallowed, at a coroner's inquest, and the person is buried without any inspection being ordered; and thus, you see, the means of ascertaining most important facts for the ends of justice are cut off from the profession; so that we are obliged to rely on the few accidental cases of persons who die in the hospitals, and on experiments on animals. The local action of this poison seems to be confined to corrugating the mucous membrane: it alters the colour of the blood, whether effused on the surface, or confined in the vessels, and in the latter case the effect on the blood is in some measure due to absorption or transudation; oxalic acid has never been discovered in the blood, and Dr. Christison states that in one instance he injected a quantity of oxalic acid into the femoral vein of an animal, which died in thirty seconds, and there was no trace of the poison in the blood. It is certain that it is absorbed, for when leeches have been applied to the abdomen of a person who has taken the poison, they have been observed to drop off dead; we therefore have some reason to believe that the poison does enter into the circulation.

With regard to the treatment, the best antidote to administer is chalk, mixed up with milk or water. A mixture of lime water and oil is also a very useful remedy; the lime water tends to neutralize the poison, and the oil shields the stomach from its action. Water should be sparingly used, unless there is active vomiting, because it is quite certain that a large quantity of water will rapidly carry the poison to the bowels, and we then may infer its presence from the seat of the pain. Supposing vomiting does not take place immediately, the best way to produce it is to exhibit a dessert spoonful of mustard mixed up with a little water, and at the same time promote its action by tickling the fauces with a feather. It is our duty to exhibit these remedies as long as the individual survives, though there is not much chance of recovery if some time have elapsed. A question is sometimes put to a medical witness as to the quantity of oxalic acid required to destroy life. This may be settled by attending to recorded facts, but unfortunately in most cases the quantity taken is only conjecturally stated. In a trial that took place in 1832, a medical witness stated that ten grains of oxalic acid were sufficient to kill; this is very doubtful, though a case is reported in which forty grains produced fatal symptoms, and the patient did not recover for a week. We are not entitled to say that even one drachm would be sufficient to kill; there are no facts to justify this opinion. It may be stated that the smallest fatal dose on record is half an ounce of the crystals, and in no instance has an adult person died who has taken a smaller dose, though persons have often recovered who have taken much larger doses. A woman was admitted into this hospital in November 1840, labouring under the effects of oxalic acid. She had taken half an ounce in water. The symptoms were mild; there was no vomiting, and she perfectly recovered, and left the hospital six days after her admission. Where these anomalies in the action of oxalic acid exist, it is difficult to come to any satisfactory conclusion on the subject. The following facts seem to shew that a quantity less than half an ounce is not likely to kill a person. A girl, aged 23, bought half an ounce of the crystals, and took more than half of it dissolved in water. Vomiting occurred immediately; carbonate of lime was given, and then carbonate of magnesia and lime water, and in the course of a few days she recovered. The quantity she had taken must have been between one and two drachms. In February 1842, a case occurred at King's College Hospital, where a girl had swallowed two drachms of the acid dissolved in beer. She suffered from slight pain in the abdomen, and recovered the next day. A case also occurred in 1841, in which three drachms of crystallized oxalic acid were taken, and there was immediate vomiting. This patient was not seen for two hours afterwards, but when seen, the symptoms were slight pain in the abdomen, a disposition to vomit, and a weak pulse. The usual means were adopted, and the man recovered in a few hours. Again, persons have recovered who have taken as much as one ounce of oxalic acid; but it is the general rule that when the dose exceeds half an ounce it proves fatal.

The period of time at which death takes place after poisoning by oxalic acid, is not commensurate with the quantity of poison taken; i. e. the same quantity taken does not always destroy life in the same period of time. It does not follow, therefore, that when a larger quantity is taken death will more rapidly ensue. You may be asked to explain this apparent anomaly. It may depend on the state of the stomach; whether food has been taken, whether vomiting has ensued, and many other circumstances that will suggest themselves to you. We may be justified, therefore, in saying that half an ounce may be considered a fatal dose; but it is not certain that, in other subjects, a less quantity will not suffice to destroy life in a shorter time.

Oxalic acid is a solid crystallized acid, soluble in water and alcohol; so that it has often been taken in brandy. It is soluble in most spirits, and acids render it more soluble in water. You may be asked, What quantity of water will dissolve it? This question is very frequent in cases of poisoning by oxalic acid; and this is very easily determined by evaporating the solution; sixty grains of the solution leave four grains of the crystals; so that there are fifty parts of water to four of the crystallized acid, and the deduction from this and other experiments is, that it is soluble in from twelve to fourteen times its weight in water; but it is rendered more soluble by nitric acid. The crystals of oxalic acid are liable to be mistaken for those of two very common substances; namely, sulphate of magnesia and sulphate of zinc. These resemble each other so closely as to render it difficult to determine which is the one and which the other. Oxalic acid is crystallized in well-defined rounded prisms, like fine needles; and there is only one other poison which crystallizes like it—that is corrosive sublimate. Sulphate of magnesia crystallizes in transparent crystals in a feathery form, and sulphate of zinc crystallizes very like the sulphate of magnesia. They therefore differ from oxalic acid in crystalline forms.

How do we distinguish oxalic acid from these two bodies? You will observe that it is intensely acid; sulphate of magnesia is neutral when pure, and sulphate of zinc is faintly acid. If you add a solution of potash to a solution of oxalic acid there may arise a slight efflorescence, but no precipitate takes place, while if you perform the same experiment with the other two bodies, a white flocculent precipitate is produced. One of the best tests for oxalic acid is heat, which entirely dissipates it, and leaves nothing but a sort of white vapour, while the sulphates of magnesia and zinc are both fixed; they first lose their water on crystallization, and remain fixed. Nitrate of silver, when added to a solution of oxalic acid, will detect one-4,000th part of the acid in solution, giving a dense white precipitate of oxalate of silver. But nitrate of silver drops down many other acids,—muriatic acid, prussic acid, and iodic acid. These precipitates, however, are all insoluble in nitric acid, while oxalate of silver is dissolved by nitric acid. Oxalate of silver is also soluble in ammonia; and another property which it possesses is, that it is not changed by boiling, and in this way we distinguish it from the tartrate of silver, the cyanide, the citrate, and other salts of silver. The second test is the sulphate of lime, which is preferable to the muriate, because that precipitates a great many other substances. As sulphate of lime is slowly decomposed by oxalic acid, it requires to be given in large quantities. The oxalate of lime is soluble in nitric acid, but insoluble in all vegetable acids. We thus know it from the freshly precipitated tartrate and citrate of lime, by its insolubility in the vegetable acids. Now is there any other acid precipitated by the sulphate of lime? There is none; so that if we get a precipitate from this salt, possessing the properties above described, we are certain that it must be oxalic acid. This test precipitates acid as well as neutral solutions of the salts of barytes and strontia; but the precipitates are insoluble in nitric acid, and thus do we distinguish them from the oxalate of lime.

The next test is sulphate of copper, which forms with oxalic acid a blue-white precipitate of oxalate of copper, which is immediately thrown down. There is no other acid which precipitates sulphate of copper in the whole range of mineral and vegetable chemistry, so that here we have a very clear sort of criterion of the nature of the body.

The next point to be considered is how to detect oxalic acid in the contents of the stomach. Oxalic acid is not affected by organic matter; it is not decomposed or precipitated; so that if it exists at all in the stomach it is in a soluble form. It is not, like the mineral or some of the acids, liable to combine with organic principles. In analyzing the contents of the stomach we should use the trial test of sulphate of copper, which produces a precipitation if oxalic acid be present, otherwise not. The next step is to neutralize the liquid by weak ammonia, and then, having filtered the liquid, add acetate of lead, which is thrown down, and a precipitate of oxalate of lead formed. Having, by repeated washing, removed the other matters with which it is mixed, the oxalic acid is to be separated from the oxalate of lead by two processes. Diffuse the precipitate in water, and pass into the liquid a current of sulphuretted hydrogen gas, the effect of which is to take away the lead, and form the black sulphuret of lead, and the oxalic acid is set free, and dissolved by the supernatant liquid. We are still liable to have some sulphuretted hydrogen left, because the gas is soluble in water. We get rid of this by simply boiling it; the gas passes off, and nothing but oxalic acid and water are left. Another way to separate it is by boiling it with a small quantity of sulphuric acid, which forms a sulphate of lead, and sets the oxalic acid free. Supposing that the acetate of lead gives no precipitate, then your answer is, that there is no separable quantity of oxalic acid present; but even if you get a precipitate, is that evidence of the presence of the poison? You must remember that the acetate of lead is precipitated by most kinds of organic matter, and by many mineral and vegetable acids and their salts. Thus if you are operating on the contents of the stomach, the presence of Epsom salts, any alkaline sulphate, common salt, any tartrate, citrate, phosphate, or carbonate, would occasion a white precipitate with acetate of lead. The presence of sulphuric, muriatic, tartaric, or citric acid would give the same result. You may be subjected to a question of this kind in evidence—How can you judge to what the effect is due, when so many bodies are precipitated by the acetate of lead? The answer to such a question must be, that acetate of lead is not a test for oxalic acid, but it is the medium of rendering it fitted for testing. So that we do not rely on the action of acetate of lead as a test of the presence of the poison, but on the subsequent application of other tests.

Now oxalate of lime is sometimes found in the stomach, where lime has been used as an antidote, and in order to analyze this the best method is to boil it, in about an equal weight of carbonate of potash, in distilled water. The undissolved residue will contain some carbonate of lime, and the liquid some oxalate of potash; this may be filtered, and tested with the usual tests. The quantity of oxalic acid present in a liquid is easily determined. We neutralize the acid by ammonia, and precipitate the excess by acetate of lead, and then, for every hundred grains of the dried precipitate of oxalate of lead we must infer the presence of forty-two grains of crystallized oxalic acid. Oxalic acid is very liable to decomposition, and the contents of the stomach, when they have been long preserved, acquire an alkaline reaction from the production of ammonia. By decomposition the acid may be found two or three weeks after death, in the stomach; but beyond that period it is liable to disappear.

THE CRITIC.

New Books.

New Commentaries on the Laws of England. (Partly founded on Blackstone.) By Henry John Stephen, Serjeant-at-Law. Vol. III. London, 1844. Butterworth.

We have not been permitted the advantage of perusing the two preceding volumes of these Commentaries; it is therefore impossible to pronounce any opinion upon a design of which we know nothing. We are ignorant of the learned author's division of his subject, of his proposed method of treating it, and how far he adheres to or departs from the arrangements of his great predecessor; if it be an original work, or only a new edition of an old one—that is to say, whether it be rightly called Stephen's Commentaries, or if be not more properly Stephen's Blackstone.

In the absence of volumes one and two, we are necessarily limited to a very short and unsatisfactory notice of the third volume, which has been forwarded alone. As we can form no fair judgment of a fragment, we refrain from expressing any. We must be content with a brief account of the most prominent topics indicated in the list of contents, and a few extracts to exhibit the author's style, leaving it to the reader who may be familiar with the whole work to form his own opinion of its merits.

It seems, then, that this third volume comprises two portions of the books into which the whole treatise is divided; namely, Book IV. "Of Public Rights," and Book V. "Of Civil Injuries." It opens with a continuation of the "Civil Government," which constitutes the first part of the division; thence it proceeds in the second part to treat of the Church; and in the third, of the social economy of the realm. The fifth Book, "On Civil Injuries," carries the reader through an interesting and instructive description of the various forms of procedure for the redress of civil wrongs established by the jurisprudence of this country.

The impression which has been left upon our mind by the imperfect acquaintance we have been enabled to make with this work is an extremely favourable one. It appears to us to be Blackstone modernized. But so judiciously are the alterations made where requisite, that it is Blackstone still in spirit and in form, only moulded to existing circumstances, speaking as himself would have spoken had he lived and lectured at this day. Mr. Serjeant Stephen has admirably succeeded in catching the manner of his master, and so cleverly has he dovetailed his own sentences with the language of the elegant old lawyer, that it would be difficult for one who heard the book read aloud to discover which was speaking. If the rest of the work be like this, it must be one of the most valuable of recent contributions to the law student's library; and not the lawyer only, but every Englishman, whatever his calling, may read it with advantage, for so much of the constitution and laws of England as are here described ought to be familiar to every citizen, and should be made a branch of education in every school.

Where there is so much useful material for extract, we are perplexed, by the abundance, which to choose. We may take almost at hazard from any page, all is so good.

Perhaps the most useful, because the least familiar, will be the account of the Spiritual Courts and the injuries cognizable by them.

The Ecclesiastical Courts take cognizance of causes pecuniary, causes matrimonial, and causes testamentary. The following is

THE PROCEDURE IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.

[The establishment of the civil law process in all the ecclesiastical courts was a masterpiece of papal discernment, as it made a coalition impracticable between them and the national tribunals, without manifest inconvenience and hazard: and this consideration had undoubtedly its weight in causing this measure to be adopted, though many other causes concurred. The time when the Pandects of Justinian were discovered afresh and rescued from the dust of antiquity, the eagerness with which they were studied by the popish ecclesiastics, and the consequent dissensions between the clergy and the laity of England, have formerly been spoken to at large. We shall only now remark upon those collections, that their being written in the Latin tongue, and referring so much to the will of the prince and his delegated officers of justice, sufficiently recommended them to the court of Rome, exclusive of their extrinsic merit. To keep the laity in the darkest ignorance, and to monopolize the little science which then existed entirely among the monkish clergy, were deep-rooted principles of papal policy. And as the bishops of Rome affected in all points to mimic the imperial grandeur, as the spiritual prerogatives were moulded on the pattern of the temporal, so the canon law process was formed on the model of the civil law: the prelates embracing with the utmost ardour a method of judicial proceedings, which was carried on in a language unknown to the bulk of the people, which banished the intervention of a jury (that bulwark of Gothic liberty), and which placed an arbitrary power of decision in the breast of a single man.

The proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts are therefore regulated according to the practice of the civil and canon laws, or rather according to a mixture of both, corrected and new modelled by their own particular usages, and the interposition of the courts of common law.(a) For if the proceedings in the spiritual court be ever so regularly consonant to the rules of the Roman law, yet if they be manifestly repugnant to the fundamental maxims of the municipal laws, to which upon principles of sound policy the ecclesiastical process ought in every state to conform,(b) (as if they require two witnesses to prove a fact, where one will suffice at common law,) in such cases a prohibition will be awarded against them.(c) But under these restrictions, their ordinary course of proceeding(d) is, first, by citation, to call the party injuring before them. Then by libel (libellus, a little book), or by articles drawn out in a formal allegation, to set forth the complainant's ground of complaint. To this succeeds the defendant's answer upon oath, when, if he denies or extenuates the charge, they proceed to proofs by witnesses examined and their depositions taken down in writing, by an officer of the court. If the defendant has any circumstances to offer in his defence, he must also propound them in what is called his defensive allegation, to which he is entitled in his turn to the plaintiff's answer upon oath, and may from thence proceed to proofs as well as his antagonist. The canonical doctrine of purgation, whereby the parties were obliged to answer upon oath to any matter, however criminal, that might be objected against them (though long ago overruled in the Court of Chancery, the genius of the English law having broken through the bondage imposed on it by its clerical chancellors, and asserted the doctrines of judicial as well as civil liberty), continued till the middle of the 17th century to be upheld by the spiritual courts, when the legislature was obliged to interpose, to teach them a lesson of similar moderation. By the statute of 13 Car. 2, c. 12, it is enacted, that it shall not be lawful for any bishop or ecclesiastical judge to tender or administer to any person whatsoever the oath usually called the oath ex officio, or any other oath whereby he may be compelled to confess, accuse, or purge himself of any criminal matter or thing, whereby he may be liable to any censure or punishment. When all the pleadings and proofs are concluded, they are referred to the consideration, not of a jury, but of a single judge, who takes information by hearing advocates on both sides, and thereupon forms his interlocutory decree or definitive sentence at his own discretion: from which there generally lies an appeal in the several stages mentioned in a former chapter.(e)]

The ecclesiastical courts have power to pronounce, among other sentences, that of excommunication, such sentences being pronounced as a spiritual censure for offences falling under ecclesiastical cognizance, and [this is described to be twofold, the less and the greater. The less excommunication is an ecclesiastical censure, excluding the party from the participation of the sacraments; the greater proceeds farther, and excludes him not only from these, but also from the company of all Christians.] Formerly, oo, [an excommunicated man was disabled to do any act that was required to be done by a probus et legalis homo. He could not serve upon juries, could not be a witness in any court, and what was worst of all, could not bring an action, either real or personal, to recover lands or money due to him.] But now, by 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 3, no person who shall be pronounced excommunicate shall incur thereby any civil penalty or incapacity whatever, save such imprisonment, not exceeding six months, as the Court so excommunicating such person shall pronounce; which imprisonment shall be enforced in such manner as the Act provides, by a writ de excommunicato capiendo.

By the former practice of these courts, it was only by means of an excommunication that they were able to enforce their sentences in any case whatever; so here, the common law stepped in to their assistance; for in case of the refusal of the party to submit to his sentence, and being thereupon excommunicated as for a contempt, a writ de excommunicato capiendo was issued, under which he was to be taken and committed to the county gaol till he was reconciled to the church, and such reconciliation certified by the bishop. But now, by the same statute, 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, s. 2, excommunication in all cases of contempt is discontinued, and in lieu thereof, where a lawful citation or sentence has not been obeyed, the judge shall have power, after a certain period, to pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt, and to signify the same to the Court of Chancery whereupon a writ de contumace capiendo (f) shall issue from that court, which shall have the same force and effect as formerly belonged, in case of contempt, to a writ de excommunicato capiendo.(g)

THE COURT OF HONOUR AND THE ADMIRALTY COURT.

We are [next to consider the injuries cognizable in the court military or court of chivalry. The jurisdiction of which is declared by statute 13 Ric. 2, c. 2, to be this: "That it hath cognizance of contract touching deeds of arms or of war out of the realm, and also of things which touch war within the realm which cannot be determined or discussed by the common law; together with other usages and customs to the same matters appertaining." So that whenever the common law can give redress, this court hath no jurisdiction; which has thrown it entirely out of use as to the matter of contracts, all such being usually cognizable in the courts of Westminster Hall.

The words "other usages and customs support the claim of this court,—1. To give relief to such of the nobility and gentry as think themselves aggrieved in matters of honour; and 2. To keep up the distinction of degrees and quality. Whence it follows, that the civil jurisdiction of this court of chivalry is principally in two points: the redressing injuries of honour, and correcting encroachments in matters of coat-armour, precedency, and other distinctions of families.

As a court of honour, it is to give satisfaction to all such as are aggrieved in that point; a point of nature so nice and delicate, that its wrongs and injuries escape the notice of the common law, and yet are fit to be redressed somewhere. Such, for instance, as calling a man coward, or giving him the lie; for which, as they are productive of no immediate damage to his person or property, no action will lie in the courts at Westminster: and] amends was by the common law appointed to be given in the court of chivalry. (h) Modern resolutions, however, have determined, that how much soever such a jurisdiction may be expedient, yet no action for words will at present lie therein. (i) And it hath always been most clearly holden, (k) that as this court cannot meddle with any thing determinable by the common law, it therefore can give no pecuniary satisfaction or damages; inasmuch as the quantity and determination thereof is ever of common law cognizance. And therefore this court of chivalry can at most only order reparation in point of honour; as, to compel the defendant mendacium sibi ipsi imponere or to take the lie that he has given upon himself, or to make such other submission as the laws of honour may require. (l) Neither can this court, as to the point of reparation in honour, hold plea of any such word, or thing, wherein the party is relievable by the courts of common law. As if a man gives another a blow, or calls him thief or murderer; for in both these cases the common law has pointed out his proper remedy by action.

[As to the other point of its civil jurisdiction, the redressing of encroachments and usurpations in matters of heraldry and coat armour: it is the business of this court, according to Sir Matthew Hale, to adjust the right of armorial ensigns, bearings, crests, supporters, pennons, &c. and also rights of place or precedence, where the king's patent or Act of Parliament (which cannot be overruled by this court) have not already determined it.

The proceedings in this court are by petition, in a summary way; and the trial not by a jury of twelve men, but by witnesses, or by combat. (m) But as it cannot imprison, not being a court of record, and as by the resolutions of the superior courts it is now confined to so narrow and restrained a jurisdiction, it has fallen into contempt and disuse. The marshalling of coat-armour, which was formerly the pride and study of all the best families in the kingdom, is now greatly disregarded; and has fallen into the hands of certain officers and attendants upon this court, called heralds, whose testimony as to descent is no longer of the same weight as formerly, nor even in general admissible in a court of justice. But their original visitation books, compiled when progresses were solemnly and regularly made into every part of the kingdom, to inquire into the state of families, and to register such marriages and descents as were verified to them upon oath, are allowed to be good evidence of pedigrees. (n)

Injuries cognizable by the court maritime, or admiralty courts, are the next object of our inquiries. These courts have jurisdiction and power to try and determine all maritime causes, or such injuries which, though they are in their nature of common law cognizance, yet being committed on the high seas, out of the reach of our ordinary courts of justice, are therefore to be remedied in a peculiar court of their own. All admiralty causes must be therefore causes arising wholly upon the sea, and not within the precincts of any county. (o) For the statute 13 Ric. 2, c. 5 directs that the admiral and his deputy shall not meddle with any thing, but only things done upon the sea, and the statute 15 Ric. 2, c. 3, declares that the court of the admiral hath no manner of cognizance of any contract, or of any other thing, done within the body of any county, (p) either by land or by water, nor of any wreck of the sea: for that must be cast on land before it becomes a wreck. (q) But it is otherwise of things flotsam, jetsam, and ligan, for over them the admiral hath jurisdiction, as they are in and upon the sea. (r) If part of any contract, or other cause of action, doth arise upon the sea, and part upon the land, the common law excludes the Admiralty Court from its jurisdiction; for, part belonging properly to one cognizance, and part to another, the common or general law takes place of the particular. (s) Therefore, though pure maritime acquisitions, which are earned and become due on the high seas, as seamen's wages, (t) are one proper object of the admiralty jurisdiction, even though the contract for them be made upon land; (u) yet, in general, if there be a contract made in England and to be executed upon the seas, as a charter-party or covenant that a ship shall sail to Jamaica, or shall be in such a latitude by such a day, or a contract to be made upon the sea to be performed in England, or a bond made on ship board to pay money in London, or the like: these kinds of mixed contracts belong not to the admiralty jurisdiction, but to the courts of common law.(x)] It is to be observed, however, that [where the Admiralty Court hath jurisdiction of the original subject matter in the cause, it hath also jurisdiction of all consequential questions, though properly determinable at common law.(y)] Wherefore, among other reasons, a suit for beaconage of a beacon standing on a rock in the sea may be brought in the Court of Admiralty, the admiral having an original jurisdiction over beacons. (z)

The jurisdiction over prizes in time of war between our own nation and another, or between two other nations, which are taken at sea and brought into our ports, though not properly incident to the Admiralty, is nevertheless exercised by the judge of that court, to whom the crown ordinarily commits the cognizance of prize causes, to determine the same according to the law of nations.

[The proceedings of the Courts of Admiralty bear much resemblance to those of the civil law, but are not entirely founded thereon: and they likewise adopt and make use of other laws, as occasion requires; such as the Rhodian laws, and the laws of Oleron. (a) For the law of England, as has frequently been observed, doth not acknowledge or pay any deference to the civil law, considered as such; but merely permits its use in such cases where it judged its determinations equitable, and therefore blends it, in the present instance, with other marine laws; the whole being corrected, altered, and amended by Acts of Parliament and common usage; so that out of this composition a body of jurisprudence is extracted, which owes its authority only to its reception here by consent of the crown and people. The first process in these courts is frequently by arrest of the defendant's person; (b) and they also take recognizances or stipulation of certain fide-jussors in the nature of bail (c), and in cases of default may imprison both them and their principal. (d) They may also fine and imprison for a contempt in the face of the court. (e) And all this is supported by immemorial usage, grounded on the necessity of supporting a jurisdiction so extensive, (f) though opposite to the usual doctrines of the common law: these being no courts of record, because in general their process is much conformed to that of the civil law.(g)]

Such in a general point of view is the nature of the jurisdiction and practice of the High Court of Admiralty, but it will be proper before we conclude to advert particularly to the specific regulations which have been recently introduced in reference to this subject by the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65.

The provisions of this Act are chiefly as follows:—

1. That the Dean of Arches shall be assistant to and be competent to sit for the judge of the High Court of Admiralty in all suits and proceedings in the said court, and that the advocates, surrogates, and proctors of the Court of Arches shall be competent to practise in the Court of Admiralty.

2. That whenever any ship shall be under arrest by process issuing from the High Court of Admiralty, or the proceeds of any ship having been so arrested shall have been brought into the registry of the same court, the Court shall have jurisdiction to take cognizance of all claims and causes of action of any person in respect of any mortgage of such ship, and to decide any suit instituted by any such person in respect of any such claims or causes of action respectively.

3. That the Court shall have jurisdiction to decide all questions as to the title to any ship or the proceeds thereof in the registry arising in any cause of possession, salvage, damage, or bottomry, which shall be instituted in such court.

4. That the Court shall have power to issue monition, and proceed in cause of distribution of salvage, under the Act 1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 75, and c. 76, and shall also have authority to decide all claims in the nature of salvage, towage, or necessaries, whether the service were rendered in the high seas or otherwise.

5. That in all suits the Court may summon before it and examine witnesses by word of mouth, and either before or after examination by deposition or before a commissioner appointed by the Court; and notes of such evidence shall be taken down by the judge or registrar or such other person as the Court may direct.

6. That it shall be lawful for a judge or such commissioner to require the attendance of any witnesses and the production of any deeds and other writings by writ in the nature of subpœna, or subpœna duces tecum, as used in her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster.

(e) See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 38, s. 15, giving the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council power to regulate the practice and mode of proceeding in all appeals from ecclesiastical courts.

(f) R. v. Ricketts (6 A. & E. 537); R. v. Baines (12 Ad. & E. 210).

(g) See 2 & 3 Wm. 4, c. 93, giving the ecclesiastical courts of England and Ireland power to enforce obedience to their protests and decrees out of the limits of their respective jurisdictions; and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 93, authorizing the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to discharge persons in custody under writs de contumace capiendo.

(m) By 59 Geo. 3, c. 46, the trial by combat, or wager of battle, in a writ of right was abolished.

(n) Comb. 63. Blackstone expresses an opinion that it would be desirable that this practice of visitation at certain periods were revived; for, as he remarks, the failure of inquisitions post mortem, by the abolition of military tenures, combined with the negligence of the heralds in omitting their usual progresses, has rendered the proof of a modern descent, for the recovery of an estate or succession to a title of honour, more difficult than that of an ancient.

7. That in any contested suit the Court of Admiralty shall have power to direct a trial by jury of an issue on any question of fact, and that the substance of such issue shall be specified by the judge at the time of directing the same; and in case of dispute the form of it shall be settled by him, and the trial thereon shall be had before some judge of the superior court of common law at the sittings at Nisi Prius, or before some judge of assize, and a new trial may afterwards be granted on application of any of the parties within three calendar months; and farther, that the power of granting or refusing such issue or new trial may be matter of appeal to her Majesty in Council.

8. That it shall be lawful for the judge of the Court of Admiralty, subject to the approbation of her Majesty in Council, from time to time to make such rules and orders respecting the practice of such court, and the conduct and duties of the officers and practitioners therein, as to him shall seem fit, and to repeal or alter the same.

9. That no action shall lie against such judge for error in judgment, and that he shall have all the privileges and protection which appertain to the judges of the superior courts of common law.

10. That the keeper of every common gaol shall be bound to receive and take into his custody all persons who shall be committed thereunto by the Court of Admiralty or by any coroner of the Admiralty.

11. That the judge shall have power to discharge any person in custody for contempt of the said Court for any cause other than the non-payment of money.

Lastly, that the said Court shall have jurisdiction to decide all questions concerning booty of war or the distribution thereof, which it shall please her Majesty to refer to the judge of the said court by the advice of her Privy Council, to be dealt with as in cases of prize of war.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

Friday, Dec. 13.

EDWARDS v. JONES.

Practice—Pleading—Production of Documents—Discovery.

Where a fact is neither admitted nor denied by the defendant in his answer, who says he does not know the fact one way or the other, affidavits will not be admitted to be read on an interlocutory application, to substantiate that fact.

What amounts to a denial in the answer of any knowledge of a particular fact charged by the bill.

This was an appeal motion to discharge an order of the Vice-Chancellor of England, made upon a motion by the plaintiff for the production of papers mentioned in the schedule to the defendants' answer, and admitted to be in their possession. The motion had been refused.

The defendant, Ellen Jones, the wife of the other defendant, Pierce Jones, was the administratrix and one of the next of kin of John Owen, her uncle, who had died intestate in June 1835. His only other next of kin was Howell Powell, the brother of Ellen Jones, who at the time of John Owen's death was resident at New York, in the United States. Howell Powell, as was alleged by the bill, departed this life at New York, in Dec. 1839, intestate, and the plaintiff, Margaret Edwards, had obtained letters of administration to his effects. The bill was filed for a distribution of the estate of the original intestate, John Owen.

In answer to an interrogatory, as to the time of the death of Howell Powell, the defendants said, "They had always, since the death of John Owen, been ignorant whether the said Howell Powell was living or dead; and that they were ignorant of the date of the death of Howell Powell, and whether letters of administration of his effects had been granted to the plaintiff, Margaret Edwards; and they denied that either of them had been informed that he had died, as in the bill mentioned, by letters which they or either of them had received from New York or elsewhere, mentioning his death or that they had been so informed by any other person or persons, save by the said plaintiff, Margaret Edwards, and by other children of Howell Powell, and by the plaintiff, Griffith Edwards." The answer then proceeded—"And these defendants say that they had not, nor had either of them, any reason either to doubt or to believe, and therefore they did doubt the testimony of the person or persons so informing them; and these defendants deny that they or either of them have or has always or at any time considered or believed that the said Howell Powell was dead; and these defendants deny that they or either of them have or has at various or any times or time informed many or any persons that such was the fact." Upon this answer the plaintiff claimed to read an affidavit to prove the fact and time of the death of Howell Powell, upon the ground that the defendants had by their answer neither admitted nor denied it. The answer likewise denied that a certain letter mentioned in the schedule to the answer related to the death of Howell Powell, or that it in any way related to the plaintiff's title; and it was proposed to prove by affidavits that such letter did relate to the plaintiff's title.

Renshaw, for the plaintiffs, on the appeal, offered to read affidavits to prove the handwriting of the defendant Pierce Jones, and that Howell Powell had died in the hospital at New York in 1839. He contended that the fact of the death of Howell Powell was not admitted or denied by the answer, and that it was the rule deduceable from the authorities, that upon an interlocutory application to adduce by affidavits evidence of facts not admitted or denied by the answer.

Craig objected that the plaintiff must shew his title to the production of the papers moved for by admissions upon the answer.

Renshaw, in support of his right to read the affidavits to prove facts not admitted or denied by the answer, cited Hodson v. Dean (2 Sim. & Stu. 221); Jefferys v. Smith (1 Jac. & W. 298, 300); Ord v. White (3 Beavan, 357); and for his right to read affidavits to verify documents not admitted or denied by the answer. He cited Tagart v. Hewlitt (1 Mer. 499); Addiss v. Campbell (1 Beav. 258). He admitted Barrett v. Tickel (Jacob, 154), was a decision the other way, as was also Castellain v. Blumenthal (12 Sim.)

Craig, in reply upon the preliminary objection, contended that the case of Hodson v. Dean is an authority, that as to the personal title of the plaintiff, the affidavits cannot be read. The case of Jefferys v. Smith had misled the Master of the Rolls into supposing it to be inconsistent with what Lord Eldon had said in other cases, and that there was therefore a conflict of authorities. In Barwell v. Barwell (5 Beav. 373), affidavits after the answer had been put in were refused. (Walker v. Good, 12 Sim.; Duplex v. Flint, 4 Myl. & Craig, 502; Castellain v. Blumenthal, supra; Morgan v. Good, 3 Mer. 10.)

The LORD CHANCELLOR (after reading the above passage in the answer.)—I think that amounts to a denial according to the best of their recollection and belief. Therefore there is an end of one part of the case.

Renshaw.—Then I am confined to the answer. The defendants say they do not know the time of the death of Howell Powell. Affidavits are therefore tendered to prove the time of his death.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—That raises the question.

Renshaw stated letters of administration to effects of Howell Powell granted in 1842.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—That only proves that he is now dead, and the plaintiff is administratrix. The weight of authority, according to my present impression, is against the admission of the affidavits; but I will look into the cases; for the present purpose I allow the objection.

The case then proceeded upon the general question, on which judgment had not been pronounced.

On the 14th of December, the LORD CHANCELLOR (after the argument upon the whole case had concluded), said:—I have looked into all the cases as to the admission of affidavits, and I have no doubt as to the rule, which I apprehend to be that they cannot be admitted. First, as to the particular document; the party says, that, to the best of his recollection and belief, he never did write such a letter; and the other party wishes to prove that letter by affidavit, distinctly to contradict the averment in the answer. Then, as to the other points; the plaintiffs seek to prove, by affidavit, facts which the defendants have neither admitted or denied by their answer. All the cases shew that the plaintiff cannot be allowed to produce affidavits as to facts about which the defendant says he does not know anything one way or the other. As to the other points of this case, I will consider them.

Re JONES, a Lunatic.

Residence out of the jurisdiction permitted—Security for return—Practice.

Wakefield supported a petition by the committee of the lunatic, that he might be permitted to reside in Scotland. In May, 1841, the lunatic's mother removed him into Scotland to settle there. After the death of his mother, which had since occurred, he had become entitled to a considerable additional fortune, and it was shewn that a continued residence in Scotland would be most conducive to the health and comfort of the lunatic.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Are you aware of any such order? I have no objection to make the order prayed by the petition provided security be given that he shall be brought within the jurisdiction, if the Chancellor shall at any time deem it right to require it. The security must be given by some one resident within the jurisdiction. Ordered accordingly.

Re BRENT SPENCER, a Lunatic.

Costs in lunacy—Practice.

The committee of the estate petitioned that Lady Garvagh, the executor of Sir Brent Spencer, deceased, might be ordered to transfer the sum of 3,300*l.* Consols into court. The lunatic was entitled thereto under Sir Brent Spencer's will on attaining twenty-five years of age; and it was shewn that he is now thirty-eight.

Kenyon Parker, for the petitioner.

J. Baily, for Lady Garvagh, asked that her costs might be deducted and retained. Ordered.

Re RUXTON, a Lunatic.

Reducing security given by committee—Reversionary interests—Grant to committee—Practice.

A petition was presented by the committee and next of kin, praying that the security might be given by the committee below the amount usually required, as no one who was willing to become such committee could find the full securities. There were three sums to which the lunatic was entitled in possession, and these it was proposed should be transferred into Court; and it was further proposed that three other sums to which the lunatic would become entitled upon the death of the tenant for life should be excluded from the grant to the committee, and that a copy of the order should be served upon the trustees of those reversionary funds. Ordered.

BLACK v. CLAYTON.

Appeal—Deposit—Consent—Practice.

James Black, one of the defendants in person, moved for leave to present a petition of appeal against a decree of the Vice-Chancellor.

His wife, who is the plaintiff in the suit, also in person wished to appeal against the decree. The suit related to her separate estate. She had changed her next friend several times, and the present next friend was unwilling to make the requisite deposit.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Leave to appeal is not required. Either of these parties may appeal as of right in the ordinary way. There has been a decree, and if the plaintiff's next friend refuses she must obtain another next friend who will consent to take the steps necessary for an appeal.

Bagshaw (for the trustees).—If any counsel will give an opinion that there is any ground for the appeal, the trustees will waive a deposit.

The LORD CHANCELLOR assented.

WOODBURN v. FISHER.

Breach of injunction—Discharge of defendant by consent—Waiver of costs—Practice.

This defendant, who had been committed for breach of an injunction, restraining him from taking stones from a sea bank on the Lancashire coast, applied in person to be discharged. He had been committed by Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, after very strict proof by affidavit, and had appealed against that order the last day before the long vacation.

The appeal had then stood over for the production of a further affidavit, and the defendant consequently remained in prison ever since.

Phillips, for the plaintiff.

The LORD CHANCELLOR suggested, before hearing the defendant's motion, that as he had been a long time in custody, the plaintiff should consent to his discharge, subject to the costs of the present motion, in the event of his committing another breach of the injunction.

It was finally ordered that the defendant should be discharged by consent; and that he should not be required to pay the costs of the motion, unless he should commit another breach of the injunction, and the Lord Chancellor should be of opinion that any act complained of should be a breach.

VICE-CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND'S COURT.

Monday, Dec. 2.

BASHIN v. DAVIS.

Practice—Injunction—Affidavit in support of.

Where an ex parte injunction has been obtained by one party against another by reason of certain facts contained in the affidavit in support of such application, and upon the coming in of the defendant's answer, followed by a motion to dissolve the injunction, there is a positive denial of all the facts sworn to in the plaintiff's affidavit, the Court will look at the amount of credit to be given on either side, and the party whose duty it is to protect the property in dispute till the hearing of the cause will be assisted by the Court in the control and management of the property.

An ex parte injunction had been obtained in July last, restraining the defendant from interfering in the management of a farm situate at Willesden, in Middlesex. The injunction had been granted upon a representation made to the Court that the plaintiff and defendant were jointly interested as partners in the farm, and that notwithstanding the defendant had provided the money to purchase the stock and crops, &c. at the time a contract was entered into with a Mr. Thacker, the owner, to grant a lease for fourteen years, still the understanding between the parties was that the plaintiff should exercise his own discretion, and have the sole management of the farm; that the defendant should furnish the means and make the advances necessary for the purpose of carrying it on, and that they should equally participate in the profits arising therefrom. In his answer, the defendant denied that there ever existed such a pretended understanding as the plaintiff had represented when he obtained the injunction, or that any contract of partnership had ever been in contemplation. On the contrary, the seeming partnership was nothing more than this; viz. that the plaintiff being indebted to the defendant to a considerable amount, the latter conceived that by placing him in the farm it would afford him the means and the opportunity of liquidating the debt which he owed the defendant. The lessor himself had refused to accept the plaintiff as his tenant, and the chief part of the negotiation respecting the lease had been carried on with the defendant, and the whole of the money had been advanced in respect of the farm by the defendant; and it was not until the embarrassed circumstances of the plaintiff rendering it impracticable for him to manage the farm, that the defendant interfered for the sake of protecting his own property. It was under these circumstances that the defendant now moved to dissolve the injunction; and the main points of argument related to the amount of credit to be given to the facts sworn on either side; the defendant positively denying all that had been sworn to by the plaintiff.

Stuart and Wilcock, for the defendant.

Bethel and Ellis, for the plaintiff.

His Honour the VICE-CHANCELLOR said, as the only question now to be determined was that which related to the preservation of the property until the hearing of the cause, and as the defendant appeared to be the party responsible for the protection of that property, it was rather difficult to understand how it could suffer injury by the defendant having the management, especially when the whole course of events in the negotiation for the lease clearly proved that the circumstances of the plaintiff were the cause why the lessor refused to grant the lease to him; and he therefore was of opinion that it would be the grossest injustice to give such a party the management of the farm, and the injunction ought to be dissolved.

Injunction dissolved.

—— v. ——

Practice—New orders, 26th Aug. 1841—Entering appearance for defendant.

By the 8th of the above orders, "if the defendant, being duly served with a subpœna to appear to and answer the bill, shall refuse or neglect to appear thereto, the plaintiff shall, after the expiration of eight days from such service, be at liberty to enter an appearance for the defendant."

Under the 23rd order, the plaintiff may, if he sees fit, dispense with the appearance and answer of a defendant against whom no direct relief is prayed, by serving him with a copy of the bill, such bill praying that the party, upon being served with a copy of the bill, may be bound by all the proceedings in the cause; and by the 24th order a memorandum of service shall be entered at the office of the Clerks of Records and Writs, on obtaining an order for leave to make it.

The 25th order directs that where a defendant shall have been served with a copy of the bill under the 23rd order, and a memorandum of such service shall have been duly entered, and such defendant shall not, within the time limited by the practice of the Court for that purpose, enter an appearance in common form or a special appearance under the 27th order, which allows a party served with a copy of a bill under the 23rd order, who shall desire to be served with a notice of the proceedings in the cause to have the same prosecuted against himself, he shall be at liberty to enter a special appearance under the following form, viz. "A B appears to a bill for the purpose of being served with advice of all proceedings therein."

Three of the defendants under the 23rd order were served with copies of the bill filed on 22nd April: they did not, however, enter any appearance until 3rd June, nine days after such service, but no answer was required from them. On 22nd June a memorandum of service was, in pursuance of an order of the Court, entered with the Clerk of the Records and Writs. The cause being ripe for hearing (the other defendants having filed their answers), the plaintiff's attorney made several applications to the Clerk of the Records and Writs to grant the necessary certificate for the cause to be set down for hearing, which was refused unless the appearance entered for the three defendants was withdrawn. Applications were then made to these defendants to answer, and on 2nd November the Master allowed them fourteen days further time to answer, which expired on 16th November.

No answer was filed by the appointed time, but on 22nd November a warrant was taken out by defendant's solicitor, and served on plaintiff's solicitor, to shew cause on 26th November why they should not have a month's further time to answer, which, however, on that day they abandoned. Instead of the plaintiffs proceeding with the cause at once, they gave notice to the defendants, that unless they filed their answer by a given day they would move that the appearance entered for the defendants might be discharged, and that they should pay the costs of the application. This notice was accordingly served on 4th December, but pending the notice of motion the defendants had put in their answer: Held, that notwithstanding the defendants' delay, the plaintiffs' conduct had not been such as entitled them to the Court's interference, and therefore the motion was refused with costs.

The bill was filed on the 22nd April last, praying that three of the defendants, James William Glover, James Glover, and James Joynson, upon being served with copies of the bill, might be bound by all the proceedings in the cause. J. Inskip, a clerk to the plaintiff's attorney, on the 25th May, personally served the defendant, J. W. Glover, with a true copy of the bill, by leaving it at his residence; and on the same day the said clerk also served James Glover with a copy, at his residence; and on the same day, in like manner, he also served J. Joynson.

These defendants did not enter any appearance until the 3rd June; an appearance was entered by the clerk of the records and writs for them, and a notice thereof sent to the defendants' attorney. No answer was required to the bill from any defendant, save Sir C. R. Cockerell. By an order of the Vice-Chancellor, 12th June, it was ordered that a memorandum of such service might be entered in the record and writs office pursuant to the order of the Court.

On the 22nd June, a memorandum of such service was, in pursuance of the last order, entered with the clerk of the record and writs. No appearance was entered for either of the defendants on whom copies of the bill were served, except those three defendants. Sir C. R. Cockerell having filed his answer, and the cause being ripe for hearing, the said J. Inskip made several applications to the clerk of the records and writs to grant the necessary certificate to enable the said J. Inskip to set down the cause for hearing, which he refused, unless the appearance entered for the three defendants was withdrawn.

By the directions of plaintiff's solicitor, the said J. Inskip made frequent applications to the defendants' solicitor to put in their answer; and on the 2nd Nov. the master to whom the cause stood referred, upon the application of the defendants for a month further time to answer, made an order, whereby he directed that the defendants should have fourteen days' further time to answer, which expired on the 16th Nov.

No answer having been filed at the expiration of the time, the said clerk to the plaintiff's solicitor again applied to the defendants' solicitor to put in their answer; and on or about the 22nd Nov. a warrant was taken out before the master by the defendants' solicitor, and a copy served on the plaintiff's solicitor, calling on them to shew cause, on the 26th Nov. why the defendants should not have a month's further time to answer.

The said clerk (Inskip) attended on the last-mentioned day, when the warrant was made returnable, to oppose the application; but the defendants' solicitor did not attend.

The three defendants not having filed their answer, induced a supposition that they did not intend to do so, except for the purpose of delaying the plaintiffs from proceeding with the cause.

On the 2nd December the plaintiff's solicitor wrote the defendants' solicitor a letter as follows:—

"Dear Sirs,—Powell v. Cockerell, unless the answer of defendants Glovers and Johnson is filed on Wednesday morning next, we shall, in the afternoon of that day, give a notice of motion that the appearance entered for those defendants may be discharged, and that they may be ordered to pay the costs of this application.

This notice was served accordingly on the 4th December, that the Clerk of the Records and Writs be at liberty to withdraw the appearance which was on the 3rd June last entered to the plaintiff's bill for the three defendants, and that the plaintiffs may be at liberty to set down the cause for hearing, and that the three defendants might be ordered to pay the costs of that application.

The application was made on the authority of Hall v. Bullock (a case not reported), in which the Vice-Chancellor of England made an order in the terms asked by the present notice of motion, except as to the costs of the application. The only difference between the case of Hall v. Bullock and this present application was stated to be that, in the former the appearance for the defendants was not entered for the defendants until seventeen days after they had been served with copies of the bill, and the order for leave to enter a memorandum of service was obtained before such appearance was entered; whereas in the present case, the appearance for the defendants was entered nine days after service of copies of the bill on them, viz. 3rd of June, and the order for leave to enter a memorandum of service was not obtained until 12th June last: but it was submitted that these two circumstances did not at all affect the merits of the case; for if the defendants required the suit to be prosecuted against them, it was necessary that they should enter their appearance within the time prescribed by the practice of the Court, viz. eight days; the 24th Order of 26th August 1841, being silent as to within what time the order for leave to enter a memorandum of service, or of the entry of such memorandum is to be made. And it was submitted that this was a much stronger case than Hall v. Bullock to call for the interference of the Court in causing the appearance entered for the defendants to be withdrawn; for that when they had five months to answer they applied for an extension of time, and when that time expired they took out a warrant for further time, but abandoned it.

Bethel and Cockerell, for the motion, submitted that the plaintiffs had all along desired to have the cause heard, but had been prevented by the irregular appearance of the three defendants. After the eight days, for the 25th Order directs that "when a defendant shall have been served with a copy of the bill under the 23rd Order," &c. after the eight days, therefore, the rule is, that when you serve the defendant under the 23rd Order, he must enter an appearance in the common form, or a special appearance under the 27th Order; the plaintiff may proceed in the cause as if the party served with a copy of the bill were not a party thereto. In this case, therefore, the appearances was not duly entered. That the exposition of the 25th Order was made by the Court in Hall v. Bullock on 15th June, 1843, and that the plaintiffs were not able to set down the causes for hearing by reason of the incumbrances which the defendants had thought fit to put upon the progress of the suit by their month time to answer; they had been playing a game of obstruction, to whom it was said if you do not answer, we will take advantage of your not appearing, but if you put in your answer we will take no advantage. That the present application was made to discharge the appearance, of which notice was given, to which the defendants paid no attention; but then, when they are served with the notice of motion, they then put in their answer, and the question was, whether the defendants were not bound to pay the costs, as they had, after notice of motion, effected that which, had they done before, the notice itself would have been unnecessary.

Lloyd, for the defendants.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR thought that the plaintiffs had been trafficking with the defendants with respect to their putting in their answer; that if the defendants had been playing the game of obstruction, the plaintiffs themselves had not acted a straightforward part, but that there had been too much of the fast and loose system observed, and therefore Refused the motion with costs.

ROLLS COURT.

Thursday, Dec. 19.

HEMMING v. DINGWALL.

After the allowance by the Master of exceptions to an answer, a further answer is put in by the defendant, and on the same day an order to amend, and for the defendant to answer the amendments, &c. is obtained by the plaintiff, but not served till some time after: the order is irregular, and will be discharged.

Southgate moved to discharge an order to amend, and for the defendant to answer, &c. obtained in this cause by the plaintiff on the 14th November last.

The Master had, on the 13th November, decided in favour of the validity of exceptions which had been taken to the defendant's answer, and on the 16th, the defendant filed a further answer. On the same 16th, the Master's certificate was obtained, and the plaintiff applied for and obtained an order to amend, and for the defendant to answer, &c. but did not serve it till the 4th inst. The order, therefore, it was contended, was irregular, on the ground that it was obtained before the Master's certificate, and ought to be discharged with costs.

Wilcock, contrà. [The MASTER of the ROLLS.—A further answer being put in, can you serve a subpœna with the order to amend an answer?] No; but the order is good as to the part not complied with, viz. the amendment. The order, therefore, became a mere common order to amend.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—It is clear the order is irregular. The master having certified his allowance of the exceptions, the defendant files a further answer, and the plaintiff obtains his order to amend; which was obtained first makes no difference; they were both on the same day. If the defendant knew of the plaintiff's order, his course would be irregular. But the order to amend and answer was not served till the 4th of December; meanwhile the defendant's answer was put upon the file, and being there, nevertheless, says the plaintiff, I will serve him with the order. It is clearly irregular, and must be dismissed with costs.

Re THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY ACTS, and Re RHODES, a Solicitor.

A public company, who by their act of incorporation were bound to pay all costs, charges, and expenses incurred in the purchase of lands either by themselves or the vendor, entered into a contract for the purchase of lands not comprised within the compulsory clause of their Act, and in the memorandum of agreement it was stipulated that the costs, &c. as well of themselves as of the vendor, should be paid and discharged by them pursuant to their Act. Subsequently they obtained another Act of Parliament, by which it was enacted that all costs, &c. which they were liable to pay should be taxed as therein mentioned. Then the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, was passed; and the company having refused to pay the vendor's solicitor's bill of costs when delivered, an action of covenant was brought on the agreement. The company then moved to refer the bill for taxation, but the motion was refused with costs.

On a motion or petition for taxation, there is no jurisdiction to construe an agreement; but if there be any equitable grounds for interference with the legal effect of it, or any necessity to consider its import, it can only be by bill filed for that purpose.

In 1836 the Great Western Railway obtained an Act (6 Wm. 4), by which (as well as by previous Acts) it was, among other things, enacted, that in all purchases of lands, &c. the costs, charges, and expenses, both of the company and the vendors, should be exclusively borne by the company. And by a subsequent Act (2 Vict. c. 27) it was enacted, that all costs, &c. which the company should, by their acts, be liable to pay, should be taxable, and taxed as therein mentioned, viz. by an officer of the Court of Exchequer, &c. Between the passing of 6 Wm. 4 and the 2 Vict. viz. on the 1st Dec. the company purchased certain property, which they were not entitled, by their Acts, compulsorily to take from Mr. Palmer, of Holme Park, Berks, at the sum of 9,345*l*. 12s. 6d.; and on the 3rd Dec. 1836, a memorandum of agreement was drawn up, in which there was a stipulation that the costs, &c. of Mr. Palmer, as well as of the company, should be paid by the company pursuant to their Act, that is the 6 Wm. 4. After the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, came into operation, viz.

on the 23rd August, 1843, Mr. Rhodes, the solicitor of Mr. Palmer, delivered his bill of costs, which contained, among others, the following items:—100*l.* for maps; 75*l.* for two clerks, books, &c.; 130*l.* for abstracts; and 50*l.* a year for the year 1838 and four following years, for general attendance, which items were objected to. On the 12th May, 1844, Mr. Rhodes brought an action on the covenant in the memorandum against the company to recover the costs, &c. which they had agreed to pay; which action is still pending. In Nov. 1844 a rule nisi was granted by the Court of Exchequer to refer the bill for taxation under the 16th section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and on the 29th of the same month the order was discharged, on the ground that their jurisdiction was gone under the 5 Vict. c. 5, which transferred the Equity Exchequer to the Court of Chancery, and the business being done out of court it was not competent for a common law court to adjudicate thereon. The company now moved to have the bill referred for taxation, under their Acts, as well as the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

Turner (with him Stevens), for the motion, contended that the words "pursuant to the Act," &c. had relation, not to the mode of ascertaining the costs to be paid pointed out in the latter part of the 10th section of the Act, but to the costs which were to be paid by the company. The object of introducing the provision was this: the company were to pay the vendor's costs; they might not be ascertained, and they could not have possession without payment. Now there is an express condition that by depositing the purchase money, &c. in Exchequer bills, in Messrs. Child and Co's, they may enter into possession. Then all costs which the company are liable to pay (as they are these) are made taxable by the 2nd Vict. c. 5; and by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, we are enabled to have taxation on special circumstances being shewn; and we are able to point to items unsustainable.

Kindersley (with him Willcocks), contended that the 2 Vict. c. 5, pointed out the mode of ascertaining the costs as between the vendor, not the solicitor, and the company, and superseded any other mode of ascertaining the costs. The company, therefore, had no right to call in question the solicitor's bill, or ask it to be taxed; there is an agreement between the parties to do the thing in a particular way, and an action is now brought for a breach of that agreement, and if the Court adjudicated, it might conflict with the decision of the Court of law.

Turner, in reply, denied that the agreement imported into it the Act to which it referred.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—I am of opinion that the several Acts of Parliament did not give jurisdiction to decide a question arising upon special agreement between the parties, and that they only authorized the ascertaining of the amount, not whether there was a special agreement as to that. There are some points not included in the present consideration of the question. The company do not dispute their liability to pay the costs, nor does Mr. Palmer say he is to receive such costs as were claimed by his solicitor. The liability to pay is admitted by the company; the only claim they make being to have the bill reduced. The question then is, as to how that reduction is to take place. One side say by taxation, the other will have it settled in accordance with the agreement. If the contract had not contained a particular clause as to the costs, they would be regulated by the Acts. Many items, not taxable at the time of the agreement, are made so by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and means are provided for ascertaining the amount. But the agreement for the purchase contained many clauses not affected by the Act of Parliament which was said to relate to the nature of the agreement and mode of taxation. The conflict arises on this—whether the words "all expenses, &c. pursuant, &c." refer to the mode of ascertaining the costs, or not. It is said they apply only to what are costs, not to the mode of ascertaining them. Perhaps that is not the true construction, but can I on motion say what is the effect of an agreement on which an action is pending. I am desired to say the agreement is not applicable. I have not jurisdiction to do so on an application of this nature. If there should appear to be no legal defence, any equitable relief must be by bill. I refuse the motion, with costs.

PRITCHARD v. MORGAN.

One of several persons entitled to a fund, on applying for his portion of the fund, must serve the others with notice, and pay the costs of their appearance.

The petitioner in this case stated that the sum of 17,000*l.* had been left to Mr. Pritchard and wife, for life, and on their death, to be divided among their children on their attaining twenty-one. The petitioner had now attained twenty-one, and was entitled to his share; but objected to pay the costs of appearance of the others, who had been served with notice. One only appeared, and

Lloyd asked for his costs, stating that had the petitioner waited till all the others were in a condition to come at the same time, he would have avoided the payment of any costs.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said, the practice had been settled ever since the time of Sir Thomas Plumer. The other parties had a right to appear and prevent the petitioner from taking out too much of the fund, and they must therefore have the costs.

Re THOMPSON.

Taxation of costs—Special agreement.

Where an adjustment of differences takes place between a plaintiff and defendant, and a memorandum of agreement is drawn up which contains a clause as to the payment of costs, the effect of which is disputed, the Court will not on petition construe the agreement. Also, if the circumstances of pressure, &c. are alleged as special circumstances on which to ground a petition for taxation, and an affidavit is put in just before the hearing, the petition will be allowed to stand over for an affidavit in reply.

This was a petition for the taxation of the bill of costs of Mr. Thompson, the solicitor of the plaintiff, in a cause of Harris v. Harris, amounting to 45*l.* 3s. 3d. Henry Harris, by his will in 1813, gave the residue of his estate to his son H. Harris, and daughters Sarah and Ann, whom he also appointed his executor and executrixes. Henry Harris, the son, died intestate, leaving his sisters and his widow, E. Harris, surviving. On the 13th September, 1842, the widow took out administration to her deceased husband, and demanded an account of the residuary estate from the executrixes, to which they demurred, conceiving, by some mistake, that they had an absolute right to the entire. On the 14th December, she filed her bill against the executrixes; and they, being better advised, became desirous to render an account without putting in an answer, and an adjustment at last took place, and a memorandum of agreement was drawn up, by which, among other things, it was stipulated that the defendants should pay all the costs, &c. After this the solicitor for the plaintiff delivered his bill of costs on the 26th October, 1843, and claimed as between solicitor and client on the grounds of the defendants having stipulated to pay the costs, &c. To this the defendants objected, but proposed to leave the matter to any solicitor. Several communications then passed between the solicitors on both sides, and finally the bill was paid on the 13th November, 1843, under protest, and under the pressure of a threat by the plaintiff's solicitor to compel the defendants to answer (they being then in contempt) and to put on a distringas. There was also an affidavit put in by one of the parties just before the hearing.

Lloyd, for the petition, which was answered on the 12th November, 1844, and therefore within the twelve months.

Kindersley, contrà.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said he could not construe a special agreement on a petition, and could, therefore, say nothing of the construction of the memorandum as to costs. The only special circumstances were pressure, &c. and he would permit the petition to stand over, to allow an affidavit in reply to that so lately put in.

In re WHEELER.

Where an order for taxation has been refused by a common law judge, who has competent jurisdiction to decide upon the question, it will not be reconsidered in a court of equity.

In this case, Mr. Wheeler had instituted a suit for the petitioner against the Great Western Railway Company, and having delivered his bill of costs, it was some time after paid. The petitioner then made an application to Mr. Justice Maule, to have the bill taxed, and he refused an order, on the ground that the petitioner was too late, saying, "you ought to have come earlier." Whether he referred to the delivery or the payment of the bill was not clear, and the petitioner thought he had a right, coming as he did within the twelve months.

Kindersley, for the motion, was stopped.

The MASTER of the ROLLS.—The application to Mr. Justice Maule was an application for the taxation of a taxable bill to an authority competent to adjudicate upon it. I fear I can do nothing; I ought to assume that Mr. Justice Maule did all that was right. This is a mere legal right. I cannot grant the petition.

VICE-CHANCELLOR KNIGHT BRUCE'S COURT.

Friday, Dec. 20.

PALIN v. GATHERCOLE.

Injunction—Publication of letters.

Motion to dissolve an ex-parte injunction to restrain the publication of letters upon which a plea of justification in an action had been grounded, a verdict for the plaintiff in the action having been taken by consent—refused.

In this case the defendant was a clergyman, the editor of a periodical publication called the Church Intelligencer. On the 8th of March, 1843, he published an article reflecting upon the character of a Mr. Nokes, for which an action for libel was brought against him. This action was discontinued upon an apology being made. The Rev. — Palin (the plaintiff), who had occasionally contributed articles for the Church Intelligencer, was alleged by Mr. Gathercole to have supplied the materials for the articles published by him respecting Mr. Nokes, and application was accordingly made to Mr. Palin for a portion of the costs incurred by Mr. Gathercole in Mr. Nokes's action, and refused. Mr. Gathercole, upon this, inserted in his paper an article imputing to Mr. Palin the authorship of the libel upon Mr. Nokes. For the publication of this Mr. Palin brought an action against Mr. Gathercole, in which issue was joined, and a verdict for 40s. was taken by consent, and it was alleged by the plaintiff in this suit that part of the arrangement upon which this verdict was taken was that his letters to Mr. Gathercole should be given up to him. Upon the defendant's threatening to publish these letters, Mr. Palin filed the present bill, and upon it obtained ex parte an injunction by which the defendant, his servants and agents, were restrained from printing or publishing these letters or any of them, or shewing them or any of them to any persons or person, and from informing any persons or person of their or any of their contents until the defendant should fully answer the bill, or order should be made to the contrary.

Wigram and Hetherington, on behalf of the defendant, now moved to dissolve this injunction. They cited Gee v. Pritchard (2 Swanst. 424), and Lord and Lady Perceval v. Phipps (2 Ves. & Bea. 25.)

Russell, Terrell, and E. James, for the plaintiff, were not heard.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that as to the fact of the alleged agreement before the verdict forming part of the grounds of that verdict, he had no means of knowing beyond the statement made by the defendant's counsel. Assuming that it did not, it was impossible for him to say more than that the defendant had done no more than bring that matter-of-fact in question. Assuming that it did, and that ultimately it would be decided against the plaintiff, his Honour was not in a condition then to say that it would be so. Under such circumstances he was not sure that had he proceeded in granting the injunction upon the fact so disputed, he should feel it right, on the materials now before him, to dissolve the injunction. But he did not grant the injunction upon the agreement which was said to be existing. The letters in question were not written with a view to publication as written; they were given to the defendant to use the information contained in them. The defendant said that he had used the information, and used it accurately. The plaintiff said that he used it inaccurately. The matter was considered libellous by a person named Nokes, and an action brought by him was compromised by the defendant's paying Nokes his costs and apologizing. That concluded the matter between the defendant and Nokes. That, however, would leave the matter of right and wrong between these parties as it stood before. The defendant, Mr. Gathercole, applied to Mr. Palin for half of these costs, and the plaintiff refusing to accede to the claim, the defendant published a short statement in his paper, to the effect that the plaintiff, by the information he had given, was substantially the author of the libel upon Mr. Nokes. For this the plaintiff brings his action, and to this action a plea of justification is filed, setting forth that the matter published in the case of Nokes was the production of Mr. Palin, and that the defendant had in his possession letters from the plaintiff to prove that such was the case. Upon that justification issue was joined; the venue was laid in Surrey, and the trial was to take place at Guildford. Immediately before the trial, the defendant, adopting with some reluctance the advice of his counsel, submitted to a verdict for the plaintiff, with 40s. damages and costs. Under these circumstances Mr. Gathercole desires to publish the letters between Mr. Palin and himself, which he says will establish the truth of his plea of justification. It would be too much to give way to the remarks and arguments made by the defendant's counsel. [illegible]haps hereafter, upon a more expanded view of t[illegible], on d[illegible]ons then to be taken, and upon mat[illegible] before the Court, the injunction might not s[illegible]. The time, however, had not arrived for those distinctions and those materials to be produced, and the Court was now called upon to exercise its jurisdiction only with regard to the materials before it. The injunction must stand until the hearing, without prejudice to those distinctions which did not at present exist, and which might hereafter be taken to shew that it ought not to be continued. His Honour had felt some difficulty as to interfering upon a verdict only, before judgment, and it was not without hesitation upon that point that he granted the injunction; but he did so as he had been informed that the verdict was taken by consent. The injunction could not now be dissolved; but the defendant might be at liberty to shew the letters to his attorneys and counsel for the purposes of the cause.

After hearing the plaintiff's counsel as to costs,

His HONOUR directed that they should be reserved.

ASHBY v. ASHBY.

Will, construction of—Legacies charged on real estate—Assignment of wife's reversionary interest.

Legacies held under the particular terms of the will to be charged on the real estate alone.

A wife being entitled to a reversionary legacy, her husband assigned it by way of mortgage, and survived the period appointed for payment. Held, that the assignment was void.

In this case two questions arose upon the will of Edward Ashby, dated the 4th of May, 1811. The first question will sufficiently appear from the Vice-Chancellor's judgment.

Heathfield, Renshaw, and Kinglake, for the several parties.

The case of Bennett v. Aburrow (8 Ves. 609) was cited.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The question is whether there is an intent apparent in this will that the three legacies should be paid out of the real estate alone. The testator gives his real estate to his wife for life, and subject thereto to his son William in fee, "but charged and chargeable nevertheless with the payment of the legacies hereinafter mentioned to my two sons, Thomas and Edward, and my daughter Elizabeth." It may be thought without more that the real estate is intended to be only the secondary fund for these legacies. He goes on—"I give to my said son, William Ashby, my silver half-pint cup, and desire my wife will give to my daughter Elizabeth two silver table spoons." It occurred to me that the wife's being directed to give the tablespoons would neutralize the intention to charge the legacies on the real estate alone; but I think that this might have given to the wife only the power to select. Then he gives the three legacies, to be paid at the end of twelve months after the decease of his wife by his son William. I do not say that this is of itself decisive, but it is very strong. Then—" and all my household goods and household furniture, ready money and securities for money, horses, cows, sheep, and other cattle, and all other my personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever and of what nature or kind soever not by me before disposed of, after and subject to the payment of my interest, debts, and funeral expenses, and the charges and expenses of proving this my last will, I give and bequeath unto my said wife, Sarah Ashby, and my said son, William Ashby, equally:" William alone being the person by whom the legacy was to be paid. Taking it altogether, I think this will does indicate an intention to charge the legacies upon the real estate alone.

The second question upon this will arose as follows. The testator's daughter, Elizabeth, to whom he gave a legacy of 80*l.* payable twelve months after the decease of his wife, was married to Edward Palmer. The testator's widow continued in possession of the real estate until her death on the 2nd of October, 1827. By indenture dated the 11th of October, 1826, Edward Palmer assigned to Susannah Clarke, this legacy of 80*l.* by way of mortgage to secure the sum of 30*l.* and interest, and Susannah Clarke afterwards assigned it to her grandson, R. Clarke. Edward Palmer survived Sarah Ashby more than twelve months, and the question was, whether the assignment to Susannah Clarke was valid.

The following cases were cited:—Elwin v. Williams (21 Law Journal, N. S. 440); Johnson v. Johnson (1 J. & W. 472); Purdue v. Jackson (1 Russ. 1); Bates v. Dandy (3 Russ. 74 n.); Honner v. Morton (3 Russ. 63); and Hutchings v. Smith (9 Sim. 137.)

The VICE CHANCELLOR.—What would have been the effect on the wife's right and claims if the husband had bonâ fide, and for a valuable consideration, executed a deed of release of this legacy I give no opinion, but I think the case of Elwin v. Williams warrants me to act on my own opinion which agrees with it. I follow it, and accordingly decide in favour of the wife.

THE LEGISLATOR.

Summary.

As the time for the meeting of Parliament approaches, speculation is afloat as to the measures to be proposed for its deliberation, and the probabilities of success or failure. A few only of those talked about have a peculiar interest for our readers, and these we will recapitulate with the latest rumours relating to them.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM'S proposed alterations in the Law of Settlement are in the hands of our readers. They have been vehemently debated both within and without the Profession, and opinion inclines decidedly against the suggested changes; so that there is very little probability of the measure becoming law, and certainly not without considerable amendment. But so great is the difficulty of substituting a better law of settlement for the existing one, imperfect as undoubtedly it is, we suspect, and such is the general opinion, that the Bill will be altogether abandoned, and that as far as the Legislature is concerned, the law will remain unaltered for some years. It is understood that Sir JAMES GRAHAM'S Bill does not emanate from Somerset House, and that it is not altogether approved by the Poor Law Commissioners, nor is it a Cabinet measure. It is a crotchet of his own, and although any thing proposed by a statesman of such large experience and unquestionable ability is entitled to respectful consideration, he must himself be satisfied that in this scheme he does not carry with him the opinions of any of the parties interested, or from their position best fitted to form a judgment of the necessities of the case.

The Bill for regulating the fees of Clerks of the Peace, Magistrates' Clerks, &c. was another measure offered at the close of the session to the consideration of the public and of the parties most immediately interested in its provisions. From all we can gather, the measure, as a whole, appears to be approved, and therefore, with a few modifications, it may be expected to be one of the new laws of the coming Session.

Another admirable measure, or rather series of measures, has attracted but little attention, although fraught with important benefits. We allude to Mr. GLADSTONE'S model bills for facilitating and abbreviating private Acts. The design is to make a general enactment to apply to all private bills, comprising the general clauses now always introduced into each one. These will pass, of course, and thenceforth private bills will require only such clauses as apply directly to their object: or where, from the special circumstances of the case, it is necessary to deviate from the general law.

We trust that ere long a similar measure will be prepared to apply to all public Acts. It would not be difficult to frame a general constructive clause and some half-dozen others which might prevent the repetitions of the same provisions in each statute, and materially abbreviate the now unavoidable verbosity of our statute book.

Of the Criminal Law Consolidation Bill we hear nothing. We much fear that this and some other useful measures long talked of will be thrust aside to make room for the Railway Bill with which the Parliament threatens to be overwhelmed.

We shall glance at other projects of legislation next week.

The following excellent and truthful letter has appeared in the Times:—

LAW REFORMS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

SIR,—You will confer a lasting obligation upon money-loving, time saving, and lawyer-hating John Bull, if you will follow up the observations of your correspondent "E. R." in the Times of this day, by exposing and condemning the reprehensible manner in which bills of the utmost importance in their effect upon commercial and landed interests are hurried through Parliament. Our statute-books are thus abounding with unintelligible clauses and verbal inaccuracies. It is a remarkable and deeply to be regretted fact, that whilst the laws of all other civilised nations are found in a comprehensive and condensed code, as originally enacted, the laws of England are to be read, not in our statute books, but in the voluminous reports of judicial decisions, extending over a period of more than two centuries; and yet the principle of our legislative enactments is, perhaps, the most perfect of any system of jurisprudence in the world. Acts of Parliament are hidden mysteries. That which every subject is not only supposed, but bound to know, is so involved in doubt and obscurity, that men who have devoted the greater portion of their lives to investigate and expound its meaning, often fail to elucidate or explain what that meaning is. So various and conflicting are the decisions upon many of the most important Acts of Parliament, that days may be occupied in searching out the construction to be given to a sentence of a few lines. Our forefathers have erred, but the present generation walk more blindly in their steps. Why? Because months are wasted in the discussion, in our Houses of Legislature, of questions involving no principle but party strength: and then, at the close of a session, Acts deeply, lastingly affecting the real interests of the community, are so hurried over, that both in logical construction and verbal accuracy a schoolboy would be ashamed of such productions. In the Acts only of the last session I could point out one hundred instances strongly justifying this remark. Section 58 of chapter 110 (a most important Act) refers to schedule I; that schedule has nothing to do with the subject-mater of section 58. The reference of that schedule is to section 50; but that section has equally nothing to do with schedule I. Schedule G, to which section 58 should have referred, contains a reference to section 56, that section requires no reference to any schedule; and so, in that one Act, fifty inaccuracies might be pointed out; but I ought to mention that the Act was not for the purpose of regulating the duty upon corn, or legislating for Ireland; it was only for the registration, incorporation, and regulation of Joint Stock Companies. If a solicitor were to prepare a deed or any legal document which required within a few months to amend it or explain its meaning, what would be the consequence? He would justly lose the confidence of his clients; and yet laws, the most solemn of recorded instruments, involving the interests of millions, and which ought to be read and understood by all affected by them, often require to be expounded by twelve judges of the land, six of whom will perhaps decide a sentence to have one meaning, and the other six will hold it to have exactly the contrary meaning. Look at the result; our statute-books abound with Acts amended and repealed, because the intent of those Acts could not be understood; and our law libraries are crowded with more than a thousand volumes of reported cases, expounding the way in which the laws are to be construed, whilst commentators and essayists for the same purpose are numberless. This is a most serious national evil, striking at the very root of our happiness and prosperity, because affecting the security of our rights. Well may Justice be represented in our courts blindfolded. The bill introduced into the House of Lords the last session but one, by Lord Campbell, was much ridiculed, and most justly so; but he was wiser than those who have endeavoured to simplify the transfer of property; he knew that he could not untie, and therefore attempted to cut the knot; but they endeavour to untie it, being equally ignorant of the intricacy of its folds. The men to frame statutes for remodelling our system of conveyancing law are not men who stand prominent for forensic talent and judicial wisdom. I am not mistaken when I say, that there are few articled clerks who in the third or fourth year of their studies would not be more capable of drawing a deed than the Lord Chancellor or the Lord Chief Justice. Judges are expounders of principles, not artificers able to form a machine; they know the result of its action when formed, but they cannot construct it. The men who understand how, and who ought to be employed to remodel the laws relating to the transfer of property are conveyancers, who in their silent chambers have plodded through all the mysteries and intricacies of the existing labyrinth, and know practically where the path may be cleared, and the way shortened, the right end still being attained. Let Government appoint six of the leading conveyancers of the day to frame a general act for simplifying the transfer of property, and there will be no need to have the often-inserted saving clause, "that this act may be amended this present session of Parliament;" nor would your correspondents "A Conveyancer," and "E. R." be antagonists on the arena of your columns, each attempting to prove that four lines must have a directly opposite effect to that which the other assigns to them. The public at large little know the labour and anxiety which such multiplied and self-multiplying statutes cast upon the professional man. He must now, after each session, wade through a large volume of 900 or 1,000 closely printed pages, attempt to reconcile discordant sentences, judge of the effect of verbal inaccuracies, and solve the meaning of confused and dubious clauses; and after all, when his mental energies have been worn out in the task, await anxiously, year after year, to see if the judges will put the same construction as his individual mind has adopted, and upon which he has been obliged to act in cases where thousands of pounds may be at stake.

In truth, a lawyer of the present day ought to have the strength of Hercules, the eyes of Argus, and the wisdom of Minerva, and then he would sink under the doubts and perplexities arising from the Act for Simplifying the transfer of Property.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

Nicholas-lane, Dec. 27. S. B. C.

PARLIAMENTARY RETURNS.

SIGNATURE OF EXCHEQUER-BILLS.—Sir George Clerk and Colonel Sibthorp have moved for and obtained some returns relative to the signature of Exchequer-bills and copies of letters addressed from the Controller-General of the Exchequer to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, dated the 15th of January and the 1st of April, 1844. From a general abstract contained in these papers, it appears that the gross total number of Exchequer-bills signed by the Controller-General in the year ending the 31st of December, 1842, amounted to 19,236, and the value thereof to 34,921,811*l*.; of these 10,981 were signed by Lord Monteagle and Mr. Perceval, and 8,255 by Lord Monteagle and Mr. Eden. The total number of bills signed by the Assistant Controller during the same period amounted altogether to 13,419, and the value thereof to 9,340,665*l*. The number of bills signed by the Controller-General, from Dec. 31, 1842, to March 28, 1844, amounted to 14,210, and the value thereof to 53,540,627*l*. The number of bills signed by the Assistant Controller during the same period amounted to 22,119, and the value thereof to 9,211,487*l*. The total number of bills signed in the same period by the Controller-General and the Assistant Controller, amounted to 78,984, and the value thereof to 107,021,491*l*. The movers of the return having instituted an inquiry into the number of days in which Lord Monteagle devotes himself to the high and important duties of his situation, it is answered that in the year 1842 the noble Controller-General of the Exchequer attended at his office for 199 days, and was absent during the same year 111 days. In 1843, his attendance was during 204 days, and his absence 106 days; manifesting a slight tendency towards increased application to business. Since New Year's day, 1844, the noble lord has attended 76 days without any interval of absence. The total of his attendance during the above interval has been 479 days.

A HINT FOR OUR LEGISLATORS.—M. Sauvard de Maupas, a young man of highly respectable family, was tried before the Court of Assize at Paris on Friday last, for having stabbed a carpenter in the Rue Laffitte, on the afternoon of the 7th of November last, by which the unfortunate man lost his life. The prisoner, who was defended by M. Chaix d'Est Ange, was acquitted of the homicide, but was sentenced by the court to pay a sum of 1,000f., and an annuity of 600f. for the joint lives of the father and mother of the victim.

JOHN HARDY, ESQ., M.P.—We are happy to hear that this estimable gentleman is recovering from his recent attack of indisposition. It is said, however, we know not with what degree of truth, that the honourable gentleman does not intend to resume his duties in Parliament, but will vacate his seat at the commencement of the next session. The rumour adds that Mr. Hardy's third son, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, barrister at law, will offer himself for the acceptance of the constituency. It is stated that the free traders contemplate starting Colonel Perronet Thompson, if a vacancy should be created.—Leeds Intelligencer.

THE MAGISTRATE.

Summary.

WE are averse to the punishment of death; we believe it to be as injurious in practice as it is wrong in principle, and if any further evidence of its evil effects were wanting, it would be found in an extraordinary document which has recently proceeded from the Bishop, clergy, and inhabitants of Chester, praying a mitigation of the sentence passed upon Mary Gallop for the deliberate murder of her father. Now, if ever there was a case that deserved the infliction of death punishment, this was one; for although the murder was suggested, as are so many crimes, by the perusal of another murder by poisoning reported in the newspapers, it was planned with malice aforethought, and executed deliberately. After her condemnation, the parricide expressed sorrow for her crime; and most people do when they are detected, and about to suffer punishment; and she made a confession, detailing motives which are but the transcript of the history of half the murders that are committed. Her father was opposed to a match on which her mind was bent, and because he was an obstacle in the way of the gratification of her wishes, she poisoned him, to get rid of him. It appears that she had been a teacher in a Wesleyan Sunday School, and had previously borne an excellent character.

Hereupon the following memorial was framed, and received the signatures of the Bishop of Chester, of many of the clergy, and a great number of the inhabitants of that city and its neighbourhood:—

REASONS FOR PETITIONING THE QUEEN TO OBTAIN A COMMUTATION OF PUNISHMENT TO MARY GALLOP, NOW UNDER SENTENCE OF DEATH IN CHESTER CASTLE.

1. That we have reason to believe that the above account of her past life and confession of her guilt to be true, and confirmed, in its leading points, by the evidence on her trial.

2. That it is highly probable that until the time when she committed the crime for which she was condemned to death, her life had been irreproachable, and that she had conducted herself as a teacher in a Wesleyan Methodist School with strict propriety.

3. That the dreadful crime which she confesses of causing the death of her father, does not appear to have been long premeditated, but to have been accidentally suggested to her mind by a person in her company relating the circumstance of a wife having poisoned her husband by obtaining arsenic for the alleged purpose of destroying rats; and that she, namely, Mary Gallop, being at that time in great distress of mind from disappointed affection, and the determination of her father not to suffer her to marry the young man to whom she had been long attached, suddenly resolved to overcome the obstacle to the accomplishment of her wishes, by the dreadful crime of taking away the life of her father, and that she was not influenced to this great crime by any malignant hatred to her father, but as a means that occurred to her mind of enabling her to marry the person to whom she had engaged herself.

4. That should the Queen's mercy be extended to this miserable woman, she might prove of great use in being employed in teaching young persons in one of the schools in any place to which she may be transported; and that she may have the means, by a life of penitential sorrow, to make a more effectual preparation to appear before her Maker, than the limited time now granted to her, if her execution take place at the time now fixed.

5. That the revolting spectacle of a young female being publicly executed might be avoided, and the inhabitants of Chester spared so shocking and painful an exhibition.

6. That the jury who tried her case recommended her to mercy.

The language of this petition has been justly and powerfully condemned by many of the newspapers, and in all that these have said of it we most cordially concur. It is, in fact, an elaborate palliation of an enormous crime, and calculated to confound all moral and religious principle. Every word of the commentary of The Examiner is admirable, because so true.

This is nothing less than an apology for murder. As in the case of the Sealys in the West, the father was in the daughter's way, and she removed him as she would have got rid of a rat. The world was horrified some years ago by Miss Blandy's murder of her father in the same circumstances; she was attached to a Captain Cranstoun, the father objected to the match, and Miss Blandy poisoned him, at the suggestion, it was believed, of her lover. No Bishop in that day made it a plea for pardon, that "being at the time in great distress of mind from disappointed affection, and the determination of her father not to suffer her to marry the young man to whom she had been long attached, she suddenly resolved to overcome the obstacle to the accomplishment of her wishes by the dreadful crime of taking away the life of her father; and that she was not influenced to this great crime by any malignant hatred to her father, but as a means that occurred to her mind of enabling her to marry the person to whom she had engaged herself."

The murder was thus purely an affair of the heart. The arsenic was only called in to smooth the course of true love. Parents have flinty hearts, no tears can move them, so poison is the compelled resource.

The French talk of marriages of convenience. According to the Bishop of Chester, this was a murder of convenience. There was not an atom of hate in the arsenic. Mary Gallop wished her father no ill, but she wished him out of the way, and put him out of the way accordingly.

And look at the circumstances treated by the Bishop as extenuating. She heard a story of murder; instead of feeling any horror at it, the idea of imitating it only strikes her mind. Then comes the calculation of safety, how the death by the means of killing rats would be attributed to the bowel complaint. The method in accomplishing the crime is in keeping with all the rest. The poison bought in pennyworth after pennyworth, attempted to be administered in a cake, but that failing, no compunction, no relenting, but another expedient, with deadly success, adopted.

The Bishop's petition states that the parricide suddenly resolved to overcome the obstacle to her wishes. But though the resolution may have been as sudden as the adoption of any evil purpose may be to a very depraved and evilly disposed mind, upon the first presentation of the idea of it, the means of giving effect to it were far from precipitate; they were marked with method and perseverance.

The plea that there was no malignant hatred to the father is one of the originalities of criminal sympathy.

A highwayman cuts the traveller's throat to obtain his purse; there is in this no malignant hatred to the traveller; he is killed as an obstacle to the possession of the purse.

But our present purpose is to point this singular occurrence to another moral. The document which has been so properly denounced indicates, as we believe, not so much the opinions of the memorialists upon the crime, as their aversion of the punishment. They do not justify the murder of a father by his daughter, but they feel scarcely less abhorrence for the deliberate strangulation of the criminal by society, for the purpose of teaching others to be less cruel. They are conscious of the inconsistency that seeks to deter from deeds of blood by the exhibition of a deed of blood; and of the absurdity of the logic that would prove to the public the enormity of taking life by publicly doing that which it appears to condemn.

And the lesson to be learned from the occurrence we have noted in this. If such be the aversion to capital punishments, that thinking Christian men could be induced to forget their detestation of the crime in their aversion to the penalty, it is plain that this penalty is working infinitely more of harm than of benefit to society. It has already lost whatever of utility might have mingled with its original composition; and instead of operating to deter from crime, it encourages, by the impunity which it often affords, and still more by the sympathy which it excites in favour of the criminal, who is thus made to appear in the light of a victim to a barbarous law, instead of that which he really is—a barbarian who has cruelly violated the law. If the law do not respect life, is it wonderful that life should not be respected by the subjects of the law? Example is better than precept. Vulgar minds cannot discern nice distinctions. They are told that God has forbidden the shedding of blood; but they see the law doing that which they are told is commanded not to be done. The refined distinctions of the schools, the limits between punishment for revenge and punishment for example, they cannot recognize. If the law may revenge, why may not they? if death may be inflicted merely for the sake of example, the infliction of death on those who have injured them cannot be so very terrible a crime. Such is the coarse argument of rude minds. Naturally all men shrink from the commission of murder; but the sight of death first brutalizes into endurance, and then changes endurance into a fiendish pleasure in the excitement of the spectacle. These are the reflections which have fastened upon the minds of the memorialists, and the result speaks trumpet-tongued for the abolition of the Punishment of Death.

REVIEW OF MAGISTRATES' CASES,

Michaelmas Term, 1844.

A circumstance, unforeseen when we promised to give the conclusion of our summary this week, compels us to postpone it till our next number.

The following gentlemen have recently qualified as magistrates for the county of Durham:—Wm. Standish Standish, Esq. of Cocken Hall, John Eden, Esq. of Beamish Park, and the Rev. Henry Douglas, Prebendary of Durham, of the college, Durham.

THE LAWYER.

Summary.

WE have received an early copy of the new Rules and Orders of Bankruptcy, as framed by the Commissioners, and approved by the Lord Chancellor. We hasten to submit them to our readers. We hear that the new Orders in Chancery will very shortly be issued. Next week will, we hope, enable us to bring up all arrears, so as to begin the Term with unincumbered columns.

Court of Bankruptcy.

RULES AND ORDERS MADE UNDER THE 7TH AND 8TH VICT. C. 96, SEC. 38.

For the better carrying into execution the statute 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, as amended by the said statute 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. [December 21, 1844.]

It is ordered as follows; that is to say,

1. That every petition for protection from process presented to the Court of Bankruptcy or to any district Court of Bankruptcy, under the provisions of the statutes 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, shall be taken to the chief registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy in Basinghall-street, or to a registrar of the District Court of Bankruptcy in the country (as the case may be in London or in the country), between the hours of eleven o'clock in the forenoon and two o'clock in the afternoon, who shall file and number such petition, and such chief registrar or registrar shall thereupon allot such petition by ballot, or in rotation, to one of the commissioners in London, or of the District Court in the country (where there are two commissioners), and shall forthwith certify to such commissioner the filing of such petition, and such allotment to him, which certificate shall be filed with the proceedings in the matter of such petition, and such petition shall be prosecuted before such commissioner, or before the district commissioner, where there is only one commissioner: provided always, that any one commissioner in London or in the country may, in the absence of any other commissioner, act for him: provided also, that where a petition shall have been previously filed by the same petitioner, whether such petition shall have been dismissed or not, the new petition shall be allotted to the commissioner to whom the first petition was allotted.

2. That the schedule to such petition shall be annexed at the time of filing such petition, and shall be, mutatis mutandis, in the form in use under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116.

3. That in all cases in which a petitioner shall be in custody, there shall be filed, with his petition, a certificate from the gaoler of the cause or causes of the detention of the petitioner.

4. Every petitioner shall deliver with his petition, an account in writing in the form set forth in the schedule, marked (B. No. 1), annexed to these Orders, signed by the petitioner, of all his books of account and vouchers, and of all his personal estate and effects then in his possession or control, or in the possession or control of any other person by his authority, or in trust for him, and the places or place where the same then are or are believed to be, and whether the same are liable for rent or any other charge, and to whom by name and the particulars of the demand, in order that such property may be duly ascertained and given up to the official assignee, or the messenger, and that he said account shall be signed and delivered in duplicate.

5. That one copy of the estate paper mentioned in the preceding Order shall be forthwith transmitted to the broker appointed by the Court, and such broker shall forthwith proceed to appraise the personal estate and effects of such petitioner, and shall make such return as is set forth in the schedule, marked (B. No. 2), annexed to these Orders.

6. That the warrant of seizure or possession to be granted to the messenger under any petition, shall be in the same form, mutatis mutandis, as that now in use in matters of bankrup , and shall be issued in the same manner, but the same shall not be executed without the special direction of the commissioner, or of the assignee or assignees for the time being.

7. That every petitioner shall, immediately after an official assignee shall have been appointed to his estate, deliver over to the official assignee so appointed, all moneys, bills, notes, and securities in his possession or power, together with all books of account, papers, and writings, relating to his estate and effects.

8. That the protection from process to be given to any petitioner upon or after filing his petition shall be called the "Interim Order for Protection," and shall be prepared in duplicate in the form set forth in the Schedule, marked (C. No. 2), annexed to these Orders, one copy to be filed with the proceedings.

9. That where a petitioner for protection from process shall be a prisoner, in execution upon any judgment obtained in any action for the recovery of any debt, such petitioner shall, before the granting of the interim order for protection, give such notice to the detaining creditor under such execution, as the Court in which the petition is prosecuted shall direct, so that such creditor may be heard against the granting of the interim order, and the discharge of such petitioner out of custody.

10. That the order for discharging out of custody (under sec. 6 of 7 & 8 Vict. cap. 96), any petitioner being a prisoner in execution upon any judgment obtained in any action for the recovery of any debt mentioned in his schedule, shall be in the form set forth in the shedule, marked (C. No. 3), annexed to these Orders, and shall be prepared in duplicate, one copy to be filed with the proceedings.

11. That the time for making the final order, unless cause be shewn to the contrary, in the matter of each petition, shall be appointed by the commissioner acting in the same; of which time the commissioner shall cause notice to be given ten days, at least, before the time so appointed, which notice shall be by advertisement in the form set forth in the schedule, marked (E. No. 1), annexed to these orders.

12. That the final order shall be made in duplicate, one copy to be filed with the proceedings, and one copy to be delivered to the petitioner.

13. That previous to making any application to the Court for any order or orders, under sections 28 and 29 of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, the petitioner shall give such notice of the application by advertisement, and to the creditors of the petitioner, as the Court, under the circumstances of the case, shall think fit to direct.

14. That all bills of fees and disbursements of any attorney or messenger for business done under the aforesaid Acts, shall be taxed by the Court in which the petition shall have been filed, or by the taxing master of the Court of Bankruptcy: provided always, that no charge shall be made by the messenger, for executing the warrant of seizure or possession, unless the execution thereof shall be specially directed by the Court.

15. That the fees authorized in the annexed table, and no other, shall be taken in the respective Courts.

16. That the several forms set forth in the schedule annexed to these orders, shall, mutatis mutandis, be used in the respective Courts.

REVIEW OF DECISIONS IN THE COURTS OF EQUITY, ECCLESIASTICAL, AND BANKRUPTCY COURTS, DURING 1844.

We propose hereafter to give a review of the principal decisions of the Courts of Equity, Ecclesiastical, and Bankruptcy Courts, either every term or every other term, as may be found convenient. In our present number we have given the result of a very hurried glance at the decisions in those courts during the year 1844; but in the proposed review it is our intention to do all in our power to make it practically useful.

BANKRUPTCY.

Construction.—Notwithstanding the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, an apothecary may petition for protection from arrest though his debts amount to 300*l*. Not being previously within the bankrupt laws, he does not become so by the words of that statute, viz. "not being a trader within the meaning of the statutes now in force," &c. (Re Barrett, 4 Law T. 208.) The 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 40, s. 12, provides that the assignees of officers of a friendly society should pay money due to the society before any other debts were paid. Under this Act, the trustees of a friendly society applied to have their debt from their bankers paid out of the surplus fund of the bankers in their town agent's hands, on the ground of the bankers being officers of their society, but failed. (Ex parte Whipham, 2 Law T. 426.)

Fraud.—Where bankers, knowing themselves to be in difficulties, encourage deposits from their customers, such conduct is fraudulent, and the Court will refuse their certificates. (Re Roe and Blackford, 3 Law T. 341.)

Jurisdiction.—The Court of Review being a Court of Record constituted by Act of Parliament, has power to commit a solicitor for contempt, and to order him to pay the costs of the application. The authority existed even from the time that the authority in bankruptcy was transferred from the Lord Chancellor to that Court. (Ex parte Turner v. Martin, 2 Law T. 375.) A commissioner has no authority to order the payment of a sum of money, even by a solicitor in the bankruptcy, or to make any order as to costs. (Ex parte Collins, 3 Law T. 5.) Assignees have power to summon debtors to an insolvent's estate under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 116, without paying their expenses as witnesses; and the Commissioners' Court has no power to order the assignees to pay them. (Re Ridler, 3 Law T. 224.) Where the claim of a solicitor to a lien on a deed is disputed, a commissioner in bankruptcy has no power to decide the question, and to direct the deed to be taken from him. (Ex parte Llewellyn, 3 Law T. 393.)

COSTS.

Costs of recovering stock transferred to the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt.—In ex parte Ram (3 Mylne & Cr. 25), the costs of the Attorney-general and the commissioners were allowed on the retransfer of a sum of stock from the Commissioners to the petitioner, under the 56 Geo. 3, c. 60; and in ex parte Laferte (MS. 22nd April, 1837, V. C. E.), the same course was pursued. In ex parte Holland (2 Law T. 497), Knight Bruce, V. C. thought it unjust to pay costs out of the general fund, and the matter accordingly came before the Chancellor (3 Law T. 17), who, after making inquiry into the practice decided that the costs were so to be paid. The question is therefore set at rest.

Security from a client to his solicitor for costs.—It is a settled rule of equity that a solicitor shall not take from his client a security for future costs. This was at one time doubted, and there are several cases, chiefly of maintenance, in which a contrary doctrine is stated. In Booth v. Creswicke (2 Law T. 493), however, it is expressly laid down, and the authorities on the point are there examined.

Taxation.—The New Solicitors' Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73) has given occasion to an unusual quantity of applications for this purpose. In Sayer v. Wagstaffe (2 Law T. 418), it was decided that the mere delivery of a promissory note was not payment of a bill of costs, unless there be acceptance express or implied; and the answer of the Secretary of the Master of the Rolls to a petition, not the presentation thereof nor the hearing is to be considered an application within the Act. It has also in the same case, on appeal (4 Law T. 169), been decided that in order to obtain taxation of a settled bill, not only items which would have been taxed off must be shewn, but such as amount to imposition or fraud; and that if payment is made under undue pressure, the account will be opened; but that though the continuance of the relation of solicitor and client is a circumstance to be considered when pressure is complained of, it will not alone justify a reference. Charges by a solicitor, who is steward of a manor, for admission to copyholds, &c. are not taxable under the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 73 (Allen v. Aldridge (2 Law T. 438). A solicitor's bill may be taxed for business done before the passing of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, and this though the bill had been actually paid (re Lees, 2 Law T. 438, 457). The Act does not apply to a case in which a bill not previously taxable, was paid before the Act was passed. (Ib.) Where a solicitor comes into a suit already instituted, and gives briefs to two Queen's counsel and a junior, and in so doing only carries out the intention of the original solicitor, the taxing master, having disallowed the second Queen's counsel, was ordered to review his report. There is no rule restricting the number of counsel. (Wastell v. Leslie, 3 Law T. 117.) Where a solicitor refuses to procure the execution of a deed until his bill of costs is paid, and the party interested in the deed pays the bill under protest, that might constitute such a special circumstance, as under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, would entitle him to taxation. (Ex parte Andrews, 3 Law T. 257.) Where costs in a suit have been awarded to a defendant, a trustee, who is a solicitor, the practice of the Court is to direct them to be taxed as between solicitor and client. (York v. Brown, 3 Law T. 210.) Petitions have been presented not unfrequently to tax bills, though an agreement existed, or what is equivalent to an agreement, that they should not be taxed, and they have been invariably refused, so long as the agreement is not impeached by bill. There is no jurisdiction to do so on petition. (Re Whitcombe, 4 Law T. 130; and re Catlin, 4 Law T. 152.)

ECCLESIASTICAL COURT.

Construction of will.—The term "apparent," in the 21st section of the 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, means apparent on the face of the instrument; and evidence aliunde will not be admitted to shew what the words originally were. (Towneley v. Watson, 2 Law T. 376.) It appears that the destruction of a later paper does not by law necessarily revive a former will. Each case must be left, as to the question of revival, to its own particular circumstances. (James v. Cohen, 2 Law T. 518.) A soldier stationed with his regiment in barracks in one of the colonies, or at home, but not engaged in any expedition or special duty, is not within the intent and meaning of the 21st section of Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, which exempts "soldiers in actual military service" from the operation of that Act. (White v. Repton, 3 Law T. 322.)

Duties of a clergyman.—A very important judgment was given in the case of a clergyman who had refused to bury the corpse of a child which had been brought, after due notice and at a convenient time, to the churchyard for interment. It was held, in Titchmarsh v. Chapman (3 Law T. 353), that a child is entitled to have the burial service read over its body, though a layman, held to be heretical and schismatical, has performed the act of baptism, if he has done so in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; as it is not therefore "unbaptized," according to the true meaning of that term in the Rubric. The judgment is very elaborate. In the case of Nurse v. Henslow (1 Law T. 195), a like decision was made as to a clergyman who refused to bury the body of a parishioner baptized by a minister of the "Primitive Methodists."

Probate.—The general rule is, that the receipt of a legacy, or other acknowledgment of a will, does not preclude the next of kin from opposing its validity; there are cases, however, in which this doctrine will not hold—as a formal admission on which a decree has been made by a court of law. (Merryweather v. Turner, 3 Law T. 6.)

Jurisdiction.—An extremely important decision has been made under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86 (The Church Discipline Act), involving a point of considerable importance; viz. whether, in a proceeding against a clergyman, which has for its object to deprive him of, or suspend him from, ecclesiastical preferment, and not merely to punish him pro salute, &c. the Ecclesiastical Court has jurisdiction over an offence indictable at common law, though no conviction in a court of common law is pleaded; and Sir H. Jenner Fust has decided, in a very long and elaborate judgment, that it has. (Burder v. Hedgson, 3 Law T. 242.)

EVIDENCE.

The Act 3 & 4 Wm. 4, which removes the objection to an interested witness in certain cases, does not apply to courts of equity.—In the case of Wheat v. Graham (7 Sim. 62), the Vice-Chancellor of England decided that the Act 3 & 4 Wm. 4 did apply to courts of equity; in Hall v. Ellis (9 Sim. 532) the same judge decided the other way. The Court of Exchequer, in Stuart v. Barnes (You. & Coll.), have expressly decided that the Act of Parliament did not apply to courts of equity; and the same decision has been made by the Chancellor in Oliver v. Latham (2 Law T. 365); consequently the point is now set at rest.

Presumption of death.—Presumption of death without issue is not always allowed, although even thirty years may have elapsed since the party was last heard of. (Watson v. England, 2 Law T. 155.)

JURISDICTION.

Appointment of receiver in the colonies.—The Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver, manager, and consignee of property in the colonies. (Bentinck v. Willink, 2 Hare, 1; Willink v. Bentinck, 2 Law T. 326.)

Lunacy.—The Chancellor, in Barfield v. Rogers (2 Law T. 117), said he would determine the question of a lunatic (who had, by decree, been declared a trustee) being or not a trustee within the 1 Wm. 4, c. 60, though he had not been found a lunatic by commission, on certificates of unsoundness being presented to him.

Compensation to officers of court.—The compensation to be made to commissioners for examining witnesses in a cause are cognizable by a court of equity alone, of which they are the officers, and an injunction will be granted to stay proceedings to recover it by action at law. (Ambrose v. Dunmow Union, 3 Law T. 339.)

Vice-Chancellor.—A Vice-Chancellor, appointed under the 5 Vict. c. 5, has no power to reverse, vary, or alter any order made by another Vice-Chancellor, although the cause in which the order was made may have been transferred, with the Lord Chancellor's sanction, from the paper of the latter to that of the former. (Willoughby v. Willoughby, 2 Law T. 457.)

MARRIED WOMAN.

Separate use and restraint of anticipation.—A legacy to a married woman for her "sole use and benefit," is to be construed for her separate use. (Bertcholdt v. Marquis of Hertford, 2 Law T. 325.) The ordinary form used for restraining married women from alienating their separate property was decided, in Barrymore v. Ellis (8 Sim. 1), to be insufficient for the purpose. The like point came again before the Vice-Chancellor of England in Brown v. Bamford (11 Sim. 127), and was similarly decided; the Vice-Chancellor observing that, in his practice as a conveyancer, he used always to make the receipt clause declare "that the receipts of the married woman, to be given from time to time after the income of the property shall have become due, should be, and that no other receipts should be sufficient discharges to the trustees." On appeal the Chancellor confirmed the decision, (3 Law T. 69), so that the point is now settled that the restraint in such a case only applies to the exercise of the power, not to the estate in default of appointment. It makes no difference that the restraint against anticipation is first mentioned, and so far useless, and that the separate-use clause follows; they will equally take effect. (Baggett v. Meux, 3 Law T. 122.)

PATENT.

Abandoned invention—Defect in specification.—An old patent invention, substantially the same as that secured by a modern patentee, having been abandoned, and there being nothing to shew it had ever been known to the patentee, and he having denied all knowledge of it, and there being an essential, though minute, difference between the old and the modern invention, it was held that the latter was not invalid. (Muntz v. Forster, 2 Law T. 325.) And where an inventor had been some years in the enjoyment of his patent, an alleged defect in the specification forms no ground for refusing relief in a court of equity. (Ib.)

Injunction.—If, after injunction obtained, there appears to be any material variation between the allegations in the bill or the aid thereby sought, and the affidavits in support of the plaintiff's case, the Court will, upon application of the defendant, dissolve the injunction. (Stocking v Llewellyn, 3 Law T. 33.)

PRACTICE.

Allowing an issue.—The rule of the Court has been supposed to be, always to allow an issue devisavit vel non to an heir-at-law from whom the property is devised. In a late case, however, the Master of the Rolls decided that there are exceptions to the rule. (Mann v. Ricketts, 2 Law T. 456.)

Orders.—Under the 17th Order of 26th August, 1841, it is not rendered imperative on the plaintiff, when he engrosses his bill, to commence every numbered interrogatory at the margin with a fresh line, though it may have been the invariable practice with attorneys so to do ever since the promulgation of the order. (Garcias v. Ricardo, 3 Law T. 33.) Under the 1 Wm. 4, c. 36, s. 15, r. 13, an order for a habeas corpus to bring up a prisoner to take the bill pro confesso against him, to be regular, must be obtained before the expiration of six months after twenty-eight days after his committal. (Walker v. Histed, 2 Law T. 326.) Where, under the 24th order of August 1841, an application is made to enter a memorandum of service of a bill on a defendant, it is necessary to shew that the service was made within the jurisdiction, and that the copy served was a true copy, but not how the copy was made. (Warren v. Postlethwaite, 3 Law T. 4.) "Injunction Causes," in the fifth order of April 1828, mean, causes only in which the injunction depends on the exception; and, therefore, where an injunction is prayed by the bill, and an order for referring the exceptions is obtained before the expiration of eight days, it is irregular. (Matthie v. Edwards, 3 Law T. 339.) Where a defendant to an original bill filed a cross-bill of discovery, but before the answer was put in to it the original suit was dismissed, the defendant to the cross-bill was held to be entitled to his costs, as under the old practice, the case not being within the 41st order of August 1841. (Barker v. Ford, 3 Law T. 452.) It has been decided in Mahon v. O'Grady (4 Law T. 191) and Muttlebury v. Hayward (4 Law T. 211), that, under the 18th of the orders of 26th Oct. 1841, it is necessary to apply, in case of a father taking his son into partnership, to change the solicitor, as much as in the case of a stranger.

Plea of foreign judgment.—A plea of foreign judgment may operate as a bar to a suit in a court of equity; but where representations made by the plea are of that general nature as to leave the Court in doubt as to what were the matters in issue in the foreign court between the parties, equity will not refuse the plaintiff his right to file his bill in this court, for an account of the transactions between him and the defendant. (4 Law T. 130.)

Proceedings to discredit a witness.—In Wood v. Hammerton (9 Ves. 145), and also in Purcell v. Macnamara (8 Ves. 324), leave was given by Lord Eldon, after much consideration, to exhibit articles, and, on the same motion, to take out a commission to examine witnesses as to credit; but in many cases, both before and after these cases, the rule appears to have been to exhibit articles first, and afterwards apply for a commission. In the late case of Harvey v. Mount (3 Law T. 218), however, this rule was not observed, and the practice of Lord Eldon was followed.

Production of papers.—The production of papers proved in one cause will be ordered in another relating to the very same subject-matter, though the parties are not all the same in both. (Grubb v. Perring, 3 Law T. 199.)

The master of a ship having been employed to go to India to collect evidence with respect to the seaworthiness of a vessel which had been condemned and sold, his communications to his employers and their solicitor were held to be privileged communications, and strictly within the rule of the court as to privileged communications between solicitor and client. (Steel v. Stewart, 4 Law T. 150.)

Proof of service of copy of bill—23rd and 24th orders of Aug. 1841.—A copy of a bill was proved to have been examined with the engrossment, and forwarded by post to the solicitor in the country, who swore to his having received on the following day a paper, appearing to be a true copy of the bill, which paper he served on the defendant; it was held sufficient service. (Lewis v. Thomas, 2 Law T. 360.)

TITLE.

Mortgages and judgments.—The title of a judgment creditor, or tenant by elegit in actual possession, is not superior or equal to that of a prior equitable mortgagee or incumbrancer. (Whitworth v. Gaugain, 3 Law T. 34.)

Production of title-deeds.—Copies of Court roll and indentures of bargain and sale inrolled must be produced to the purchaser by a vendor, if they are in his possession, but he is not bound at his own expense to furnish new copies of them. (Cooper v. Emery, 2 Law T. 437.)

Time.—The rule was, in reference to the duration of human life, to require a sixty years' title; but since the 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 37, it has been supposed that this Act had fixed, not sixty years, but a shorter period, and conveyancers have been at variance on the question. It would appear, however, that the time within which suits may be brought only has been shortened. In Cooper v. Emery (2 Law T. 437), it is expressly decided that a purchaser may require a sixty years' title.

TRUSTS.

Bankers.—The payment of money into a banker's hands is a loan to him, and does not render him a trustee, or invest him with any fiduciary character for the customer. (Foley v. Hill, 2 Law T. 513.)

WILLS.

Construction.—A devise by a testator to his brother of property subject to a charge thereon to be paid to another brother, or all or any of his children, as the devisee should appoint, gives the second brother and his children nothing in default of appointment. (Bonnor v. Bonnor, 3 Law T. 98.) A testator gave an estate for life to his wife in the rents of certain lands, and by a codicil declared that "in case the sister of his wife should, during his wife's life, reside with or dwell in the house or place of residence of his wife, or become part of her family, then, for each day she should so reside, the trustees were to pay 100*l*. out of the said rents, &c. to a dispensary." This is a condition subsequent, and is void. (Ridgeway v. Woodhouse, 3 Law T. 19.) A testator appointed by his will, his wife and his trustees executors thereof to be the guardians of his children. He afterwards, by codicil, revoked the appointment of three of the trustees and executors as such, and appointed two others in their place; it was held that the removed trustees remained the guardians. (Ex parte Park, 3 Law T. 158.) It was formerly the law, that a man, who was appointed an executor, and to whom a legacy had been given, must have proved the will before he could entitle himself to the legacy; and, in Reed v. Devaynes (2 Cox, 285; 3 Bro. C. C. 95), that is so decided. In a late case, however, where executors and trustees were appointed, and a bequest given to each of them, "as a mark of the testator's respect for them," and their appointment was afterwards revoked, and others appointed in their stead, with a like bequest; it was held that the originally appointed executors and trustees were entitled to their legacies. (Burgess v. Burgess, 3 Law T. 452.) A bequest of a sum of money to A. S. and to the children of her body, A. S. being then and at the testator's death unmarried, gives A. S. an absolute interest. (Read v. Willis, 2 Law T. 438.)

Cy près.—The doctrine of cy près was refused to be extended to a mixed fund composed of realty and personalty by Knight Bruce, V. C. in —— v. —— (2 Law T. 399).

Election.—A curious custom prevails in the manor of Taunton Dean, that a tenant's widow is his next heir. By virtue of this custom it has been decided that a widow to whom an annuity "in lieu of all dower and thirds," &c. claimable out of her husband's estate, had been bequeathed, was not obliged to elect between her legacy and the copyhold estate, but took the latter as heir to her husband. (Norcott v. Gordon, 4 Law T. 49.)

Mixed fund—Conversion—Escheat.—Though the Crown may claim the personal property of a person dying intestate, leaving no next of kin, yet the royal prerogative does not extend so far as to call upon a court of equity to convert real estates into personalty for the sake of claiming it as such. (Taylor v. Haygarth, 2 Law T. 137.)

New Wills Act.—The 33rd section of the 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, does not extend to a testamentary appointment, notwithstanding that the first section declares that the word "will" shall extend to (among other things) an appointment by will. (Griffiths v. Gale, 3 Law T. 17.)

SINECURES IN THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.

(From the Morning Chronicle.)

The death of Mr. John Moore has caused a vacancy in two sinecure appointments, held by him in Doctors' Commons: one, the London Seat in the Prerogative Registration, worth about 700*l.* a year, in the gift of the Rev. George and Robert Moore, sons of Archbishop Moore, the sinecure registrars of that court; the other, the Registrar of the Vicar-General, in the gift of his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, of the value of 500*l.* a year. Rumour has already pointed to two relatives of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, the Judge of the Prerogative Court, as the individuals to be appointed to these offices; although their appointment is not to be officially declared until Sir Robert Peel has determined who is to be Queen's Proctor. We hope the Rev. George and Robert Moore, being sinecurists themselves to the extent of 12,000*l.* a year, will consider it to be their duty, in filling up the appointment in their gift, to select the fittest man, and require him to do the duties in person; but whether they appoint a relative of the Nicholl, Jenner, Dyke, or Dynely family, solely from partiality and family influence, or, turning over a new leaf, select a man having respect of his qualifications only, we beg to remind them that in the year 1830-31 the prelates of the Church of England tendered their patronage to the Commissioners of Inquiry into the Ecclesiastical Courts, amongst whom were his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, the late Sir John Nicholl, Sir Herbert Jenner (now Fust), and Dr. Lushington; and on the part of the public to insist that the appointment now to be made must be provisional, and on the clear and distinct understanding that it is not to entitle the recipient to any claim for compensation, in the event of Parliament making any alteration in the constitution of the office.

The appointment of Registrar to the Vicar-general is, next after the Queen's Proctor, the most enviable and honourable appointment in Doctor's Commons. The deputy of the late Mr. Moore is out of office by the death of his principal, and if the Archbishop of Canterbury has any regard for the honour and credit of the profession, of which he is nominally the head, he will gladly avail himself of this opportunity to select as his Registrar the most honourable and the best-informed man of his day, and require him to perform the duties in person. The deputy of the late Mr. Moore is said to assert some claim to be appointed principal; but do the circumstances which attended his original appointment as deputy entitle him to make any such claim? The late George Jenner, the brother of Sir Herbert Jenner Fust, and the nephew of Sir John Nicholl, held the offices of Registrar of the Arches Court, Registrar of the Vicar-general, Registrar of the Peculiars of the Archbishop; Deputy-registrar of the Prerogative Court, worth 1,100*l.* a year; Registrar of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul, London; Secretary to the Commissioners for Building and Enlarging Churches, worth 1,000*l*; in fact, obtained and held, through the kindness of his relatives, every office and appointment that became vacant over which they could exercise any power or control. At his death there were none of the third generation of the Nicholl-Jenner-Dynely family of a sufficient age to obtain any of the appointments thereby rendered vacant, save that Sir John Nicholl obtained for his nephew Mr. Dynely, over the heads of many older and abler men, the Deputy-Registrarship of the Prerogative Court. Mr. Bedford, by influence foreign to the Nicholl-Jenner family, became Deputy-Registrar of the Vicar-General. He enjoyed it two years, and on his death, his son, Arthur Bedford, then aged twenty-nine years, was, by the same influence, appointed his successor. Sir John Nicholl remonstrated with the late Mr. Moore, and represented that it was not right to appoint so young a man, when there were older, abler, and fitter men candidates. Sir John Nicholl and Sir Herbert Jenner, then Queen's Advocate, urged one or more of the senior proctors to write to Mr. Moore, asking for the appointment, and by this combined movement Mr. Moore was compelled to cancel the nomination of Mr. Arthur Bedford, A pause then took place of about three weeks, during which time each of the senior proctors, who had been urged to apply, made sure of being appointed, and there was amongst them a general feeling of satisfaction at the disinterested regard for the credit of the Profession evinced by the heads of it; but ultimately, by an influence beyond the control, as it was said, of Sir John Nicholl, and contrary to the wish of Sir Herbert Jenner (now Fust), Mr. Francis Hart Dyke, the nephew of the first, and son-in-law of the second, became the Deputy-Registrar of the Vicar-General. He was then thirty years of age, that is, one year older than Mr. Arthur Bedford, who was repudiated solely on the score of his age, and, saving his relationship, and this one year of age, Mr. F. H. Dyke was in no respect superior to Mr. Arthur Bedford!

We trust, in justice, the Archbishop will now select some other man.

ANOTHER WRIT OF HABEAS IN JERSEY.

(From a second edition of the Jersey Gazette.)

We have returned to Jersey at last; and happily, for many and various reasons, with a peremptory writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, issued by Baron Rolfe, and returnable in the Queen's Bench, We served the writ to-day on Mr. Kandich personally, and a copy of it duly on the Viscount. The following is the order of the Court directing the issue of the writ:—

"R. M. Rolfe.—Upon hearing Mr. Peacock, for Charles Carus Wilson, and upon reading the several affidavits of William A. Langdale, and of William Russell, and the exhibits thereto annexed, I do order that a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum issue directed to John Candich, gaoler of Jersey, and to John Le Couteur, viscount of the said island, to bring up to the Court of Queen's Bench the body of Charles Carus Wilson, returnable on the 18th day of January, 1845.

"Dated the 23rd of December, 1844."

The following is an exact copy of the writ and endorsements:—

AD. SUB.

"Victoria, by the grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith, to John Kandich, keeper of our gaol of Jersey, in the Island of Jersey, and to John Le Couteur, viscount of said island, greeting: we command you that you have the body of Charles Carus Wilson, detained in our prison under your custody as it is said, together with the day and cause of his being taken and detained, by whatsoever name he may be called or known, in our court before us at Westminster, on the 18th day of January next, to undergo and receive all and singular such matters and things which our said court shall then and there consider of him in this behalf, and have there then this writ. Witness, Thomas Lord Denman, at Westminster, the twenty-third day of December, in the eighth year of our reign.

"By the Court,

"—— ROBINSON.

"Endorsed by the Judge: At the instance of Charles Carus Wilson:

(Signed) "R. M. ROLFE.

"Mr. A. Langdale, 7, Gray's-Inn-square, London, attorney for the said Charles Carus Wilson, 23rd December, 1844."

The efforts of the Viscount and his subordinates to-day to avoid service were most ludicrous. We were not obliged to serve a copy upon the Viscount personally at all, but as counsel suggested that it might be as well to endeavour to do, we proceeded about twelve o'clock to that gentleman's residence, St. Aubin's, rang the bell, and, in answer to our inquiry, were told by a middle-aged man servant, that the Viscount was at home, but too ill to see any person. We then desired him to inform his master that we were there with a peremptory writ of habeas corpus, to bring up the body of Charles Carus Wilson to the Queen's Bench, England; at the same time exhibiting the original writ and copy. The man departed on his errand, and presently returning, told us the Colonel could say nothing about it, finishing with "I beg your pardon, sir, but I must shut the door." Ha! ha! ha! Truly laughable was this absurd expedient to avoid the service of a writ.

Returning immediately to town we entered the Viscount's office, and served the clerks there (Messrs. Sullivan and Binet) with copies of the writ and order. Those young and sensitive gentlemen were even more alarmed than their master, and very decidedly refused to receive the dreaded papers. Nay, in excess of zeal, Mr. Binet threw the copies after us as we descended the stairs. Curious this, for a lawyer's office. About ten minutes afterwards the writ was served upon Mr. Kandich, who took such a mere matter of course quietly and reasonably.

It may be perhaps as well to mention that the exhibits mentioned in the rule of court were the "rule" obtained by the Solicitor-General, and the affidavits of Mr. Wilson and the Procureur-General. It will require more than ordinary impudence, therefore, to assert on this occasion that the judge has been surprised into granting the writ.

IRISH LEGAL INTELLIGENCE.

Dublin, Dec. 19.

CHARITABLE BEQUESTS ACT.

The following is the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, upon the case submitted by direction of the Lord Lieutenant, in consequence of the representation made by Dr. Murray, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, who had transmitted to his Excellency the published opinion of Mr. O'Connell respecting the operation of the Charitable Bequests Act as regards the regular clergy in Ireland:—

"Queries on the construction of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 97 (Charitable Bequests Bill, Ireland), for the opinion of the Right Hon. the Attorney and the Solicitor-General.

"First—Whether the provisions of 10 Geo. 4, cap. 7, which are referred to in the 15th sec. of the Charitable Donations and Bequests Act, render any donation or bequest to any member or members of any religious order or community in the said provisions mentioned unlawful?

"Secondly—Whether the Charitable Donations and Bequests Act is calculated to prejudice or raise any doubt, by implication or otherwise, as to the pre-existing rights of any member or members of such religious order or community as aforesaid? And if it be, what alterations would it be desirable to have made in the Act, for the purpose of preventing such implication or doubt?

"Thirdly—If a devise, donation, or bequest for charitable purposes be invalid, as being contrary to the policy of the law, would it be the duty of the commissioners to sue for the recovery of the same, and apply it to other charitable purposes—or how should it be recovered or disposed of?"

"OPINION.—(COPY.)

"First—There is no provision in the Roman Catholic Relief Act making devises, donations, or bequests to, or in trust for, religious orders, communities, or societies of men of the church of Rome, bound by monastic or religious vows, unlawful. But a court of equity would not enforce a trust in favour of such a religious community, as it would be against the policy of 10 Geo. IV. cap. 7.

"We are, however, of opinion that the 10 Geo. IV. cap. 7, does not, either expressly or by implication, render a devise, donation, or bequest to a member or members of such religious order unlawful. A devise, donation, or bequest to a member of such religious order, for his own use, or upon any trust not contrary to law, would, in our opinion, be valid.

"Secondly—We are of opinion that the 7 and 8 Vic. cap. 97, has not in this respect made any alteration in the law, and that it is not calculated to prejudice or raise any doubt, by implication or otherwise, as to the pre-existing rights of any member or members of such religious order or community.

"The 22nd section provides that 'nothing herein contained shall be taken to avoid or render unlawful any donation, devise, or bequest which but for this Act would be lawful, except as to the time within which the deed, will, or instrument containing such donation, devise, or bequests for pious or charitable uses is hereinbefore required to be executed and registered.

"This latter part of the section, as to the time within which the instrument is to be executed, refers to the 16th clause of the Act, which clause applies to members of the Established Church, to Roman Catholics, and to all Dissenters.

"Notwithstanding the enactment in the 22nd section above-mentioned, it has been suggested that the proviso at the end of the 15th section contains an express legislative declaration that a devise, donation, or bequest to a member of a religious order is illegal—we do not concur in this opinion.

The 15th section of the Act was intended to facilitate the endowment of the Roman Catholic secular clergy—and we are of opinion that the proviso in that section was added to prevent any question being raised that it authorized a donation, devise, or bequest to the commissioners and their successors for the benefit of any but secular clergy.

"The proviso does not, in our opinion, either expressly or by implication, render illegal any donation, devise, or bequest, which, but for the passing of the Act would have been lawful. The 22nd section of the Act renders this construction of the proviso quite clear. The statute confers no benefit on the regular clergy; but it created no disability, either expressly or by implication.

"Thirdly—If a charitable donation, devise, or bequest be invalid, as being contrary to the policy of the law, it belongs to the Crown to dispose of it by the sign manual for such legal charitable purposes as to the Crown may seem proper. And when it belongs to the Crown, by sign manual, to dispose of property given or devised for charitable purposes, the proceedings should be an information filed by the Attorney-General, and not a suit by, or in the name of, the Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests. (Attorney-General v. Matthews, 2 Levins, 167; Clyfford v. Francis, Freeman's Equity Reports (Ed. 1823, 130); Attorney-General v. Syderfin, 1 Vernon, 224; Moggeridge v. Thackwell, 7 Vesey, 74.)

"It is to be observed, that by the former Charitable Bequests Act (40 Geo. 3, c. 75, Irish), in case it should be inexpedient, unlawful, or impracticable to apply a charitable donation, devise, or bequest, strictly according to the directions and intentions of the donor or donors, the commissioners were authorized to apply the same to such charitable and pious purposes as they should judge to be nearest and most conformable to the directions and intentions of the donor or donors.

"This enactment is omitted from the Act of last session. "T. B. C. Smith.

Her Majesty has been pleased to direct that letters patent shall be prepared for the appointment of Edward Smirke, esq. to be Solicitor-General to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

PRIVILEGE OF ROYAL PALACES.

Windsor, Friday Evening.—A short time since a gentleman, who resided not a hundred miles from the Regent's Park, took up his abode at one of the military knight's houses, for the purpose of living in quietude and retirement, only passing the proscribed boundary on Sundays, supposing himself then to be free from arrest.

About a fortnight ago he was visited by one of the officers of the sheriff of Berks, and arrested (notwithstanding the privilege he claimed as a resident within the royal precincts) at the suit of Mr. Lawrence, an extensive builder in London, for a judgment debt amounting to between 3,000*l.* and 4,000*l.* The officer immediately conveyed his prisoner to the county gaol at Reading. This was considered to be an exceedingly bold step on the part of the officer, and in the very teeth, too, of a rule which had been observed in similar cases for centuries before. We understand, however, that the sheriff was indemnified from all consequences which might result from it. The defendant, immediately after his arrest, acting upon the advice of his solicitor, took out a summons, calling upon the plaintiff and the sheriff to show cause before one of the barons of the Exchequer, in which court the proceedings were taken, why he should not be discharged out of custody, upon the ground of the arrest having been illegal, the defendant having been captured within the (privileged) precincts of a royal palace. The case was heard by Mr. Baron Rolfe, in chambers, on Friday, 20th instant, Mr. Carington and Mr. J. J. Williams appearing as counsel for the defendant, in support of the summons; and Mr. Taprel as counsel for the defendant. The sheriff appeared by his attorney. An immense number of authorities were cited on both sides. The arguments lasted nearly the whole day.

On Wednesday last the parties attended at Mr. Baron Rolfe's chambers, when the learned baron stated that he had examined all the authorities which had been referred to by the learned counsel for the plaintiff and defendant, and also the affidavits which had been put in, and that his decision was, that the summons be discharged.

The defendant (who, it is stated, intends to bring the whole matter before the full court next term) consequently still remains in Reading gaol.

Mr. Baron Rolfe's decision has caused great consternation in the minds of parties who had previously imagined that they were living in a state of "privileged" security.—Morning Chronicle.

NATURAL HISTORY OF THE NEW YORK BAR.

(From the New York Herald, Nov. 29.)

The members of the Bar in this city may be divided into three classes—first, good lawyers, who are gentlemen: secondly, good lawyers, who are not gentlemen; thirdly, pettifoggers, who are neither lawyers nor gentlemen. This division is simple and accurate, and includes every individual who is said to practice law in the city of New York. The definitions are clear and intelligible to the humblest capacity; and unlike many definitions in science and philosophy, they do actually convey a correct idea of the thing intended to be explained. Let us briefly glance at the habits and characteristics of the several classes thus indicated and defined.

The first class, which is composed of good lawyers, who are gentlemen, is a very small one. It is possible that the number exceeds that set down as the maximum of just men, whose return to the angel engaged in taking the census of the virtuous in the doomed city of Sodom, would have insured its immunity from the threatened vengeance of insulted Heaven. The Bar of this city can indeed boast of a few men whose eminent professional attainments derive additional lustre from the refined manners, the cultivated taste, the uniform urbanity, and gentlemanly demeanour which characterize their possessors. These are worthy successors of those distinguished men—the Emetts, the Wilkinses, the Wellses, and other kindred spirits, who gave such dignity and character to the Bar of New York twenty years ago. It were invidious to mention names, but few of those who are conversant with the movements of the select few who give tone to any movements in society, literature, science, or refined civilization in this city, which are really worthy of respect, can be at a loss to fill up that brief list, in which stand the names of the good lawyers of New York, who have the education, feelings, and manners of gentlemen.

We now come to the second and much more numerous class—the good lawyers who are not gentlemen. There are a great many talented and sharp-witted blackguards in society; and as the practice of the law in the present state of the administration of justice presents peculiar facilities for the successful exercise of a combination of talent, smartness, vulgarity, and coarseness, it is not at all surprising that at the bar we find a very numerous representation of that class in society to which we have just alluded. We do think that we can in this city match any bar where the name of Blackstone is honoured, in clever lawyers, who are as free from any pretensions to the character of gentlemen as the region of the "Five Points" is to cleanliness or virtue. We have repeatedly heard these men, in their pleadings before a court and jury, indulge in a strain of coarse, vulgar, impudent, personal attack on parties not even directly implicated in the case, which could have been properly chastised only by means of a horsewhip. And then the manner in which this class of practitioners browbeat, and insult, and wound witnesses, is shameful and brutal in the extreme. Almost the first remark which every intelligent traveller makes on visiting one of our courts of law, is, "What license you do allow your lawyers!" The stranger is astounded. He can scarcely believe it possible that a court will suffer its own character to be disgraced—its dignity trampled upon—the rights of individuals to be ruthlessly violated—public decency outraged, by the toleration of such beastly language on the part of counsel in their speeches, and in their cross-examination of witnesses. Talk of the scurrility and personalities of the press! Why, we have heard lawyers abuse parties and witnesses before our courts, in terms of invective, such as we have never seen in the columns of the most reckless and violent partisan print; and Heaven knows this is indeed about the lowest standard of comparison to which, spoken or written, Billingsgate can be reduced.

But let us now pass on to the third class—those who are pettifoggers, being neither lawyers nor gentlemen. This is by far the largest class of all. It comprises the shoals of sharks about the "Tombs"—the harpies that hang about the Marine Court (one of their greatest harvest fields, by the bye)—the smaller fry that swarm around the "ward courts"—and the innumerable herds scattered all over the city. Probably one-half of the litigation in the city, and one-third of the vice and crime, owe their origin to these pettifoggers. The plots and contrivances are innumerable by which they manage to continue their loafing and disreputable existence. Their rapacity and demoralization, as exhibited around the "Tombs," are almost incredible, and must be made the subject of another article. To one of their schemes only we have space at present to advert. It is quite characteristic. It is the getting up of prosecutions against the newspapers for libel. If a trifling allusion appears in a report of criminal or any other proceedings at the courts, these pettifoggers go to work, hunt up the individual in question, and persuade him that the publication is a gross and malicious libel.

Such is a brief and cursory view of the natural history of the New York bar. The subject is ample, interesting, and important in the highest degree. We have merely glanced at it. Enough has been said, however, to shew that a great reform is wanted in the legal profession. How it can be effected we are at a loss to know, unless it be through the agency of the good lawyers who are gentlemen, on the bench and at the bar. Will we appeal in vain to them for the purification of their "order"—for the expulsion from it of those elements of vulgarity, dishonesty, and crime, which have so sadly disfigured, weakened, and degraded that profession which should be the pure, honourable, and irreproachable minister of justice, order, and morality?

WHITEHALL, Dec. 18, 1844.—The Queen has been pleased, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, to appoint the Most Reverend Father in God John George Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland, the Most Reverend Father in God Richard Archbishop of Dublin, the Most Reverend Archbishop William Crolly, the Most Reverend Archbishop Daniel Murray, the Right Hon. John Hely Earl of Donoughmore, K.P., the Right Rev. Bishop Cornelius Denvir, the Hon. and Very Rev. Henry Pakenham, Dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, the Right Hon. Sir Patrick Bellew, Bart., the Right Hon. Anthony Richard Blake, and the Rev. Dr. Pooley Shouldham Henry, to be Commissioners of Charitable Donations and Bequests for Ireland.

WHITEHALL, Dec. 26.—The Queen has been pleased to direct letters patent to be passed under the great Seal, granting the dignity of a Knight of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland unto Chevalier Robert Schomburgh, recently at the head of the expedition for exploring the boundaries of the colony of British Guiana.

CABINET COUNCIL.—We understand that the first Cabinet Council previous to the meeting of Parliament is appointed for the 9th instant. Sir Robert Peel is expected to come to town, from Drayton Manor, by the 7th of the month.

The Lord Chancellor has been pleased to appoint William Norris, of Newport, in the Isle of Wight, gent. and George Edward Sharlapd, of Gravesend, in the county of Kent, to be Masters Extraordinary in the Hight Court of Chancery.

The Chancellorship of the diocese of Norwich has been conferred by the bishop on Charles Evans, Esq. M.A. of Pembroke College, Cambridge, barrister-at-law.

CHANGE OF SOLICITOR IN A CHANCERY SUIT.—By the 18th order of 26th Oct. 1842, a solicitor cannot be changed without an order of court on motion or petition, and which is made as a matter of course. A question has arisen, whether on the introduction into a firm of a new partner it is requisite to obtain this order. We understand the Master of the Rolls has decided that, in the addition merely of a new partner, no order is necessary; but where the partnership is dissolved an order must be obtained. On the other hand, the Vice-Chancellor of England, as we are informed, holds that any change whatever, even the introduction of the son of the present solicitor as a partner with his father, renders an order necessary. Presuming the object of the order to be (as it is at common law) to secure the solicitor from being dismissed without notice, we conceive that the rule laid down by the Master of the Rolls is the correct one. Where a new partner joins the solicitors there can be no occasion for notice.—Legal Observer.

All sinecurists! Is it not a scandal that persons like these, and like Lord Canterbury's sons, should be receiving fees for which they do no work?—Chronicle.

The Attorney-General and Lady Follett and family have arrived at Rome, from a tour in Sardinia, Tuscany, &c. The hon. and learned gentleman is in rather improved health, and is not expected to return to England for five or six weeks.

OCCUPATION OF THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE BY THE MERCHANTS.—This interesting event occurred on Wednesday the 1st inst. and the muster on 'Change, though the day was not a post day, was very considerable. In consequence of the intended occupation all the avenues were completely opened. The only arrangement we noticed which had any novelty about it, was that by which the advertisements and announcements of the sailing of ships, which used to be affixed generally to the walls of the old Exchange, are now pasted upon neat boards, which are hung up in the recesses of the merchants' area. These boards are of one size and character, and seem calculated to prevent the disfigurement which the old system involved. The temporary exchange in the court-yard of the Excise-office will soon be dismantled of its roof and other fittings, and we perceive, by an announcement affixed to the posts supporting the roof, that the materials are to be sold, and that the proceeds will be devoted to the principal city charities. The merchants generally seemed to be perfectly satisfied with their new quarters, and quite ready to join in the general congratulations to Mr. Tite, the architect, on the very successful termination of his labours. Some of the merchants still seem to think that all the exchange ought to have been roofed, like the Bourse at Paris; but, as we have before noticed, that is a question the merchants determined for themselves by a large majority before the committee took any step in the matter, and the common opinion appears to be that the majority were right; for though a roofed hall might be convenient at this time of the year, in the summer, and particularly in wet weather, the heat and steam would be insufferable. Some of the merchants complained of draughts of cold air, an evil which, we are informed, it is intended to remedy by the introduction of inner doors, should the inconvenience be found to be important.

THE NEW METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS ACT.—On Wednesday this important Act came into operation. There are 120 clauses in the new law and 12 schedules. The various objects specified in the preamble are worked out in the numerous provisions and schedules annexed. The officers mentioned in the Act have been appointed since the 1st of September last by a special provision. There are two official referees named by the Government, and surveyors, with their districts assigned, have been nominated by the magistracy of the city and the several localities comprised in the jurisdiction of the metropolis. The act extends on the north side of the Thames from Fulham to Shadwell, and on the south side of the river from Woolwich to Wandsworth, including the other suburban districts. The Legislature by the 4th section anticipated that building speculations would be carried on beyond the prescribed limits of the statute, in order to evade the law, and therefore gave power to her Majesty in Council to extend the operation of the same to any parts within twelve miles of Charing-cross. It is required that notice of such intention to consider the limits shall be given at least one month prior in the London Gazette. Numerous buildings have been lately commenced to prevent the immediate operation of the law, as by the construction clause it is declared that the term "already built," used in reference to buildings, is to apply to buildings built before the 1st of January inst. or "commenced before that day," and covered in and rendered fit for use within twelve months thereafter; and the term "hereafter to be built" to apply to all buildings to be built or "commenced after that period, or which being commenced shall not be covered in within twelve months." Notice must now be given of all buildings to be commenced to the registrar-general appointed, under certain penalties; and all buildings must be erected according to the directions of the act, otherwise the workmen as well as the owners, will be subjected to penalties, and in default of payment to imprisonment. The act has reference to the future drainage of houses, and it is declared that the drainage has been so bad as to endanger the health of the inhabitants. The width of streets and alleys is to be increased, in order to obtain a proper ventilation, and to prevent the risk of fire from the close contiguity of houses opposite. Another portion of the new law relates to dwellings for the poor. After a certain period cellars, or lower rooms, are not to be used unless altered to admit proper drainage and ventilation. Ruinous and dangerous buildings can now be repaired or pulled down by parish officers, after notice to the owners, and proceedings adopted to recover the expenses incurred either from the owner or the landlord. The other portion has reference to the officers to carry the law into force, to consolidate the provisions, and to superintend the erection of buildings.

DISBARRING FOR MALPRACTICE.—The Benchers of Gray's Inn have disbarred a member, for practising both as counsel and attorney, and he has appealed to the Judges.

LEICESTER.—A petition for the repeal of the Certificate Duty has been signed by the whole of the Profession in Leicester.

THE QUEEN'S PROCTOR.—Much anxiety prevails to ascertain if the appointment of Queen's Proctor has been filled up in the room of the late Iltid Nicholl, esq. We have been informed that the delay is to be attributed to some important alterations about to be introduced in the emoluments of that office, which were of a very lucrative nature, emanating from the droits of Admiralty, and estates forfeited to the Crown. The present session of the Admiralty Courts is likely to terminate without bringing to issue the various proceedings entrusted to the Queen's Proctor, owing to Mr. Nicholl's decease.

LITIGIOUS MANIA.—ROME, Dec. 15.—The most distinguished litigant this world ever beheld died within the last week in this city—the Prince Francesco di Massino. That he should have attained the good old age of 71 years will surprise all who have known the anxiety and wear and tear of a single lawsuit, more especially if it be in Chancery, when it is known that this man of iron nerve had at the day of his death not less than 700 law processes pending in the different courts and tribunals of the Roman states, and that he had attended to all, or nearly all, of them personally, as far as he was permitted so to do by our laws, which admit no oral proceedings, but confine all to paper. As might naturally be expected, most of these lawsuits were for bagatelles and mere trifles, and in their prosecution the prince had wasted a considerable patrimony through law expenses. His heirs, who are all collateral, have with one consent resolved to renounce the whole of these numerous actions, and not to risk the sacrifice of the little left upon any prospective advantages, convinced that even should the decisions in many instances prove in their favour, the result on the aggregate must be a loss.

STAMP OFFICE REDUCTIONS.—A circular has issued from the Stamp Office to the district distributors and sub-distributors directing a reduction in the charges for all blank forms for documents to which stamps are attached, to take place from and after the 5th of Jan. 1845. These reductions will be a source of great saving to professional and commercial men. For parchment, such skins as are now charged at 8d. will henceforth be 6d.; those at 1s. 8d. 1s.; those at 2s. 1s. 6d.; those at 4s. 3s. 2d.; and the others in proportion. For paper, folio post is reduced from [illegible] to 1s. 6d. and 1s. according to quality; demy paper from 2d. to ¾d. per sheet; and bonds, bills of lading, marriage licences, transfers, and protests, from [illegible] to ¾d. and ½d per sheet.

The Vice-Chancellors' New Courts.—It will be recollected that a short time since a meeting of the leading counsel practising at the Chancery, Rolls, and Vice-Chancellors' Courts was held for the purpose of devising some plan to lessen the evil and inconvenience of the separation of the Vice-Chancellors' Courts from the other equity judges, in Westminster-hall, which has taken place since the creation of the two new Vice-Chancellors. A communication was made to the Lord Chancellor on the subject; the consequence is, that two temporary courts are being erected in Palace-yard, close to the entrance of Westminster-hall, which are in a very forward state, and will probably be finished by next term. This arrangement will get rid of a great deal of the evil, though it can hardly be a permanent one, as there will be means of communication to the other courts from these.

A Pardon in the United States.—The public ear has become familiar with reports of the exercising of the pardoning power by Governor Porter, of Pennsylvania. The latest instance in which his Excellency has interposed the executive clemency in favour of a rogue is furnished by the Shippensburgh Weekly News. The story is sufficiently ludicrous to excite a smile, but such gross perversions of delegated authority on the part of a high functionary are too serious a matter for laughter. It seems that one John Piper, a notorious Locofoco blackguard, who had taken a very active part in the late election, had committed an assault and battery upon the editor of the paper above-mentioned, for which he had been indicted by the grand jury. The trial is thus reported:—

Commonwealth v. John Piper, indicted for an Assault. Called up by the Court.

Court.—call a jury in the case of "The Commonwealth v. John Piper."

Sam Hammill.—You needn't call a jury.

Prosecuting Attorney.—Will there be a submission?

Sam Hammill (with a grinning smile and quivering lip).—No, there won't.

Prosecuting Attorney.—Well.

Sam Hammill.—If the Court please, I should like to have an opportunity to make a speech in this case, and lash the dastardly coward that brought it into court.

Court.—Mr. Hammill, we don't want to hear—

Sam Hammill.—I have here a previous pardon (unfolding the paper) from Governor Porter (handing the pardon to the Court), got on the petition of 300 good democrats of Cumberland county, and under the broad seal, too. (This was said as Sam sat down with a most hyena grin.)

The Court was astounded; the bar woke up from its slumbers; jurors, witnesses, and spectators, all were surprised at this new and speedy mode of disposing of criminal cases. And then the means by which the previous pardon had been obtained, the petition of 300 good democrats of Cumberland county! Verily, verily, democracy is not what we took it to be: we knew it to be bad enough, in all conscience, but this new movement "caps the climax."—Boston paper.

THE LAW TIMES.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1845.

TO OUR READERS.

At the commencement of this Journal we pledged ourselves to adopt every practicable improvement experience or friends might suggest. We may appeal with confidence to our successive volumes to shew how we have redeemed that pledge. In the same spirit, and desirous of making the Law Times every thing that the British Lawyer could desire, we have to announce further improvements.

The growing importance of parochial law, the changes which threaten, and the decisions which continually alter and complicate the Law of Settlement and Removal more especially, have induced us to secure such further assistance in the department of the Law Times entitled the Magistrate, as will enable us to afford to the Profession, to the Magistrates, and to Parish Officers, the benefit of early, clear, and correct expositions, such as (from the known ability of our contributors) we believe they will be unable elsewhere to obtain, of all practical points of novelty or difficulty, and of all new laws and rules as they arise in that important sphere of business. Although we shall steadily adhere to our established rule of answering no legal questions, believing the practice to be altogether unprofessional, we shall of course feel obliged by the communication of real difficulties that occur to practitioners in the application of any branch of Parochial Law, the exposition of which may be of general interest or utility.

Arrangements are in progress for a similar current commentary upon General Law.

The Reviews of Cases in the Common Law Courts, which we have given at the close of each Term, have been found so extremely useful to our readers, and have received such universal approval, that we are desirous of making them a complete summary of decisions of incalculable value to the practitioner and the student. We have therefore arranged for a similar review of the cases in Equity and Bankruptcy. In the first instance, as will be seen by the Summary in this number, we bring up arrears by a review of all the cases reported during the year 1844; afterwards we shall present a quarterly or half-yearly review, as convenience may determine.

It gives us great pleasure to learn that the costly improvement, adopted with the last Term, of publishing, within a few days after their delivery, and months before they can be procured elsewhere, verbatim reports of all the written judgments, has given unqualified satisfaction to the Profession.

Thus does the Law Times seek to prove its gratitude to the Profession by making itself continually more worthy of the proud position to which they have elevated it.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Every passing day makes more manifest the exceeding mischievousness of Lord Brougham's notable Act abolishing imprisonment for debts under 20*l.* It is operating practically as a bill of indemnity to debtors—as a confiscation of the property of creditors. It rewards fraud and ruins honesty. And the class upon whom the mischief falls the most heavily is precisely that the least able to bear it—the class of smaller tradesmen, who find themselves suddenly deprived of their property by a thoughtless act of the legislature, too easily led by a statesman whose spite is more potent than his patriotism. Upon them the measure has operated to abolish at one fell swoop all their book debts, and they find themselves reduced to poverty, while their debtors are triumphing in a law that is to them a receipt in full of all demands.

Probably there is not one of our readers who could not relate, as coming within his own experience, half a dozen instances of the noxious effects of this inconsiderate enactment. They must know how useless it is now to apply for a debt of less than 20*l.* The debtor snaps his fingers at the lawyer, and laughs at his creditor. A writ is as little regarded as a letter. It will cost some pounds to sign judgment, and then the plaintiff is not a step nearer to the recovery of his debt than before, and he has lost his costs into the bargain.

One instance that has chanced to come in a very unpleasing shape under our personal knowledge will shew the operation of Lord Brougham's Act.

A man was sued for 19*l.* 10*s.* Judgment was obtained. The defendant called upon the plaintiff's attorney and offered 10*l.* in full for debt and costs. He was known to be in receipt of a good income, and the offer was indignantly rejected. "Well," he said, "you can't hurt me. You must take that or nothing. Lord Brougham's Act protects me! I live in a ready furnished house, and you can't touch my person."

The defendant is the owner of a copyright from which he receives a large income. But his publishers are the ostensible holders of this property, and the unlucky creditor is thus wholly without the means of recovering 19*l.* from a man worth 500*l.* per annum.

Can a law that works such a wrong as this be permitted to endure for a month after Parliament meets? Will the industrious and honest silently permit themselves to be robbed of the money due to them? Will Parliament, now that the baneful operation of the law is so plainly proved, refuse to modify and amend it? We believe that there must and will be a change; and it may not be a waste of time, before the formal discussion begins, to direct the thoughts of senators and lawyers to the principle that should govern legislation, and to offer some practical suggestions, prompted by experience.

We are not opposed to the abolition of imprisonment for debt; on the contrary, we rather incline to favour it. But we are averse to any partial measure; we would abolish it entirely, or not at all.

But we would not dream of abolishing it without producing a substitute; and the mischief of Lord Brougham's Act lies in this, that it deprived the creditor of one remedy, without giving him a better one.

The principle of imprisonment for debt is essentially bad. If the debtor have property, the law is faulty which does not provide effectual means for the appropriation of that property for the benefit of his creditors. If he have no property, he should be required to render a strict account, either wherefore he had incurred a debt, wanting the means to pay it; or, having once possessed the means, what have become of them?

These principles will readily indicate what should be the law of debtor and creditor.

When a man, after judgment obtained against him for a debt, does not pay it, and no property can be found upon which it can be levied, on application to the Commissioner of Bankrupts a summons should forthwith issue, requiring him to appear and account for his non-payment. On his neglecting or refusing to appear, a warrant should issue for his apprehension, and upon his appearance or arrest, he should thenceforth be deemed in the custody of the law, until he shall have purged himself by payment, or by shewing good cause why he is unable to pay, or by making the best provision in his power for future payment.

Being thus in the custody, as it were, of the law (which contemplates only justice, instead of, as now, in that of the creditor, who may be, and frequently is, actuated by something like a feeling of revenge), the debtor should be required to render a strict account, not only of what property he has in possession or in prospect, but what property he has possessed, and how it was expended; in fact, he should be required, as the condition of his release, to shew that the debt was fairly contracted, with reasonable probability of his being able to pay it, and what were the circumstances that prevented his doing so. Upon a review of the whole case, the commissioner should be empowered to deal with it after one or the other of the following methods.

If the debtor have property of any kind in possession or reversion, it should pass by the order of the Court to the Official Assignees, to be applied for the benefit of creditors.

If there be no property, or it be insufficient to pay the debts, the Court should determine whether those debts were honestly and fairly contracted; if such should be its opinion, the Court should liberate the debtor from his existing liabilities, subject, of course, to some charge upon after-acquired property beyond a certain amount. If the Court should be of opinion that the debts had been fraudulently contracted, without reasonable prospect of payment, or that the debtor had put his creditors to unnecessary cost in defending actions for their recovery, or had practised any concealment of property, or any thing in the nature of fraud, the Court should have the power of imprisonment for a limited term, but to be regulated according to the degree of crime; such imprisonment not to be deemed an imprisonment for the debt, but imprisonment for the fraud.

We submit to the calm deliberation of our readers this rude outline of a scheme that has suggested itself to our mind, while considering the mischiefs of the present system, and how they might be remedied. It is the result of considerable practical experience in the law of debtor and creditor. We believe that it would be found to meet all the difficulties that now beset the subject. It would entirely abolish imprisonment for debt, but only by substituting for it effective remedies against the property, if any there be, and severe but just punishment of fraud in the contraction of a debt, or for unfair dealing with property after it is contracted, or for attempts to evade it when sued for. Lord Cottenham's measure was, in its main features, something like that propounded. It was incomparably superior in all its provisions to the miserable substitute which Lord Brougham prevailed upon the Legislature to accept. The mischiefs of the present system are palpable; there is an urgent necessity for some change; in that change the recommendations of the Profession cannot but have great weight. We ask its members maturely to consider the plan we have outlined, to point out its defects, to suggest improvements, to discuss it in their Law Societies, and by petitions to urge it upon the Parliament, which, after the experience of this last achievement of Lord Brougham, may not again be so ready to accept, without examination, measures framed without reflection, carried with indecent haste, and in their results proving a boon only to rogues, but a curse to the honest and industrious.

THE WINTER ASSIZE REFORM OF THE QUARTER SESSIONS.

The Yorkshire Gazette of Saturday, the 21st ult. thus commented upon a suggestion of the Law Times:—

We believe that we were the first journalists who advocated the establishment of a Winter Assize and Gaol Delivery. There were many difficulties to encounter in forcing this subject on the attention of the authorities, and not the least was the opposition which such a project received from the judges and the bar. To the untiring energy and perseverance of Barnard Hague, esq. Chairman of the Visiting Justices of York Castle, aided by his colleagues, we feel that the country is indebted for the winter gaol deliveries, which, we are of opinion, ought to be permanent and general throughout the United Kingdom. The Legal Profession, by whom the Winter Assizes are considered very objectionable, are continually suggesting some scheme to supersede them. Mr. Baron Alderson repeated last week at Taunton the suggestion which he threw out at Winchester for avoiding a Winter Assize by a new regulation of the terms, and appointing the regular Assizes at equal intervals. This no doubt would be an improvement on the old system so far as it goes; but we contend that a period of four months is a sufficiently lengthened term for any man to be immured in a prison on a charge for which he may be found not guilty. And on this ground we submit that any little inconvenience occasioned to the judges, by having to make three circuits in the year instead of two, ought to be cheerfully submitted to. The facilities of travelling are such that one-half the harass and fatigue of going circuits is now removed; the expense of travelling is also greatly diminished, and we had melancholy proof of the necessity of a third assize, in our own county last week, when a second judge had to be brought down to assist in the delivery of the gaol.

The Law Times, a journal we believe much under the control of members of the Bar, has for some months been advocating a reform in the Courts of Quarter Sessions, by the appointment of Stipendiary Chairmen, and then transferring to those Courts the business of our County Courts and the minor class of cases which are now tried before the judges in the Courts of Assize. This, it is contended by our contemporary, would at once relieve the crowded state of our goals and ease the judges of a large share of labour, without any injury to the public service. Now we have very great objection to this scheme, and would much rather that, if it be necessary, the number of judges should be increased. We have no notion of some sixty or seventy second-rate men being saddled on the country at salaries of 1,000*l* or 1,500*l*. each, to supersede our county magistrates. No doubt the dispensing of the patronage would be an agreeable duty for the ministry of the day—no doubt briefless barristers would gladly accept such snug appointments for life. But we are disinclined to the scheme for many reasons. We object on account of the excessive amount of patronage it would confer. We object because we consider that the justices of the peace are sufficiently qualified for the discharge of their functions without being subject to the interposition of a stipendiary. We object because of the immense annual charge, probably little short of 100,000*l*. which such appointments would impose upon the public exchequer. We object because we believe that the administration of justice before these stipendiary chairmen would not be satisfactory to the public at large. We again repeat that no personal inconvenience to the judges or to the bar ought to be held as a sufficient reason for not holding three assizes in the year. The public service requires that such should be the case—the cost of prosecutions (increased as the are by a protracted assize) requires that such should be the case—a due regard to the interests of the accused requires that such should be the case—the importance of following up crime by speedy punishment is also an important argument—and we cannot admit that these weighty public considerations should be overcome to oblige any indiduals, however high their station or exalted their profession.

A few words in reply, or rather in explanation.

In the first place, we do not contemplate "sixty or seventy second-rate men being saddled upon the country, at 1,000*l*. or 1,500*l*. a year each." We would divide the country into convenient circuits, with, as now, itinerant judges, varying the times for holding the Quarter Sessions in each county. Ten or twelve would be ample for the purpose. This at once removes the objections of cost and patronage.

Our contemporary considers that justices of the peace are sufficiently qualified for the discharge of their functions. It is certain, then, that he knows nothing of Quarter Sessions law; for if he ask any person who does know, he will find a very different and unanimous opinion upon that.

Lastly, our contemporary thinks that the decisions of lawyer judges would not be satisfactory to the public. Perhaps they might not be so satisfactory as a trial by the judges of the higher courts. But that is not the point. The question to be determined is, whether they would not be more satisfactory than the decisions of gentlemen who are not lawyers, and who are often swayed (unconsciously) by local feelings.

The best judges cannot by any contrivance be had, without incurring proportionate costs. But may not judges be had of sufficient ability and experience for the discharge of the ordinary business of an inferior court, subject to an appeal to a superior court? Upon the same principle might our contemporary object to magistrates of any kind, or to the jurisdictions of justices in petty sessions, or to local courts for the recovery of small debts, because the judges there cannot give so much satisfaction as the judges of the Queen's Bench.

And our Yorkshire contemporary may be assured, that it is not the convenience of judges, bar, and attornies that we are looking to in this matter, but the convenience of suitors, the legal business of the country being in fact suspended during the interregnum of the winter circuit, adding to the present accumulation of arrears, and rendering it hopeless for the Courts hereafter to keep pace with the work that crowds upon them.

We admit the necessity for more frequent trials of prisoners; we contend only that the object may be more readily accomplished by other means than by a winter circuit.

ATTORNEYS AT QUARTER SESSIONS.

A fortnight ago we copied from a newspaper a statement that the Chairman at the Quarter Sessions at Lichfield had announced, in reply to an application made at a former sessions, that he had consulted Lord Denman upon the subject, and that it was the opinion of the Chief Justice that Attorneys might practise as advocates at Quarter Sessions, but that the Bar was entitled to pre-audience.

We did not make it the immediate subject of a notice, for two reasons. In the first place, we hoped to receive the report in a more authentic shape; and, secondly, we were unable to satisfy ourselves of the meaning of the term pre-audience, as employed in the newspaper.

And, though we have instituted inquiries, we are still unable to gratify the curiosity of our readers, either as to the precise facts of the occurrence, or the sense in which the doubtful term was employed.

Of the right of Attorneys to practise as advocates where no Bar attends, there cannot be a doubt; and in Cornwall the business of the Quarter Sessions is wholly conducted by the Attorneys.

But on reference to the authorities, it appears to be still undecided whether Attorneys can be heard at Quarter Sessions if there be Barristers present. In Talfourd's edition of Dickinson's Quarter Sessions, the subject is thus treated:

The advocates at sessions, who, by the practice of the court, are entitled to take upon them the causes of others, and to prosecute for the Crown, are barristers and attorneys. At sessions where a sufficient number of barristers attend it is usual to give them sole audience, and the attorneys are consequently not heard in their presence. At sessions where members of the bar do not attend, as in some distant counties and many boroughs, it is usual to hear the attorneys as advocates; and though it may be doubted whether, in strictness, they are entitled to address the jury when prosecuting the indictments, it is customary, and certainly convenient, to allow them that privilege. In cases where counsel have not been accustomed to attend, but two or more barristers wish to do so, it is usual for them to intimate their desire to the chairman or recorder, and to request that they may have pre-audience; and if this request is granted, the attorneys cannot be afterwards heard in their presence, unless all who attend should be retained on one side. How far a barrister may, merely as such, insist, without the sanction of the bench, on his right of pre-audience in courts of sessions where attorneys alone have been accustomed to practise, is a question of some difficulty; but it is very unlikely, it may be hoped, to be raised in practice.

But it may be a question, if they have the right, whether it would be desirable to exercise it. That not a few attorneys would be perfectly competent to the duties of advocates will certainly not be denied by any person acquainted with the Profession. But that is not the only consideration. Custom and the habits, or if it please so to term them, the prejudices of society, not only at home but in every civilised country, have distinguished the functions of the attorney and the advocate, and appropriated the duties of each to distinct classes. It must, we think, be presumed that a practice prevailing so universally, which has been adopted in ancient as in modern times, and alike under republics, monarchies, and despotisms, has in it some advantages taught by experience, or consonant with the natural good sense which in matters of business all men are wont to exhibit. It would not be difficult to point out those advantages, though their exposition would be too long for our present purposes; but they will readily suggest themselves to the experienced and reflecting. The division of labour is found to be as advantageous in intellectual as in mechanical employments, and even if all the Courts were opened to attorneys to-morrow, we believe the result would be that in a few months there would be a complete classification again; those of the attorneys, who possessed the natural and acquired capacities for the duties, would become advocates, and practically cease to be attorneys, and the rest would withdraw from a field, in which they could reap no honour, to the offices where other qualifications have fitted them, to win both honour and profit. If such were to be the effect, and we think our readers will agree with us that precisely so it would be, the attorneys as a body would benefit nothing by the change, and the individuals among them, who had become advocates, would in fact be but barristers without the responsibilities of the bar. And there is no reason why, if a competent attorney desires to become an advocate, he should not do so, through the forms which have been appointed for admission to that post,—forms which, however imperfect for their end, were wisely intended, and do in some measure subserve the very important purpose of throwing around the profession of an advocate a respect which is essential to the maintenance of that independence and influence which are the best guarantees for the liberty of the subject, and which can only be commanded by the union of the lawyer, the scholar, and the gentleman. They who combine these qualifications, and desire to become advocates, may advance to the position at which they aim in the regular course; and we presume that none who valued the reputation of either branch of the profession would desire that persons wanting these capacities should appear as advocates, whether they be attorneys or barristers.

Again, there is, from habit, it may be, a prejudice in the public in favour of the regular practitioners of all kinds. The dictum of an English M.D. carries with it more weight than that of a foreign purchased title, even though the holder of the latter may be in fact a more learned man than the former. And so it would be in the courts. We doubt whether clients would not prefer to be represented by a wig; or would be satisfied by the advocacy of their attorney, however able.

Moreover, an attorney could rarely do his duty in both capacities. It is his business to [illegible] the case, to look to his witnesses, to aid [illegible] his counsel with suggestions, to procure evidence or documents suddenly required. If acting as an advocate in his own cause, he must entirely neglect this portion of his duty; and, as we have said before, if he appear as advocate for another, he is, in fact, nothing more than a barrister without a wig, and there is no hardship in requiring that before he undertakes the duties of a barrister he shall be formally admitted to practise them as others have been.

For these reasons, and many more to which we may, perhaps, refer on a future opportunity, we think the dictum of Lord Denman, if correctly reported, will be of little practical importance to attorneys, unless it be to enable them to make mere motions of course, which we really see no reason why they should not be allowed so to do. It is, as in the case put by our correspondent last week, a hardship, that an application merely formal cannot be made without a fee to counsel. But beyond this we doubt the expediency of attorneys entering into competition with the Bar as Advocates; it would benefit neither branch of the Profession; probably it would injure both.

And let us assure our readers that, however they may question the disinterestedness of our judgment, it is, in truth, a candid, unbiassed opinion, based upon considerable experience and mature reflection, undertaken with no other object than to discharge faithfully the duty we owe to the Profession—to counsel that only which is for the common good, without the very slightest reference to personal, private, or selfish interests. We trust that the whole career of the Law Times has satisfied its subscribers, that, though sometimes erring in its views, it is always honest.

VERULAM SOCIETY.

Owing to a misunderstanding, the details of which we need not explain, we have been compelled to re-compose some pages of the second number of Practice Cases, which has thrown back the publication for a week. We hope it will issue before next Saturday.

The 5th number of Magistrates' Cases was duly published on Monday: and the 6th, completing the cases of last Term, is in the press.

The 7th number of Real Property Cases, the 2nd of Registration Appeals, and the 3rd of Criminal Law Cases, are ready for the press.

The following circular will be forwarded by post to the members of the society during the next week, and we shall be obliged by their prompt replies, as the works there announced should, if approved by them, be put in hand without delay.

Sir,—The following works are proposed for the next publications of the Verulam Society. As they cannot be commenced until it is ascertained if sufficient of the members will order them to meet the cost, you will oblige by setting your initials against such of them as you desire to order, signing the form and returning it by an early post. As the price of each work must be determined both by its length and the number who take it, the precise sum cannot be stated; but it will be no more than will repay the cost of writing and printing.—I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

John Crockford, Publisher.

PRACTICE—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

By Professor Carey.

Delivered at University College, London.

LECTURE XV.

The action at common law now draws to a close. We have considered all the forms of action, and the cases in which each set of forms may be brought; the proceedings in personal actions, the commencement by writ of summons, and the subsequent proceedings in order to secure appearance; then, the appearance having been effected, that which ensues upon it, the mutual altercations of the parties, the pleadings, till they either agree on the facts that raise the point of law disputed, or they raise a question of controverted fact, asserted on the one hand, and denied on the other. When that is the case, the question of fact disputed is for the decision of the jury; the case is sent from the court above to the court of Nisi Prius, in order to the investigation there to be made whether the assertion on the one hand or the negation on the other is supported by fact. Upon that investigation the result of the case depends.

There are certain cases in which the investigation may be subject to the opinion of the Court above, or may be subject to any subsequent direction by the Court above. Those cases we have considered. The question is, a fact having been rested on by one or the other, what is to ensue? Thereupon ensues the judgment of the Court. If the fact is as the plaintiff has asserted, he is, in point of law, entitled to the judgment of the Court; if the fact is as the defendant has asserted, then he is entitled to the judgment of the Court. The party that succeeds at Nisi Prius is entitled to judgment; and the other party may make to the Court any of the applications under consideration in the last lecture. He may, if leave is reserved, move to enter a verdict, or move to enter a nonsuit; he may move for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment; for judgment non obstante veredicto, for a venire de novo, or a repleader, according to the circumstances of the case. If the trial was in term time, the unsuccessful party has four days from the trial; if in vacation, he has the first four days of the next term; and after the expiration of the four days without any application made, the party to whom the verdict was given may sign judgment. (Thomas v. Jones. 4 M. & W. 28.) The ancient practice was slightly different from that. If any application is made in arrest of judgment, or for a new trial, or the like, judgment cannot be signed till that application has been disposed of; if not, it may be signed either at the end of the four days after the trial, or at the end of the four days after the beginning of term; still the length of time that elapses between the day of trial and the four days of next term is such as to occasion great inconvenience. Take, for instance, the summer assizes, which take place after Trinity Term in July and August, the four days of next Term are not till the end of the first week in November; there is, therefore, from August to November, a long interval; at all events, this delays the successful party in recovering what is due to him, and in many cases enables the unsuccessful party to evade the effect of the execution altogether—if he can carry away his property in the meantime, he has the long vacation to do it in. The 1 Wm. 4, c. 7, was passed to remedy this, and execution in a month is granted.

As a necessary appendage to judgment, we proceed to consider costs. At common law they were not necessarily appended to the judgment; but, by the operation of several statutes, the costs of the action are now given, as a general rule, to the successful party. The King neither gives nor pays costs, that part of the alternative being contrary to the prerogative of, or inconsistent with, the dignity of the Crown; but our Courts do not pay the same respect to the prerogative or the dignity of any monarch but our own. Thus, in a late case, in which the Emperor of Brazil brought an action on a commercial transaction in which he was engaged, it was not only admitted that he would be liable to pay the costs if he failed, but he was required to find security for costs, as a precaution on account of his residence abroad. (Emperor of Brazil v. Robinson, 6 A. & E. 801.) The statute by which costs are given to the successful party is the Statute of Gloucester; and the effect of that is, that the costs are given to the plaintiff in all cases where he recovers judgment. That was the old statute. Costs now are not given in purely real actions: they are given in all personal actions, because there are damages; and also in all mixed actions, for the same reason. The plaintiff's general right to costs has, in several instances, been limited by statute. There were several statutes, 43 Eliz., 22 & 23 Chas. 2, both repealed, 21 James 1, and the 4 & 5 Wm. and M. which have very frequently been called into practice. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24, is applied to actions of trespass and trespass on the case; and the provision is, that where less than 10s. shall be recovered, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to costs, except under certain circumstances; as when the judge gives a certificate, which he may do in two cases: 1st, where an action is brought to try a right: the words of the statute are, "to try a right other than the right to damages;" 2ndly, if the trespass or grievance was wilful and tortious, in such cases the certificate granted by the judge entitles the plaintiff, if he recover less than 10s. to his costs. Nor does the Act extend to actions brought against the person who commits a trespass on land after notice not to trespass. There are one or two cases that come under the Act. Shuttleworth v. Cockerell (C. P. Mich. Term, 1840). That was a case in which an action was brought for a nuisance, and the damages recovered were less than 40s. The judge certified that a right was in question, that the action was brought for a right other than the right of damages, and the question brought before the court was, whether that was the case. There are two things cognizable in that action. An action is brought against my neighbour, who exercises a right which is admitted to be a nuisance; he pleads "not guilty." Now that plea is susceptible of two defences, as far as this Act is concerned. It may be that he intends to reply that he has done nothing that is offensive; or it may be that he intends to reply that he has not done that which he is charged with doing. That would be a complete answer to the action. It may be, that though he admits he has done that which he is charged with having done; yet he contends it is no nuisance, and that it is a thing he is entitled to do. The one would be merely denying the fact with which he is charged; the other would be raising the question, whether he had a right to do that which he has done. Those are the two questions that may be raised, and it is for the judge at the trial to exercise his discretion, and to say whether the action was brought in order to try a right between the parties, or whether it was brought only for the particular act complained of. If it is merely for the particular act complained of, and a verdict is recovered for less than 40s. it will be a question, whether the judge in his discretion should not give a certificate; but if it is to try whether the defendant is or is not entitled to do that of which the plaintiff complains as being a nuisance, that is to try a right, and that is a case in which he would be justified in granting a certificate. The subsequent case of Morrison v. Salmon is very similar.

Where there are several issues we have considered the effect of a verdict for the plaintiff on some of the issues, and for the defendant on the other issues. The judgment is in favour of the defendant, if he succeeds on any one issue which goes to the whole of the action; but he is not entitled to the costs of those issues on which he fails, and which the plaintiff will be entitled to. The defendant recovers all those costs which are incurred, without reference to particular pleas, and also those costs that belong to the plea on which he has recovered: the plaintiff recovers none of the general costs of the action; but he recovers those which are occasioned by the particular issues on which he has succeeded. It sometimes happens that the plea of the defendant is not pleaded to the whole of the action; for instance, in an action for 100*l.* the defendant may plead payment as to 50*l.*; if he succeeds in proving that payment, he will be entitled to the costs of that issue, whatever may be the general result of the action.

Besides the various cases in which questions of law may be raised, there are certain proceedings in the nature of an appeal. There are four appeals enumerated by Blackstone; first, writ of attaint, which was the way of attacking a jury, abolished by 6 Geo. 4, c. 60; secondly, writ of deceit, abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 87; thirdly, the writ of audita quærela: and fourthly, the writ of error. An audita quærela is where the defendant against whom judgment has been recovered may be relieved from execution upon some matter of discharge which has arisen too late to be pleaded in bar. As, for instance, if the plaintiff has, since the verdict, given him a general release. Any thing that has been done before the verdict can be no ground of an audita quærela. (The law on the subject will be found in Williams's Saunders, 2, 147.) An audita quærela is a new proceeding, and is very much in the nature of an original writ. It is a sort of action arising out of another action,—an equitable action which lies for a person who is in execution, or in danger of so being, where there is matter to shew that such execution should not have issued, or should not issue against him. Thus, if the defendant has paid and satisfied the judgment, and is afterwards taken in execution, he may be relieved by an audita quærela, by proving payment. The writ of audita quærela is now rarely sued out, and the Court will generally, on application, grant the thing in a more summary manner. Thus, if the plaintiff has received anything in satisfaction of the demand after the verdict, and before execution, the defendant may obtain relief by having the execution limited to the time of his having paid it. (Plerin v. Enshall 10 Bing. 24.) There a man had recovered judgment against another; the goods of the defendant had been taken as a distress to pay the rent of the plaintiff; the defendant applied for an audita quærela, and it was held that the application might be supported. The Court said, "The plaintiff has recovered damages in an action of tort; the defendant has, in effect, satisfied them pro tanto, and he comes to us to allow this amount towards satisfying the judgment. The plaintiff, as assignee of Davis's estate, was liable to pay the rent in question; and what difference is there between the plaintiff himself taking and selling cattle for such rent, or the landlord's taking and selling them? the effect is the same, whether the cattle were taken from the hands of the plaintiff or of the defendant. The parties are in the same situation as if the defendant had gone to the plaintiff after the verdict, and had paid the 115*l.* the sum distrained for. It is urged there is something new in the application; but in principle it does not differ from the common case of an audita quærela, in which, if the plaintiff has received any thing in satisfaction of his demand after verdict, and before execution, the defendant may obtain relief from the Court, by having the execution limited to the sum remaining unpaid." See Lord Porchester v. Petre, 2 Wms. Saunders, 148 b, and also in 3 Doug. 261. Petre sued Lord Porchester for bribery connected with and arising out of a certain election at Crickley, which gave rise to certain actions for bribery and cross actions. The declaration contained one hundred counts for the bribery of fifty voters, and the verdict was for the plaintiff on four counts, verdict 2,000*l.* and costs. The defendant applied for an audita quærela, setting forth that he had discovered another person, one Hinton, who was guilty of bribery, and who had been convicted, and thereby Lord Porchester was indemnified from the consequences of his own act of bribery. The answer of Petre to the audita quærela shewed that Hinton, the person convicted by the discovery of Lord Porchester, had discovered another person named Hopkins, who was guilty of bribery, and therefore he was entitled himself to be indemnified from the action sued out. The case came at last to a demurrer; several points were raised, but the important one was, whether a man having discovered another, any exception ought to be made. Lord Mansfield held that it was no exception, unless he had discovered another man and brought him to punishment. Lord Porchester could not substitute any other individual in his place; Hinton was at large, and if Lord Porchester was indemnified no example would be made. The meaning of the Act was, that a man should be indemnified if he brought another to punishment, but not otherwise. These were rather curious cases, and one of the cross actions, Benfield v. Petre, is remarkable as being one in which Burke, the brother of Edmund Burke, was counsel for the plaintiff, and his junior counsel was William Pitt.

A writ of error is, in its nature, legally speaking, much like a writ of audita quærela. It is the commencement of fresh proceedings, and is generally a writ issuing out of Chancery in the nature of a commission to the judges of the Court in which it is tried to examine the record, and to affirm or reverse the judgment according to law. A writ of error is, in all civil actions, granted ex debito justitiæ; a party may obtain it as a matter of right, and not to be asked as a matter of favour or discretion. A writ of error may be brought to the same court where the judgment of the court is in fault, by a writ of coram nobis, if it is in the Queen's Bench; if the action is in the Common Pleas, it is termed a writ of error—coram vobis. In order to reverse the judgment of a court of error, the proceedings must not take place in the same court, but the record must be moved by certiorari into another and higher court. Formerly even a very trifling mistake on the face of the record was sufficient to reverse the judgment; but now a writ of error can only be obtained for what is deemed a defect in substance. From the superior courts in Westminster the system of appeal was till lately singularly complicated; but by the 1 Wm. 4, c. 70, it was provided that from any one of the three courts a writ of error should be made, returnable before any of the judges of the two other courts in the Exchequer Chamber; thus an action is brought in the Queen's Bench, and judgment is there given, a writ of error sued out upon that judgment goes into the Exchequer Chamber before the judges of the Common Pleas and the Exchequer; and a judgment from the Exchequer goes before the judges of the Queen's Bench and Common Pleas, and so on. From the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber the final appeal lies to the House of Lords.

In every personal action, where judgment is given for the plaintiff, bail is required, unless otherwise ordered by the court. The bail is required to enter into recognizances for double the sum adjudged, or double the sum really due, and double the costs. In an action brought on a bond, where the verdict is for the plaintiff, he can only recover what he has shewn to be the damages he has sustained. The writ of error operates to expedite the proceedings from the time notice is served on the opposite party. This notice must state some ground of error, and if the ground stated is frivolous, the court will order execution to issue to prevent delay. The next step is to certify the transcript of the record. Formerly in error from almost all the courts, upon the writ of error the record was certified; that is to say, the record itself was given; but now in error from any of the three courts to the Exchequer Chamber the record is not removed, but the transcript only is given (1 Wm. 4, c. 70, s. 8), but from an inferior court the record itself is given, and it is completely in the possession of the court alone. (Salter v. Slade, 1 A. & E. 608.)

Where the record is brought before a court of error, it is for the party who complains of the judgment of the Court below to assign the error. The assignment of the error is in the nature of a declaration, setting forth the grounds on which the party objects to the proceedings. To this the defendant must put in an answer, and the common answer is, "there is no error in the record or the proceedings;" and the effect of this is to refer the matter to the judgment of the Court. Where an issue of fact is raised, it very frequently occurs that issue is joined, and the issue thus raised is argued before the Court of Error. If the Court decides that the proceedings of the Court below are correct, the judgment is affirmed; if it decides that they are erroneous, then the judgment is reversed. Where the judgment is reversed, it is not simply reversed, because it is the business of the Court of Error, [illegible]

in all cases, to give, upon the record, which is before it, the same judgment which the Court below ought to have given. (Gilbart v. Gladstone, 12 East, 668.) That was a special action of assumpsit, in which a special verdict was given for the plaintiff in the court in which the action was brought; the defendant sued out a writ of error, and the Court held that he was entitled not only to the judgment given for the plaintiff in the court below, but that he was to have the costs of his defence in the court below. The Court said, there "the Court are bound, ex officio, to give a perfect judgment upon the record before them. In this case the judgment below was given for the plaintiffs upon a special verdict, where, of course, there was an alternate finding by the jury awarding as the Court should be of opinion that the verdict and judgment ought to have been for the plaintiffs or for the defendant; if for the plaintiffs, the verdict was to be entered one way; if for the defendant, another way. This Court, then, having been of opinion that the judgment of the Common Pleas was erroneous, and ought to have been for the defendant below, which would have entitled him there to his costs on the verdict as found for him, we should not do him all the justice which he is entitled to receive upon the record now before us, if we did not, upon reversing the judgment below, give the same judgment which the Court below ought to have given; which is a judgment for the costs of his defence in the court, as well as a judgment of acquittal." There is the same principle decided in Dempster v. Purnell (3 M. & G. 375.)

From every court of record there lies a writ of error somewhere; from all inferior courts of record, with some few exceptions, it lies to the Queen's Bench. A writ of error never goes from the Cinque Ports to the Queen's Bench, but there is a special Court of Error provided. From all courts, not courts of record—county courts, courts baron, and the like—there is a writ in the nature o a writ of error—a writ of false judgment—which lies in the Court of Common Pleas; it differs from the others only technically. Dempster v. Purnell was a writ of false judgment.

Where the judgment is not simply affirmed or reversed, and in cases where the error is connected with the trial of the issue, the Court may award a venire de novo, as in case of a mis-trial: but the Court cannot award a re-pleader. (Gwynne v. Burrell, 6 Bing. N.C. 453.)

This is the ultimate point to which legislation can go. After a writ of error has been brought and decided, no other step can be taken except to obtain execution of the judgment. There are three writs of execution in practice: you may levy on a man's goods by a fi. fa.; you may take his person by a capias ad satisfaciendum; you may take his lands under an elegit, or a levari facias. This last is not in common practice. First, under a fi. fa. you may take all his goods. At common law this was confined to his goods and chattels; you could n t take his money, neither could you take a 5*l.* note, nor a bill of exchange. Now bank notes and other securities may be taken under a fi. fa. With respect to money and bank notes, this kind of property is as valuable as any goods the sheriff can take, because it does not require to be turned into money; but with regard to securities the case is not so: a bill of exchange is a document on which the money may be paid, or it may not be paid; the sheriff is entitled to hold it, and an action may be brought in the name of the sheriff against the person liable, and the money, when recovered, is the same as any other money recoverable by the sheriff, who pays it over to the judgment creditor. The sheriff is not compelled to take any step in a proceeding of this kind, unless he is indemnified for his costs. So that the property of a person, whether goods and chattels, or money, bonds, notes, and securities for money, may be taken under a fi. fa. not only for the debt, but for the debt and interest. The interest is calculated at 4 per cent. from the time of the judgment to the time of the levy. At common law, goods were bound from the teste of the writ; but by the statute, 29, Ch. 2, the goods are bound only from the time of the delivery of the writ to the sheriff. It is then the duty of the sheriff to levy as soon as he can; at all events to return the writ in due time. With respect to the capias ad satisfaciendum, no alteration has been made by the recent Acts. The chief alteration made, with respect to the writ of elégit, is, that it now extends to the whole of a man's lands instead of being confined to one-half: you can take any land belonging to him under whatever tenure it is held, and the debtor then becomes a tenant by elegit. There is also a mode of stopping stock. That is a proceeding by which you do not levy exactly on the stock, but you claim the dividend, and prevent the bank from paying the dividends to the person who is entitled to the stock; and the judgment creditor is entitled to receive the dividends. This power was introduced by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, which at the same time abolished arrest on mesne process, and so far was apparently in favour of the debtor, and gave considerable facilities to the creditor to recover his demands.

THE CRITIC.

New Books.

The Law Magazine: or, Quarterly Review of Jurisprudence. No. 65 of the Old Series, No. 1 of the New Series. London: Benning and Co.

The re-appearance of an old and respected friend will be cordially welcomed by the profession, by whom the Law Magazine was prized as are the Quarterly Reviews by the literary world, inasmuch as their size and infrequency of publication permit the review of the most important topics of the time with a deliberation and at a length impracticable in a weekly journal. Our readers are aware that it was announced some time since that the Law Magazine was defunct, not from lack of support, but in consequence of some misunderstanding with its conductors. These, however, were speedily settled; a new editor was obtained, and under his auspices it appears again with more than its former power to recall old friends, and enlist a host of new ones.

And a portly number is this first of the new series. That there may be no hiatus in the record for those who possess the previous numbers, the Digest of Cases has been brought down from the period of the last publication, and without additional price; consequently so many pages are added to this number that it is to form a volume. In the arrangements another convenient plan has been adopted. The Digest is separately paged, so as to bind in distinct volumes.

This number contains eight articles, all abounding in interest, many of them teeming with information. The first is an elaborate and thoughtful review of Mr. Best's treatise on Presumptive Evidence, which has been noticed at such length in the columns of the Law Times, that we need not pause upon this essay. The second article is a powerful and conclusive commentary upon the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of O'Connell v. The Queen, in which the decision of the supreme tribunal is successfully vindicated; indeed, now that party spirit has subsided, and the question is viewed upon its merits, very few lawyers will be found to dissent from the arguments of Lord Denman, or the constitutional principles upon which he based them. We extract the concluding passages of this lawyer-like essay.

We confess we are disposed to hope that the effect of this great case will be beneficial on the whole to the administration of criminal justice. Of late years a very reprehensible practice in the framing indictments has been gradually creeping into our criminal proceedings. There being no limit to the number of counts that may be inserted in any indictment, it has latterly become the course to insert a very large number of counts in the same indictment; and this has been more especially the case in all such prosecutions as are carried on directly or indirectly under the sanction of the government. Such a practice operates in many respects very unfavourably towards defendants. In all cases of felony the prisoner has no right to a copy of the indictment; and where the indictment is so extremely long, it is impossible for the prisoner, and barely possible for the counsel, with the greatest exertion, to master its various bearings in the course of the trial. In cases, indeed, of treason and misdemeanor, the defendant is entitled to a copy of the indictment; but in the latter, the sum the defendant is obliged to pay for such copy is so great that in practice the result is that, except on very particular occasions, the defendant never procures a copy at all. But perhaps the greatest grievance arises from a practice which has prevailed of late in some cases of misdemeanor, and especially in conspiracies—after inserting some counts framed with proper care and accuracy, to insert other counts so vague and general, as to leave it very doutful whether they are sufficient in point of law. Now, if there be any possibility of such counts being holden good, the defendant dare not venture to demur, as the judgment upon demurrer in such cases is final. (Rex v. Taylor, 3 B. & C. 502.) The consequence is, the case goes to trial, and under such general counts evidence may sometimes be admitted, which would be excluded under more accurately framed counts. If a conviction takes place on all the counts, the judgment may be arrested on the general counts; and yet it is impossible to say that this places the defendant in the same position as if these general counts had not been inserted; for no one can venture to say what effect the evidence admitted on such counts may have produced on the jury with reference to the other counts.

If the decision in this case should tend to the discontinuance of such an unreasonable practice—if it should call the attention of the Legislature to the present system of criminal pleading, and cause that system to be simplified and ameliorated, every one, we believe, will rejoice. We have long been anxiously wishing to see the forms of indictment simplified, so as to make them plainly intelligible, not merely to lawyers, but to the jury and the prisoners themselves; and we trust we are not entertaining an unfounded anticipation in hoping that the result of this case may be to produce a movement in favour of such amelioration.

We cannot conclude this article without adverting to a circumstance, which, we believe, has produced universal satisfaction. We allude to the manner in which Lord Wharncliffe interposed to prevent those noble peers who had not been brought up to the profession of the law from taking any part in the determination. Whether that interference originated with the noble lord himself, or resulted from the deliberations of the Cabinet, we know not. But this we do know, that a more exemplary sacrifice of political feelings at the shrine of justice was never offered. Heartily do we rejoice to think that the determination of the momentous question raised by this great case was confided to the law lords alone; for that is the only course that can secure for the decisions of the House of Lords that reverence which ought to be paid to the judgments of the supreme court of justice in this kingdom. Dear to the bosom of every British subject is the pure and impartial administration of justice; and they who sacrifice their party feelings at her shrine, although perchance at the moment they may seem to lose some political advantage, may nevertheless rest assured that they will infallibly gain a more certain and lasting influence with their fellow-countrymen than any political triumph can bestow.

The third article is devoted to the Law of Debtor and Creditor, at present in a state of most undesirable uncertainty, operating entirely as an indemnity to the rogue, and for the ruin of the honest man. Something must be done during the next session of Parliament to amend the existing law, and as the subject must be much discussed, and practical opinions upon it will be entitled to great weight in the decisions of the Legislature, this timely essay will help the lawyers to perform their part in the work of placing the law upon a satisfactory basis.

Our readers are aware how the interests of the public were in this matter sacrificed to the party and personal spite of Lord Brougham. Lord Cottenham's Bill provided effectual remedies against the property of debtors, and severe punishments for their frauds, while it abolished imprisonment, except under certain circumstances of concealment or fraud. Lord Brougham burked this admirable measure, and substituted one of his own, in which he deprived creditors of the power over the person, without giving them a better remedy against the property of debtors. On this the reviewer remarks:—

Had the Bill passed as it was originally introduced by Lord Cottenham, by which imprisonment for debt was proposed to be abolished, and all debtors by judgment made liable to be compulsorily brought under its provisions, the law of debtor and creditor would have been placed on a distinct and intelligible basis. We have no doubt, however, that the present defective remedies which creditors possess against their debtors, who are not traders, will now become so obvious to the commercial public, that the full measure of justice to creditors, as intended by Lord Cottenham's Bill, will be urgently demanded from the Legislature.

The fourth article is on the "Growth of Crime,"—a collection of valuable statistical facts, to which are appended remarks that will afford food for serious reflection to the Christian, the statesman, and the philosopher. We shall take largely from this singularly able essay.

The following are the most important of the facts and figures from which the author draws his conclusions:—

The number of persons brought to trial during the last eight years, in England and Wales, were as follow:—

Years.	1. Offences against the Person.	2. Offences against the Property, with Violence.	3. Offences against Property, without Violence.	4. Malicious Offences against Property.	5. Forgery and Offences against the Currency.	6. Other Offences not in the above Classes.	Total Offences
1843	2208	2263	22,095	188	619	1325	28,698
1842	2127	2178	23,995	201	634	2174	31,309
1841	2140	1573	22,017	94	437	1199	27,760
1840	1881	1934	21,484	145	541	1202	27,187
1839	2009	1432	19,243	105	436	1218	24,443
1838	1859	1538	18,273	89	508	827	23,094
1837	1719	1400	18,884	114	456	1039	23,612
1836	1959	1310	16,167	168	359	1024	20,984

In the winter of 1843, there was a third assize: the commitments for trial at that assize are not included in the above table, lest they should disturb the comparison.

The safest way of ascertaining the actual progress of crime, presented in this table, is to compare the average of the four first years with that of the four last. The following is the aggregate increase of crime thus shown to have taken place between these periods, and in a floating space of four years: (a)

	p. cent.
Of offences against the person	10·6
Of offences against property, without violence	45·2
Of offences against property, with violence	23·4
Of malicious offences against property	31·9
Of forgeries and offences against the currency	27·1
Of other offences not included in the above classes	41·1
Of all offences	24·7

During this period, population has increased by four and a half per cent. only.(b)

It will be observed, that the increase has occurred chiefly in offences against property without violence, including all descriptions of theft, fraud, embezzlement, and the receipt of stolen goods. There are two important and painful facts to be noted as to this point: first, this class comprises nearly three-fourths of the whole amount of crimes; so that an increase in it shews a far wider spread of vice than an increase in any other class would do: secondly, it is a class of offence into which the bulk of the juvenile offenders fall: it therefore indicates a rising generation of criminals, far larger than its forerunner. Thefts are generally pilot crime.; the preface of adult depravity; and we shall hereafter show that poverty will account only for a small portion of the wide and systematic depredation afloat.

There are three classes of thieves: the professed thief, local and travelling; the non-professional thieves, ranging from the lowest to the highest classes; and the thieves from accident, from the overpowering force of sudden temptation or real want.

Of the first division of the first class, it was estimated by the London police that there were, in London alone, about 10,000 eight years ago. Liverpool, Bristol, and Newcastle, were found to contain upwards of 7,000 more; whilst the number of houses known as receptacles for stolen goods, amounted in London to 227, and in the other three towns to 192, and in other towns in like proportion to their facilities for the traffic. Of the itinerant thieves, who form division two of class one, it is impossible to form any estimate; the convicts who have been examined describe them as "many thousands." The career of these people is said to be about an average of six years before a second conviction sends them out of the country. We believe it to be much longer; but assuming this to be the case, what an incalculable mass of plunder does it reveal which wholly escapes detection. Many convicts own to thousands of such offences in the course of their career. The amount of property annually stolen at Liverpool was estimated, a few years ago, at upwards of 700,000*l*. Far greater is the proportion of undetected crime, though perhaps not of amount of plunder, effected by the second class of non-professional pilferers, in whose position there is often nothing to attract, and much to disarm suspicion. The moral guilt of this class is, we think, undoubtedly the greatest: they are more within the sphere of better influences. They are not incited by loss of character, or the necessity of a felon livelihood. There is more light and less excuse. Class No. 1 is criminal by birth, parentage, and education: he is a born felon, cradled in crime, and trained in profound ignorance of morals from his birth to his transportation. No good comes near him, and his sole alternative is vice. Class No. 2 has every alternative, and chooses crime as an agreeable auxiliary to his pleasures, and a make-weight to his comforts. Class No. 3 is generally the victim of Class No. 2; and though pitiable and pardonable, is often the mere embryo of the class below. Moral turpitude, however, is clearly not chargeable on this class, and their offences alone are to be deducted from the catalogue and indicia of popular guilt. They are but a very small proportion of the whole number of the vast band of depredators who infest this country above all others in Europe; this is the painful conclusion in which a calm and full view of the subject necessarily results. No statistics of foreign countries, where every petty police offence swells the annals of public crime, can gainsay this sad reflection upon the character of England. No traveller has ever walked through, or really acquainted himself with the character of a continental country, who does not ridicule the mere notion that property is equally insecure there as here.

Crimes appear to be increasing in enormity.

Murders, and attempts to murder and maim, have increased 38 per cent. on the average of the last four years; rapes, 57 per cent.; other horrid offences, 53 per cent. Arsons, which exhibit malice in its worst shape, have increased by 28 per cent.; and if those of the present year were taken into account, the increase would be far greater. The Police Commissioners, after a careful and diligent inquiry into the phases of crime in 1839, and speaking therefore of the exact period with which we are contrasting the increased crime of subsequent years, say, "We find that crimes of violence, whether originating in rapacity, or resorted to for the gratification of any vindictive or gross passion other than money, are generally in a course of gradual diminution."—p. 42. There has been a lamentable change in this respect since then. Not only do the "tables" prove this numerically, but the character which the graver class of crimes assumes confirms the belief that there is a real growth of the atrocities of guilt.

Some tables then shew the increase of crime in the various counties, and the results of this examination are thus stated:—

One of the first errors which the above table explodes is that of the belief that the increase of crimes can be accounted for by "the unveiling of an hitherto latent excess of delinquency by the enlargement of the police and constabulary jurisdiction, and the consequent readiness with which crime is now brought to light." A glance at the table shews that the largest increase of crime is in three counties, in two of which there has been no enlargement of police at all; and out of the twenty-two counties where it has been enlarged, in a majority of them the increase has been considerably below the average increase of crime in the whole number. If the power of detection is largely increased, so unquestionably is the skill of concealment; and the one must in great measure counterbalance the other. The police are well aware, and can amply testify, that the devices of escape are daily increasing in success and ingenuity. The rural police may certainly in some places add somewhat to the number of committals, but being at all times a costly burthen to a county, is it not evident that the real growth of crime, and the consequent insecurity of property, induced the sacrifice?

And further:—

It appears that crime is greatest in the west midland counties, extending northwards through Cheshire and Lancashire, including, in short, the chief textile and mineral manufactures, and the metropolis; the only exceptions to these are the counties of Hereford and Berks, both purely agricultural, and without large towns or vicinity to London, which accounts in some measure for the crime in Essex. The contrast is striking between the northern and southern counties. In Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham, the total committals were 743 in a population of 808,926—or 1 in 1,088; whilst in Kent, Surrey, Hants, Dorset, Sussex, Wilts, Somerset, and Devon, comprising a population of above three millions, the committals were 1 in 586! Nor is this all: the class of offences was considerably graver in the southern than in the northern counties. The murders and offences against the person were nearly double, and the offences with violence against the person more than double, in proportion to their relative populations, in the southern than in the northern counties. Of malicious offences against property there were none whatever in the northern, whilst there were sixty-three in the southern counties. Were it possible to ascertain the exact number of committals in the East and North, apart from the West Riding of Yorkshire, they might have been added to the other northern counties with a similar result. It is worthy of remark, that Cornwall even exceeds the ratio of the northern counties in freedom from crime, and forms a very remarkable exception to the neighbouring counties.

It would appear that crime does not so keep pace with poverty as some persons suppose.

To some extent, though not materially, poverty and the pressure of want may have caused a portion of the increase of crime: that increase acquired its chief advance between the years 1837 and 1842, during which time the price of wheat rose from 55s. to 70s. and during which there was severe distress amongst the people. There was, however, no diminution last year, excepting as compared with 1842, which appears to have largely exceeded all other years in the number of offences. There is no doubt that long-continued depression reduces men to a state which is eventually fatal to self-respect, and therefore to some of the strongest safeguards of moral conduct. But with every disposition to attribute the evil before us to these passing causes, we are painfully constrained to think that it has a far deeper root. In the first place, as we have seen, there has been a great increase in the crimes which indicate malice, and partake of passions for which poverty could supply no sort of motive. Again, we find that even in 1843, when unquestionably distress was greatly mitigated, although simple larcenies were diminished, there was an increase of no less than 14 per cent. in offences against the person, and nearly the same increase in violent offences against property; and owing to Rebeccaism in Wales, and "the great general increase of incendiarism," the malicious offences against property have swollen by 27.9 per cent. in one year!

Reading and writing, which silly persons call education, do not tend to diminish but rather to increase crime, by enabling criminals better to effect their designs. Our author observes,

The spread of a scant and barren instruction in reading and writing, and the mere implements to education, are among the number of the agencies thus perverted to evil. We hasten to extract from the Table of Crime the following synopsis of the degree of instruction possessed by the criminals whose offences are recorded in 1843:—

	Manufacturing Counties.	Agricultural Counties.
Unable to read or write	30·9	34·2
Able to read and write imperfectly	59·0	59·8
Able to read and write well	9·6	5·4
Instruction superior to reading and writing well	0·5	0·6

Thus the majority of the whole body of criminals consists not of the wholly ignorant, but of the class who have a smattering knowledge of the steps of education: enough to increase their cunning, and inflame their tendencies to vice, without an iota of the knowledge which can improve the understanding or the heart. Is this used as an argument against all education? To us the facts we have cited seem to afford the strongest reason for the vigorous furtherance of sound secular and Christian education.

We entirely concur in the justice of the following remarks upon disparity of punishments.

A bad effect, moreover, results from the strange disparity of punishments awarded in the different courts of criminal justice. At a court of quarter sessions last year, presided over by a non-professional magistrate, a young woman was tried for stealing two shillings out of a tea-cup: it having been, with more silver in it, carelessly left in her way in a kitchen by her employer. She was found guilty: a prior conviction was proved for some petty theft, which, being a felony, extends the discretionary power of the court to inflict any punishment from a day's imprisonment to transportation for life! She was sentenced to be transported for ten years, and was taken, with a baby in her arms, shrieking with agony from the dock. In a neighbouring county, at the same sessions, presided over by a professional chairman, a man was tried for stealing planks; a previous conviction was proved, and nine months' imprisonment awarded as his sentence!

And there is too much truth in the succeeding paragraph.

The better knowledge of the law which the proposed codification of it would secure is an object of much importance, not only as facilitating the amendment and improvement of the law itself, but because it would enhance the dread of punishment; inasmuch as its connection with specific offences would be rendered simple and distinct to the mind and comprehension of the people. The criminal code now floats like a misty apparition of vague character at a distance before the eyes of the people; it is not brought home to them as a thing in daily operation, everywhere at hand. A man was warned, in a country village not long since, that in cutting a young ash sapling he was liable to be punished by law, "Nay, nay," said the man, "we dont hold by them laws in these parts." A prisoner, at the Gloucester sessions, gravely pleaded, that in taking his neighbour's stone pig-trough from a quarry, he had only done what was customary, and that this was not stealing: and the jury deliberated for a long while upon the point. An attorney in Bedfordshire lately wrote to a professional man in London, to ascertain whether it was safe to indict a man for stealing fruit from a garden, it being contrary to the custom to punish it.

(a) This is clearly the only means of arriving at the real tendency of the state of crime. Mr. Redgrave, of the Home Office, who has prefixed some valuable remarks to the "Tables," wastes some paragraphs on a comparison between the last year and the year preceding. No inference whatever can be drawn from these isolated comparisons. It were just as useful to measure the height of two succeeding waves, to ascertain if the tide is rising or falling.

(b) It increased fourteen and a half per cent. from 1831 to 1841, according to the last census.

The writer hints at remedies, but doubtfully, and this is a subject which might well claim the instant and serious consideration of the philosopher and the legislator.

Here we must pause for the present in our notice of The Law Magazine.

NECROLOGY.

P. W. MAYHEW, ESQ.

The deceased entered the Excise about the year 1804, and performed the duties of assistant solicitor up to the year 1829, when Mr. Carr, the chief solicitor, died, and Mr. Mayow was appointed his successor. Up to this period the office had been held by letters patent from the Crown, and the chief solicitor was paid by fees; but an alteration took place on Mr. Mayow's succession to the appointment, and he resigned his patent and right to take fees, in consideration of which the Lords of the Treasury allowed him a yearly intimation of 2,000*l*. with a distinct intimation to the Board of Excise that the salary would be reduced fully one-half on the discontinuance of Mr. Mayow's services by death or otherwise.

The deceased gentleman married a Creole lady, with a princely fortune, and had three sons and two daughters. One of the former studied for a short time for the Bar, but afterwards relinquished that profession. Two of them hold lucrative livings in the church of England, and the third is an officer in the dragoons. The deceased possessed large estates in Norfolk and Cumberland, and the daughter of the Bishop of Cork is united to one of the sons belonging to the church. Mrs. Mayow died about five months since. On several occasions Mr. Mayow has been known, when a needy offender against the Excise laws has been sent to gaol, in default of paying a fine imposed, to become a private donor to the family proportionably to their distress. He was much respected by the various law officers of the Crown, and a numerous and distinguished circle of friends, by whom his loss will be deeply deplored.
